Rich. Saint George Norrey King at armes, in fauour of this worke.

IT is farre from my purpose, to commend without cause, or by ouer curious florish to make a shadow seeme a substance, this worke needs no such deceptio visus; The subiect is of it selfe honorable, and able to stand without such weake proppes. The glory of our nation being almost buried in the pit of obscurity, is herein reuiued, the continuance of Christianity traced from age to age, the antiquity and situation of our Townes, Castles, Religious Houses, Nobility, and all other memorable matters so liuely portraied, as in a glasse we may rightly discerne the true shape, quality and condition of each of them in particular. This worke therefore being now brought vpon the publike stage and view of the world, may in my poore censure giue satisfaction to the learned Reader, and abide the touch of the malignant opposer; which being effected without hope of gaine or vaine ostentation with so great care both of body and mind, is the more precious, for, difficilia quæ pulchra. Wherein Gods power is made knowne in this his weake, but worthy instrument: and the glory of Great Britaine made more famous to the world as well in the Geographicall demension of the Lands situation as in the historicall relations of her most famous monarchs and glorious actions; no Kingdome hitherto so particularly described, nor nations History by true record more faithfully penned: In honor whereof I sacrifice these lines of my loue vpon the Altar of this worke, and celebrate the Authors remembrance to future posterities.

To my friend Mr. IOHN SPEED, being very sicke.

Great loue, and little skill may cause me to missay.
But certainly this sicknes cannot make thee die:
Though cruell symptomes, and these thirteene yeeres assay
For thy deare country, doth thy health & strength decay.
Yet sith thy toylsome labour, and thy industrie.
Is for thy Countries sake, her fame on hie to raise:
Shee shall thy temples crowne with euerlasting bayes,
And in despite of death, shall cause thy memorie
To liue in endles fame with all posteritie.

Now may shee see her beauty, and her riches store,
What erst shee was in eu'rie age, and change of state,
And present greatnes such as neuer heretofore,
Since this great Monarch rul'd from North to southerne shore,
And sith thy life is to thy country dedicate,
Let none presume thy lawrell from thy head to reaue
For this hir story, which thy skilfull hand did weaue:
But liue, & weare it [Speed] vntil the worlds great fate
Shall bring all earthly things vnto their vtmost date.

Yet Place, well rang'd, gets glory by these warres.

No helps thou hadst, nor no assisting aide
In this attempt: but, Vertue gaue thee might
That well to doe, that well thou hast assaide
Which shall (in grace) out-liue immortall spight.

Hadst thou among the Romanes liu'd when they Did signiorize the World; A Signiory
Should then (at least) haue guerdon'd thy Surucy, Thy Mappes, Descriptions, and thine Historie.

But, thou dost liue when all Arts saue the * eight
(Illiberall liberall Arte) a begging goe;
That Arte alone, with her true friend Deceipt,
Gets all; then all seekes but that Arte to know.

* Adulation.

But, by thy Arte though nought be purchased
But emptie Fame (that feeds, but fattens not) Yet shall it feed thy NAME till DEATH be dead;
While emptie noble Names away shall rot.

The Leaues this Booke contains, and Maps here grau'n,
Are still as Feathers to thy Fames faire Wings,
To fanne fresh Aire vpon the face of Heauen;
And, raise the same aboue all ending Things:
That when Confusion wracks this double FRAME,
A Spirit shall moue on CHAOS Call'd thy Fame

IO. SANDERSON.

THE PROEME.
TO THE LEARNED AND LOVERS OF GREAT BRITAINES GLORY.

HAuing thus farre trauelled in the protract, and deſcription of this famous Empire of GREAT BRITAINE, I might here haue reſted, and claimed the priuiledge that yeeres and imbecillitie haue brought me vnto: had not a further deſire in others vrged it a matter incident, hiſtorically to lay downe the originals of thoſe Nations and ſucceſsions of thoſe Monarchs, which either by birth or conqueſt haue aſpired to the Imperiall Crowne. And albeit I finde my ſelfe both tired in the former, and moſt vnfit to proſecute this latter, yet will I endeuour to giue herein my beſt aſſayes; though as my labours, ſo my wants alſo, thereby will be made more vulgar to the world.

For if thoſe men were blame-worthy againſt whom Heraclite exclaimeth, who with long toile and great trouble finde a little pure ſubſtance in a great deale of baſe earth: how ſhall I then free me from the like imputation, that from ſo many mines of pure mettals, haue gotten ſo little Oare, and the ſame neither well tried in my defectiue fornace, nor yet artificially caſt off through the default of the mould, wanting both skil for to faſhion, and meaſure to performe, the true proportions that in ſuch a proiect is to be required; and how often theſe my defects haue diſſwaded my proceedings, is beſt knowne to him that is the ſearcher of the heart. Heraclite.

But by what fate I am inforced ſtill to goe forward, I know not, vnleſſe it be the ardent affection and loue to my natiue Countrey; wherein I muſt confeſſe that Nature in thoſe gifts hath bene both liberall, yea and prodigall, though Fortune as ſparing & faſt-handed againſt me, euer checking the Bit with the Raines of neceſsity, and curbing the meanes that ſhould illuſtrate my labours: which moues me ſometimes to thinke that if the great Philoſopher Theophraſtus, had cauſe on his death-bed to accuſe Nature, for giuing man ſo long a leſſon, and ſo ſhort a life; then I againſt Fortune may as iuſtly exclaime, that hath aſsigned me ſo great a labour and ſo little meanes. And therefore let it not ſeeme offenſiue that I draw my waters from the Ceſterns of others, who am not able to fetch them at the ſpring-head my ſelfe: Neither that I ſtrike vpon the ſame Anuile vnto their ſound, though nothing ſo loud, nor with the like ſtrength; wherein yet this fruit at leaſt wil (I hope) redound of my en- Theophraſtus.

deuours that I ſhall incite the more learned: if not otherwiſe, yet in emulation of me, to free the face drawne by Apelles, from the cenſure of the fault or defect in the foot, and not onely to amend, but euen to new-mould the whole. Which thing though my dayes are neere ſpent; and with Barzillai I may ſay that muſicke to me is now vnpleaſing: yet doth my eare thirſt after the ſet of that ſtraine, as Socrates thoughts ranne euer on his Booke: who the night before he was to ſuffer death, was deſirous to learne muſicke, becauſe he would die learning ſtill ſomething. Moſes when he foreſaw the deſtruction of his Common-wealth, which whilſt it ſtood, was the glory of the earth, and a paterne to all kingdomes ſucceeding, left this for a Law among the reſt, and euen to remaine for euer, that the fathers ſhould teach their children, and ſhould commit vnto writing thoſe things which the Lord in their dayes had done, and enioyned the children; Likewiſe to enquire of the times that were paſt, euen from the firſt creation of man: For when as Empires and Kingdomes, Common weales and Cities, do end and periſh, yet the Hiſtories thereof do remaine and liue; And that made Cicero to ſay as he did, that Salamina ſhould be vtterly forgotten, before the things that were done in Salamina ſhould periſh: And therefore as among the wiſe anſweres of Thales, the Hiſtories of Countreis are to be accounted for principals, either as Cicero calleth them the Miſtres of life, and expoſitions of Times; ſo likewiſe let vs from the lyricall Poet Simonides learne this further, That he is perfectly happy which knowes his natiue countrey to be truly glorious. And as Caſſidore calls him a worthy Citizen that ſeeketh the commodity of his countrey: So contrariwiſe he is by Bale eſteemed but a fruitles clod of earth, that ſucks the ſappe of his ſoile onely to himſelfe, whoſe memoriall ſhall periſh as the diſperſed ſmoake in the clouds, though for a time he mount aloft in his ſwelling pride. This naturall loue and true affection to our natiue Countrey, we may further learne from the ancient Patriarks and Fathers themſelues, who beſides a deſire that they had to theirs, continually to liue therein during life, commanded their bodies to be buried therein after death: from whoſe Bowels they firſt had aſſumed their breathes, and in whoſe boſome they layd their bones, as in their laſt bed of reſt. Yea, of the vnreaſonable creatures, the Birds and Beaſts, we may learne this loue, that alwayes are willing towards their home. And if it happen that Countreys grow vnkinde as Homers did, that in his old age and blind, ſuffred him to beg his bread; or that a Prophet in his owne countrey is not eſteemed, as Jeremy felt it, and CHRIST IESVS taught, yet did the one for his peoples captiuity, wiſh his eyes a fountaine of teares, and the other for his countreys deſtruction lamented and wept, holding it vnlawfull to take the childrens bread, and to giue it vnto others.

2. Sam. 19. 35. Socrates. Deut. 6. 6. 7. Deut. 4. 32. Thales. Cicero. Simonides. Caſſidore. Bale in Leylands Newyeeres gift. Gen. 49. 29. Ieremi. 37. 1. Matt. 13. 57. Ieremi. 9. 1. Luke 19. 41. Matt. 15. 26.

That this our Countrey and ſubiect of Hiſtory deſerueth the loue of her inhabitants, is witneſſed euen by forraine writers themſelues, who haue termed it the Court of Queene Ceres, the Granary of the Weſterne world, the fortunate Iſland, the Paradiſe of pleaſure and Garden of God; whoſe Typographicall deſcriptions for the whole Iland, and Geographical ſurueyes for the ſeuerall parts, exceed any other kingdome vnder the cope of Heauen; that onely excepted which was conquered and diuided by Joſuah; And for fruitfulnes and temperature may be accounted another Canaan; watered with riuers that doe cleaue the earth, as the Prophet ſpeaketh, and make the land as rich and beautiful, as was that of Ægypt. Our Kings for valour and Sanctity, ranked with the worthieſt in the world, and our Nations originals, conqueſts, and continuance, tried by the touch of the beſt humane teſtimonies, leaue as faire a Luſtre vpon the ſame ſtone, as doeth any other, and with any nation may eaſily contend (ſaith Lanquet) both for antiquity, and continuall inhabitants, from the firſt time that any of them can claime their originals.

Habak. 2. 9. Gene. 13. 10. Tho. Lanquet.

And although our many Records are periſhed by the inuaſions of ſtrangers, through their couetous Conqueſt of ſo faire a Land; or in the ciuill diſſenſions of homebred aſpirers that haue ſought the poſſeſsion of ſo rich a Crowne, yet Truth hath left vs no leſſe beholding vnto her, then mightier Nations, and them that would be far more famous.

Neither

Neither is it to be wondred at, that the Records of GREAT BRITAINE are eaten vp with Times teeth, as Ouid ſpeakes, when as in Times ruines lye buried their Regiſters, that haue bene kept with a ſtronger guard, as Titus Liuy in the entrance of his Hiſtory affirmeth of the Romanes. As for thoſe things (ſaith he) as are reported either before, or at the foundation of the City more beautified and ſet out with Poets fables, then grounded vpon pure and faithfull reports, I meane neither to auerre nor diſproue. Of whoſe vncertainties, let vs a while heare the reporters themſelues ſpeake, before we proceed to the certaine ſucceſſions of our Britiſh Monarchs: vntill which time the credit of our Hiſtory may wel be ſaid to waigh with (if not downe peize) many others. Varro (that learned Romane writer, who liued an hundred yeeres before the birth of our Sauiour Chriſt) calleth the firſt world to the Flood vncertaine; and thence to the firſt Olympias fabulous: Becauſe in that time (ſaith he) there is nothing related (for the moſt part) but fables among the Greekes, Latines, and other learned Nations. And therefore Plutarch beginneth the liues of his worthy men, no higher then Theſeus: becauſe (ſaith he) what hath bene written before, was but of ſtrange things, and ſayings full of monſtrous fables imagined and deuiſed by Poets, which are altogether vncertaine and moſt vntrue. And Diodorus Siculus (that liued in Auguſtus Cæſars time, a great ſearcher after Antiquities, and for thirty yeeres continuance a traueller into many Countreys, for information and further ſatisfaction) writing his Hiſtory called Bibliotheca, conteyning forty Bookes, and yeeres of continuance one thouſand, one hundred thirty and eight, of his firſt ſixe himſelfe giueth this cenſure in his Proeme. Theſe Bookes (ſaith he) contayning the Acts of ancient men, before the deſtruction of Troy, with the ancient Hiſtories aſwell of Grecians as Barbarians, are called fabulous: Which mooued Lucretius the Poet to demaund this queſtion.

Yea and of Troyes ſtory it ſelfe, if we may beleeue Thucydides (whom Bodine commendeth for an abſolute Hiſtorian) though it be ancient (ſaith he) yet a great part thereof is fabulous. And Tully out of Plato complayneth of as much: For you Grecians (ſaith he) as children in learning, deliuer onely things vncertaine, and haue mingled fables with the Warres of Thebes, and of Troy, things (perhaps) which neuer were, but gathered out of the ſcattered Verſes of Homer and others, not digeſted by Ariſtarchus, and are yet vncertaine and obſcure. And that the Greekes indeed were but babes in Antiquity, Joſephus in his Nations defence againſt Appion, ſufficiently doth proue, where he affirmeth, That the inuention of their Letters was not ſo old as the ſiege of Troy, inſomuch that the Poeſie of Homer (then the which there is none more ancient among them) was not committed to writing, but ſung by roate. And the Latine tongue it ſelfe by M. Cato is ſaid, not to haue bene in vſe foure hundred and fifty yeeres before the building of Rome. And Titus Liuy their famous Hiſtorian, freely confeſſeth, That the vſe of Letters and learning among the Romanes, was rare and hard to be found before the taking of Rome by the Gaules. Yea, and of the vncertainty of Romes foundation, how lauiſh ſo euer Hiſtorians haue written, not onely Feneſtella hath continued whole Pages, but Plutarch likewiſe in the life of Romulus, hath many ſayings, whereof this is one. The Hiſtoriographers (ſaith he) do not agree in their writings, by whom, nor for what cauſe the great name of Rome (the glory whereof is blowne abroad through the world) was firſt giuen vnto it; ſome affirming, that the Pelagians after they had runne ouer a great part of the world, laſtly ſtayed themſelues in that place where Rome was new built, and for their great ſtrength in Armes, gaue name to that City Rome, which ſignifyeth power in the Greeke tongue. Other ſay, that certaine Troians after their ſiege, in certaine veſſels ſaued ued themſelues by flight, and being put into the Thuſcan Sea, anchored neere to the Riuer Tyber: whoſe wiues being extremely Sea-ſicke, through the counſell of Roma a Lady, the wiſeſt and worthieſt among them, ſet fire on the whole Fleete, whereupon their husbands (though ſore offended) were inforced to make vſe of their preſent neceſſity, and neere vnto Palantium planted this City, whoſe fame preſently grew great, and in honour of Lady Roma named it Rome; and from hence they ſay the cuſtome of kiſſing in ſalutations came, after the example of theſe wiues, who to appeaſe the husbands wraths with ſmiles and imbracings kiſſed their mouths. Some will haue the name from Roma the daughter of Ftalus and of Lucaria, or els of Telephus the ſonne of Hercules, and of the wife of Æneas. Others of Aſcanius the ſonne of Æneas. Some againe from Romanus the ſonne of Vlyſſes and of Cyrce, wil haue it named Rome. Others from Romus the ſonne of Emathion, whom Diomedes ſent thither from Troy. There are that bring the name thereof from one Romus a tyrant of the Latines, who droue the Thuſcans out of thoſe parts. And they who thinke that Romulus (as that is moſt generall, and carieth the moſt likelihood to be Romes founder,) do not agree about his auncestours, as more at large in Plutarch appeareth. And therefore with Thucydides we may well ſay, It is a hard and difficult matter to keepe a meane in ſpeaking of things, wherein ſcarſly can be had a certaine opinion of trueth. And the rather, for that the writers themſelues haue blamed each others of affectation & falſhood, as in Joſephus we may ſee; who affirmeth, That Hellanicus diſſented from Acuſilaus, Acuſilaus with Diodorus correcting Herodotus; Epherus accuſed Hellanicus of vntrueths; ſo did Timæus reproue Ephorus of as much; Philiſtus and Callias diſſented from Timæus in his Hiſtory of Sicily, and Thucydides accounted a lyar by ſome. Cæſar is taxed by Aſinius Pollio (ſaith Suetonius) to be partiall in his Commentaries; And Tacitus by Tertullian is blamed for vntruths; Fabius Maximus is reprehended by Polybius for defectiuely writing the Punicke warres; and himſelfe againe with Silenus, Timæus, Antigonus, & Hierom, as much found fault with by Dionyſius Halicarnaſſæus, for writing the Romane hiſtories ſo vnperfectly. And a man may vſe the very ſame ſpeech againſt Dionyſius, ſaith Bodine. Theſe things thus ſtanding, let vs giue leaue to Antiquitie, who ſometimes mingleth falſhoods with truth, to make the beginnings of Policies ſeeme more honourable: And whoſe power is farre ſcrued into the worlds conceit, that with Hierome we may ſay, Antiquity is allowed with ſuch generall applauſe, that knowne vntruthes many times are pleaſing vnto many. Yet with better regard to reuerend Antiquity, whom Jobs oppoſer wills vs inquire after, and to our owne relations in deliuering their cenſures, let this be conſidered; That more things are let ſlippe, then are comprehended in any mans writings, and yet more therein written, then any mans life (though it be long) will admit him to reade. Neither let vs be foreſtalled with any preiudicate opinions of the reporters; that in ſomethings may iuſtly be ſuſpected, or in affection, which by nature we owe to our naturall Conntrey; nor conſent (as Liuie ſpeaketh) to ſtand to the ancientneſſe of reports, when it ſeemeth to take away the certainty of truth. To keepe a meane betwixt both, my ſelfe with Bildad doe confeſſe, that I am but of yeſterday, and know nothing, and therefore wil relate the originall names and Nations of this famous Iland, with the ſucceſſions of her Monarches and Hiſtoricall actions, ſo farre only as is moſt approued by the beſt Writers, and will leaue other clouds of obſcurity to be cleared by the labours of a more learned penne.

THE

THE SITE AND CIRCVIT OF GREAT BRITAINES MONARCHIE.

CHAPTER I.

BESIDES those fruitfull Ilands that dispersedly are scattered about the Mayne, like to beautifull pearls that incompasse a Diademe, the Ile of GREAT BRITAINE doth raise it selfe first to our sight, as the Bodie of that most famous & mighty Empire, whereof many other Kingdomes and Countries are parcels and members. Being by the Almighty so set in the maine Ocean, as that shee is thereby the High Admirall of the Seas, and in the terrestriall Globe so seated, as that she is worthily reputed both The Garden of Pleasure, and The Storehouse of Profit, opening her Hauens euery way, fit to receiue all forraine trafficke, and to vtter her owne into all other parts: and therefore (as the Soueraigne Lady and Empresse of the rest) deserues our description in the first place.

BRITAINE Admirall of the Seas.

(2) This Iland is so spacious and ample, that Cesar (the first Romane discouerer thereof) supposed that he had found out another World: for to his seeming it appeared, that the Ocean was rather contained within that Mayne, then that Mayne to be compassed with the Ocean about. And Iulius Solinus, for her circuit and largenesse, saith that it deserueth the name of Another World. But Aristides a Greeke Author speakes much more properly, who by way of excellencie termeth BRITAINE, The Great Iland: As likewise Tacitus, that vndertooke to describe BRITAINE by his owne knowledge, who saith, that of all Ilands knowen to the Romanes it was the greatest: And so doth Dionysius in his description of the World.

In Panegy. Orat. to Constantium.

(3) But as Strabo compares the then knowen World, to a Cloake, Rutilius Numatianus Italy, to an Oken leafe, and Dionysius Spaine, vnto an Oxe-hide: so the said Tacitus in the life of Agricola, from Liuie his ancient, and Fabius Rusticus his moderne, doth liken the fashion thereof to a long Dish, or two-headed Axe: whose forme notwithstanding may better be exposed to the eie, in the draught before seene, then can be explained in words to conceit, or vnto any other thing bee compared besides it selfe: especially seeing that so many good Writers haue had but very bad successe in their resemblances of Countries. And this of them is rather vnlike to either, if wee speake of the whole, which then was vnknowen, as it seemeth by Tacitus. And the huge enorme tract of ground beyond Caledonia, which runneth vnto the furthermost point, growing narrow and sharpe like a wedge, was first redoubled with the Romane fleet by Iulius Agricola, and BRITAINE discouered to bee an Iland, one hundred thirty and six yeeres after Iulius Cesars first entrance therein.

(4) Some haue beene induced by the narrownesse of the Sea, and likenesse of the Soile, to thinke that BRITAINE was sometimes ioined to the continent of France: whereunto Seruius Honoratius subscribeth in his Commentarie vpon the first Eclog of Virgil, who there mentioneth

BRITAINE thought one continent with FRANCE. Seruius Honorat.

—— Penitùs toto diuisos orbe Britannos,

As likewise by Claudian another ancient Poet it is stiled, Claudian.

—— nostro deductâ Britannia mundo,
The Britaine soile remoou'd from our worlds continent.

And Vinianus with them affirmes, that in the beginning Britaine and Gaul were both one Land. The like doth Virgil verifie of the Ile of Sicilie, which in times past hee reports to haue beene one with Italie. Others hold, that all Ilands had their first separation from the Mayne by the rage of the generall Deluge, and that the mountaines thereby shewed their tops aboue the plaine grounds; and the plaines setling lower, became deepe vallies. When or howsoeuer, by Gods diuine ordinance and wisdome, wee see that these Ilands situated in the Seas, doe no lesse serue and adorne the Ocean it selfe, then the Lakes and Pooles of water doe the drie land, and all of them (as members of one masse) to minister sustenance for the life of all things liuing, and pleasures to the vse and seruice of man.

Vinianus.

Thought of some that all Ilands had their first separation from the Mayne by the rage of the generall Deluge.

(5) The Iland of BRITAINE, of all others the most famous (by Catullus reputed the furthest towards the West) is bounded on the South with Normandie and France, vpon the East with Germany and Denmarke, vpon the West with Ireland and the Atlanticke Ocean, and vpon the North with the vast Deucaliden Seas. The length thereof, measured by the graduations to both extremes, that is, from the Lyzard Point Southward in Cornwall, which lieth in the Latitude of 50. degrees and 6. minutes, to the Straithy head in Scotland (being the furthest point of this Iland towards towards the North) ſet in the degree 60. and 30. minutes containeth (according to the ſcale of the terreſtriall Globe) ſix hundred twenty foure miles: not to trouble the Reader with other accounts, ſeeing the ſame ſo exactly to agree with the ſpaces of the heauens. And the extent of the Land in the brodeſt part is from the Lands end in Cornwall in the Weſt (ſituated in 14. degrees and 37. minutes of Longitude, according to Mercator his Atlas) vnto the Iland Tenet in the Eaſt of Kent (lying in 22. degrees 30. minutes) and containeth miles 340. as they haue deliuered, that with curious ſearch haue laid the dimenſion thereof.

Britaines bredth.

BRITAINE in the 8. Climate for Latitude, and for Longitude placed betweene the parallels fourteene and twenty ſix.

(6) The ſite of this Iland is ſet by the Mathematicks in the eighth Climate for Latitude, and the Longitude likewiſe placed betwixt the Parallels fourteene and twenty ſix: a ſeat as well for Aire as Soile, both fruitfull and milde; and for length of daies, pleaſant and delightfull: for in the height of Summer the day is ſaid to bee eighteene equinoctiall houres long, wherof ſixteen and a halfe are ſpent from Sunne to Sunne. Yea and Tacitus ſaith, that in the furtheſt North part of the Iland the nights are ſo ſhort, that betwixt the going out and comming in of the day the ſpace is hardly perceiued, and the Sunne ſeene neither to ſet nor ariſe: Becauſe (ſaith he) the extreme and plaine parts of the earth proiect a low ſhadow, and raiſe not the darkneſſe on high, ſo the night falleth vnder the skie and ſtarre. Better might hee haue ſaid, by reaſon of the inclination of his Circle to the Horizon deſcending not directly, but paſſing obliquely, razing as it were vnder their Horizon.

In the furtheſt North part of BRITAINE ỹ nights ſo ſhort, as the ſpace betwixt the daies going and comming can hardly be perceiued. In vita Agricolæ.

(7) The aire, ſaith Strabo and Tacitus, is rather inclinable to ſhowers then to ſnow. And Ceſar commends it to bee more temperate, and the cold leſſer, then that in France, as not ſubiect to either extremes, as the more Northerne and Southerne Countries are: to which temperature Ceſcenius Getulicus a very ancient Poet ſeemeth to haue reſpect, when of this Iland thus he verſifieth:

The Arabicke Geographie.

(8) And although the Seas thereof are accounted and called by Nubienſis the Arabian, The darke and dangerous Seas, in regard of the miſty vapors that therfrom ariſe, yet in the winter ſeaſon thoſe clouds are diſperſed into ſtill ſhowers of raine, that doe diſſolue the rigour and great extremitie of the cold: yea and thoſe Seas themſelues ſtirred and working to and fro with the windes, doe thereby wax warme (as Cicero ſaith) ſo that a man may eaſily perceiue within that world of waters a certaine heat incloſed. And Minutius Fælix prouing that GOD hath a ſpeciall regard to the ſeuerall parts of the world, as well as to the whole, ſaith, that BRITAINE, though otherwhiles wanting the aſpect of the Sunne, yet is it releeued with the warmth of her enuironing Seas; and as much refreſhed, we may well ſay, by thoſe ſweet and gentle windes that in the height of Summer are ſent from thoſe ſeas, and doe abate the rigor of the Sunnes great ſcorching heat; and yeeldeth not only entercourſe for traffique into all parts of the World, but plentifully aboundeth with all ſorts of fiſh, to the great benefit of the Inhabitants; and bringeth foorth Pearles, as Tacitus ſheweth, which were vſually caſt out with the flood, and gathered at the ebbe. Theſe Pearles, though not altogether ſo orient as they in India, by Amianus in his 23. booke and 12. chapter, are called Rich Gemmes. And Pliny in his ninth booke and thirty fifth chapter, vſeth the like terme: The deſire whereof (as Suetonius ſaith) drew Ceſars affection for the Conqueſt of BRITAINE.

(9) The ſoile (ſaith Tacitus) ſetting aſide the Oliue, the Vine, and ſuch other plants as are onely proper to hotter Countries, taketh all kinde of Graine, and beareth it in abundance: it ſhooteth vp quickly, and ripeneth ſlowly: the cauſe of both is the ſame, the ouer-much moiſture of the ſoile, and the aire. And Ceſar writeth, that for timber it was ſtored of all kindes, as in Gallia, the Beech and Firre tree onely excepted. For abundance of Graine, Britaine is ſaid to bee The ſeat of Queene Ceres, by Orpheus the old Poet; and the Granary and Storehouſe for the Weſterne World, as Charles the great tearmed it: and by our owne Anceſtors in the blacke Booke of the Exchequer it is called a Paradiſe of pleaſure. From whence the Romanes were wont yeerely to tranſport (with a fleet of eight hundred veſſels bigger then Barges) great ſtore of corne for the maintenance of their Armies. But vnto the particular relation of each ſeuerall bleſsing belonging to this moſt happie Iland, wee will not againe enter, ſeeing that in euery County wee haue ſufficiently, and no more then truly, ſpoken thereof. Only, if you pleaſe, heare what hath beene ſaid of this Land by the Romane Orators, and firſt in the Panegyricke to Conſtantius the Emperour.

Ceſar. Com. lib 5.

Britaine called the ſeat of Ceres.

(10) O happie BRITAINE, and more fortunate then all other Lands beſide, which firſt didſt ſee Conſtantine Emperour! For good cauſe hath nature endowed thee with all bleſsings both of aire and ſoile: wherin there is neither exceſſiue cold of Winter, nor extreme heat of Summer: wherein there is ſo great abundance of graine, that it ſufficeth both for bread and drinke. There the forreſts are free from ſauage beaſts, and the ground void of noiſome ſerpents: in whoſe ſtead an infinite multitude of tame cattle there are, with their vdders ſtrutting ful of milke, and loden with fleeces to the ground. And verily (that which for the vſe of our liues wee moſt eſteeme) the daies are therein very long, and the nights neuer without ſome light, for that thoſe vtmoſt plaines by the ſea ſide caſt and raiſe no ſhadowes on high; and the aſpect both of skie and ſtarres paſſeth beyond the bound of the night: yea the very Sunne it ſelfe, which vnto vs ſeemeth for to ſet, appeareth there only to paſſe by a little, and goe aſide.

Panegyric. to Conſtantius.

In Britaine neither exceſſiue cold of winter, nor extreme heat of ſummer. Britaine abounding with all plentie of foode for mans ſuſtenance and delight.

Britaines nights neuer without ſome light.

And in another, ſpoken to Conſtantius, the father of Conſtantine the Great, thus is ſaid:

Though BRITAINE be but a ſingle name, yet ſurely the States loſſes haue beene manifold, in forgoing a Land ſo plentifull in fruit and graine, ſo rich in paſturage, ſo full of mines and veines of metall, ſo gainfull in tributes and reuenewes, ſo accommodated with many hauens, and for circuit ſo large and ſpacious.

Panegyr. ſpoken to Conſtantius.

BRITAINE full of mines of metals.

And a Poet of good antiquity, of natures motherly affection towards this our Iland, hath thus written:

Tu nimio nec ſtricta gelu, nec ſydere feruens,
Clementi cælo temperiéque places.
Cùm pareret Natura parens, varióque fauore
Diuideret dotes omnibus vna locis,
Sepoſuit potiora tibi, matrémque profeſſa,
Inſula ſis fœlix, plenáque pacis, ait.
Quicquid amat luxus, quicquid deſiderat vſus,
Ex te proueniet, vel aliunde tibi.
Nor freezing cold, nor ſcorching hot thou art;
Thy aire a heauenly temper, ſweetly breath'd:
So pleas'd Dame Nature when ſhe firſt bequeath'd
To euery ſoile of her rich gifts a part;
Then Mother-like beſt choice for thee ſhe ſought:
Be thou (quoth ſhe) the bleſſed Ile of peace.
What euer pleaſure yeelds, or wealths increaſe,
From thee ſhall grow, or ſhall to thee be brought.

Remaynes.

(11) And that BRITAINE hath beene taken for thoſe fortunate Ilands whereof the Poets haue imagined a perpetuall ſpring time, is certaine by Iſacius Tzetzes a Greeke Author of good account. And in Robert of Auesburie wee read, what time Pope Clement the ſixth had elected Lewis of Spaine to be Prince of the Fortunate Ilands, raiſing him powers both in Italie and France, the Engliſh Ligier Embaſſadours, that lay then in Rome for King Edward the third, were ſo deepely ſet in the opinion, that this preparation was made againſt BRITAINE, that they wrote their ſuſpicions conceiued, and preſently with-drew themſelues into England, to certifie the King of theſe deſignes. And it ſeemeth Pope Innocent the fourth was of the ſame minde, when (as Matth. Pariſ. writeth) hee ſaid, Verè hortus deliciarum eſt Anglia: verè puteus inexhauſtus eſt: Et vbi multa abundant, de multis multa multa possint extorqueri, &c. Certes the Kingdome of England is the very Paradise of pleasures, a Well which can neuer bee drawen drie: where many things doe abound, and whence many things may bee extorted, &c. With which his conceit he was afterward so farre transported with a longing desire, as hee made great meanes and earnest suit to the King of England (as the said Author writeth, ad ann. 1250.) that hee might come into England to see that Country which was euery where so much renowned. In a word, BRITAINE is so rich in commodities, so beautifull in situation, and so resplendent in all glory, that if the Omnipotent (as one hath said) had vouchsafed to fashion the world round like a ring, as he did like a globe, it might haue beene most worthily the onely Gemme therein. Whose Vallies are like Eden: whose Hilles are as Lebanon: whose Springs are as Pisgah: whose Riuers are as Iordan: whose Walles is the Ocean: and whose defense is the Lord IEHOVAH.

BRITAINE sustained at once no lesse then 11. Kings commanding great powers.

(12) The body then of this Imperiall Monarchie sheweth not onely the greatnesse of it selfe in it selfe, but also extendeth her beautifull branches into many other Countries and Kingdomes farre iacent and remote. This greatnesse is made the more sensible, for that the Iland in times past sustained at once no lesse then eleuen Kings in their royall estates, all of them wearing Crownes, and commanding great powers. Such was the Heptarchie of the Saxons seuen Kingdomes, seated on the South of Seuerius his Wall. Two Kingdomes thence had their sites in that Northerne part, and their seuerall Kings of Scots and Picts ruling on both sides the Clude, euen vnto the Deucaledonian Seas. And two Kingdomes (if not more) diuided into North and South, and their Kings of the ancient Britaines ruling the West part of this Iland beyond the Clewdh Offa, or Offa his Ditch, commonly called WALES.

(13) The Ilands likewise belonging to this Empire had Kings of their owne, as that of Man, the Orcades, and in Ireland at one time fiue Kings raigning together. France also is annexed, and so was Cyprus sometimes with some Prouinces of Syria, subdued by King Richard the first, surnamed Cœur-de-lion. And at this present in the new World of America a Colonie of BRITAINES is seated in that part now called VIRGINEA; whereby the borders of our Soueraignes command and most rightfull title may bee inlarged, & the Gospell of Iesus Christ further preached, which no doubt will in time be imbraced, to the saluation of many, and great honour to the BRITAINES. And that the borders of this most roiall Tent haue beene wide spread in former times, White of Basingstocke is of opinion, who affirmeth that the limits of the British Empire in old time was from the Orcades vnto the Pyrenean Mountaines. And that King Athelstan after his conquest of those Northerne parts with that of Denmarke wrote so his title: which further is confirmed by the Charter of King Edgar for the foundation of the Cathedrall Church at Worcester, wherein likewise he so stiled himselfe. The inlargement whereof we pray to be accomplished, especially in those parts where God is not knowen, according to the saying of the Prophet, that the curtaines of our habitations may bee further spread, with increase on the right hand and on the left: and that our seed may possesse those GENTILES, and dwell in their Cities: whereby the ninth Nation may bee conuerted vnto CHRIST, as eight others before this time by English-men haue beene.

THE NAMES THAT HAVE BEENE ATTRIBVTED VNTO THIS ILAND OF GREAT BRITAINE.

CHAPTER II.

AS touching the first Inhabitants and originall Names of this Iland, things so farre cast into the mistie darknesse of obscuritie and obliuion, that there is no hope left vs, so lately born, to discouer them; especially knowing that the first Inhabitants being meerely barbarous, neuer troubled themselues with care to transmit their Originals to posteritie: neither if they would, could haue done, being without Letters, which only doe preserue and transferre knowledge vnto others. And say they had letters, yet was it not lawfull for them to commit their affaires to writing, as Cesar doth testifie of the Druides, the only wise and learned men among them, that had the managing both of Iustice and religious Rites. And had they committed these things to writing, yet doubtlesse had they perished in the reuolutions of so many ages as are passed, and so many conuersions or euersions of the State. Gildas and Ninius, the Britaines first Historians, confesse plainly, that they had no vnderstanding of the ancient affaires of this Iland, but from forraine Writers; and neither that aboue two hundred and odde yeeres before the birth of our Sauiour Christ. At which time Polybius a most graue Writer, and an attendant vpon Scipio, saith, that the Regions Northward from Narbona (as this is) were vtterly vnknowen; and whatsoeuer was written or reported of them, was but a dreame. And therefore vntill such time as the Romane Writers reach foorth their hands to direct vs, wee shall wander, as without a guide, and shall seeme to heape more rubbish vpon former ruines.

The first Inhabiters of this Iland being meerely barbarous, neuer troubled themselues to transmit their Originals to posteritie.

(2) Yet let this bee granted, that the Originall names of Countries and Prouinces were first assumed from their possessors, whereof Iosephus in the seuenth Chapter of his first Booke of Antiquities is a sufficient Witnesse, who in the dispersion of Noahs sonnes and his nephewes, nameth the Countries according to their families. So did the children of Dan name Laish after their father: Iair his Cities that he conquered in the Land of Gilead: and Iudea from Iudah whose King was of him. And that this also was the practise of the Gentiles, Perionius doth shew, who saith, that himselfe knew no Nation in the earth, which would not haue their names either from their Prince, Captaine, or King: the example whereof hee inserteth, that Spaine was so named from Hispalus, Italy from Italus, and the like.

(3) And accordingly from Samothes the sixth sonne of Iapheth (whom Moses calleth Mesech) the brother of Gomer, and of Iauan, whose seed is said in the tenth of Genesis to haue repleniished the Iles of the Gentiles,

The credit of this Samothes and his Samothea ariseth only from a smal and new pamphlet, bearing the name of Berosus the Chaldean.

Albion, from Albina the beautifull daughter of Dioclesian.

Gentiles, is brought by some Authors into this Iland, the yeere after the generall Flood two hundred fiftie and two, where he seated, and gaue Lawes to his people, and left to his posteritie the name thereof to bee called Samothea, after his owne. But sith the credit of this Samothes and his Samothea ariseth onely from a small and new pamphlet, bearing the name of Berosus the Chaldean, bolstred out vnder a shew of aged Antiquitie, and thrust into the world vnder the countenance of the ancient Historian himselfe: I meane not to enforce, seeing my purpose is to expose this most beautifull Iland in her owne beseeming attire, and not deformed by these rotten and patched ragges. And of this forged Berosus we haue better cause to vpbraid Iohannes Annius his Countenancer and Commenter, then the Egyptian Priests had to twit Solon, in accusing the Grecians, that for historie had not attained to the yeeres of a gray head. For it exceeds not much one hundred and twenty yeeres since the same booke first appeared in the world; and then vehemently suspected as fabulous by Lodouicus Viues, and afterwards conuicted by the learned Gaspersus Varrerius in a seuerall treatise, and now vniuersally reiected of all skilfull Antiquaries.

(4) But the name ALBION is better receiued, being found so tearmed of the Grecians in ancient time, as in the booke De Mundo, written to Alexander, and supposed to be Aristotles, Pliny in his Naturall Historie, Ptolomie, Strabo, and others: yet vpon what ground it should bee so called there arise many coniectures. Pomponius Mela, Nicolas Perottus, Rigmanus Philesius, Aristotle, and Humfrey Lhuyd, deriue it from Albion Mareoticus a Giant, and sonne of Neptune, that conquered (as they say) these Samotheans, and seated himselfe in this Iland the yeere after the Flood three hundred thirty fiue. And if that be true which Perottus and Lilius Giraldus haue written, then may this Albion giue name to this Iland. Notwithstanding, Strabo, Munster, and Frier Bartholomew, will haue it so named ab albis rupibus, of the rockes and white clifts appearing towards the coasts of France; which carrieth the more likelihood through the credit of Orpheus a most ancient Poet, who in his Argonauticks (if so be they were his) calleth the Iland next vnto Hibernia or Hernin, which questionlesse is this of ours, λευκὴ χέρσος, that is, the white Land. And accordingly haue the Welsh Poets called it Inis Wen. And this is further confirmed from Cicero, who termeth these whitish clifts mirificas moles; as also by the anticke Coines of Antonius Pius and Seuerus the Romane Emperours, whereon BRITAINE is stamped in a womans attire sitting vpon rocks. And the same being chalkie, or of a plaster-like substance, Fracastorius supposeth was the cause of the sweating sickenesse, and whereof Albion had the name. Vnlesse some will deriue it from Alphon, which as Festus saith, doth signifie white in Greeke; or Olbion, rich or happie, in regard of the fertilitie of the soile, wholesome temperature of the aire, and the rich commodities in the same: either from Albion for the high situation. But from the Latine albis rupibus it could not bee deriued, when that language was vnknowen to the world. Marianus the Monke, Iohn Rous, Dauid Pencair, and William Caxton, from others more ancient, doe fetch the name thereof from Albina the beautifull daughter of Diocleſian King of Syria, who with her sisters, thirty in number, for the slaughter of their husbands, were banished their Countrey, and without man, oares, or tackles, were committed to the mercy of the Seas, who after many aduentures, lastly arriued vpon this shoare, where they inhabited, and gaue name to this Iland, calling it Albion after the name of their eldest sister: and accompanying with Diuels, brought foorth a progenie of Giants, if we will beleeue the Legend of this most impudent lier, which is worthily reiected by Badius, Volateranus, Harding, Bale, John Rous, and others. But that the name Albion was both of great acceptance and long continuance, is apparent by the worthy Epitheton of King Edgar the Saxon, who in his Charter for the foundation of the Abbie of Ely, hath these words: Ego Edgarus Basileus dilecta Insula Albionis, subditis nobis sceptris Scotorum, Cumbrorum, & omnium circumcirca Regionum, quieta pace fruens, &c. By which hee knitteth the whole Iland together, as a Land worthily to be beloued, and calleth it ALBION.

The name Albion reteined in the Charters of some of our latter Kings.

(5) The next name ascribed vnto this Iland is BRITAINE, and that first found and giuen by the Grecians, who were the first discouerers of these Westerne parts of the world: either from their painted bodies, as their neighbours (if not ancestours) the Gaules were named of their long shaggie haire, or of their rich metals therein gotten, and thence carried in abundance into other Countries; or from Brute, that with his dispersed Troians conquered it, as he of Monmouth hath translated; or what occasion soeuer, I dispute not: only it feares me I shall giue but small satisfaction to the desirous Reader, of the cause and originall of this name, being consorted with so many vncertainties, wherein the further we follow this intangled threed, the further are we lead into the Labyrinth of ambiguitie. But as Plutarch, Liuy, and other Latine Writers haue complained of the many fictions and fables of Poets intermingled with the histories of truth, whereby truth it selfe was often made incredible; so we in rehearsing the diuers names of Britannie, and the reasons thereof by sundry Writers alleged, rest free in our relations, either from impeaching the power of Antiquitie, or approouing those things that are as yet wrapped vp in Times Obliuions, leauing the credit to them that haue left the same vnto vs, and the censure of their opinions to the iudgement of the learned, and those of better experience.

BRITAINE, The Grecians first named this Iland by ỹ name BRITAINE.

Ieffrey ap Arthur.

How this Iland came to haue the name Britannia is very vncertaine.

The fainings of Poets haue bred mistrust in many true histories.

(6) The vulgar receiued opinion, held on with foure hundred yeeres continuance, (some few mens exceptions had against the same) is, that this Iland tooke the name of Britannia from Brute the sonne of Syluius, of whom more shall bee spoken in the next Chapter for the peopling of this Iland, and from whom some (following a suspected Gildas) doe write the name Brutaine: for so doth Hierome, who translating Aethicus that excellent Scythian Philosopher, calleth both this and the Ilands adiacent, Insulas Brutanicas. But besides the many obiections made both by forraine and home-bred Writers, that seeme to make the storie of Brute doubtfull, Humfrey Lhuyd a Cambre-Britaine, a learned and diligent searcher of Antiquities, doth confidently deny the name Britaine to be taken from Brute; and among many other obseruations, makes this an infallible argument, that the letter B. is not the first radicall of that name; and affirmeth boldly, that there is not any British word whose first radicall letter is B. And therefore hee will haue it to be anciently written PRYDCAIN, compounded of two British words, PRYD and CAIN, which signifie (as he saith) Beauty and White; the C. being lost in the latter word, for the more easie pronuntiation in the British tongue; and the P. in the former changed into B. by the Latines, for the more gentle and pleasant sounds sake: so that himselfe thinketh, that those learned and expert men in the British tongue, which wrote the Ilands name with B. doe therein rather follow the Latines, then iudging that to bee the true name indeed: for proofe whereof hee citeth both ancient Copies and Traditions of their owne old Poets the Bardi, by whom (saith he) it was vsually called Prydain, as the fittest denomination for so beautifull a Land. But if either colour or commodities were her Godfathers at the font-stone, why was she not rather named The Palace of Queene Ceres, as old Orpheus termes her; either Insula florum, as it hath beene found written in a very ancient manu-script? And yet to second this his conceited name, I finde recorded by Bishop Cooper, a learned Writer, that which makes for that purpose. At Euychurch (saith he) two miles from Salisburie, in the digging downe of a wall, a booke containing twenty leaues of very thicke velome was found, which from the hands of Master Richard Pace, chiefe Secretarie to the King, I receiued; but being sore defaced, could read no one sentence thorow; thorow, yet did I well perceiue the word PRYTANIA, (not called so, from the adiuncts white and Beauteous) but rather from the Greeke word Πρυτανία Prytania, which as he saith, doth signifie mettals. For the Grecians flourishing in wisedome, and experience, entred the Ocean, and finding this Iland full of Brasse, Tynne, Lead, Iron, Gold, and Siluer gaue name thereunto accordingly and called it Prytania. Thus farre he. And some in regard of these rich commodities thence brought, will haue it named Britannia, as vpon like occasion Vibius Sequester affirmeth Calabria sometimes to haue beene so called. Others, and those many, do hold a more strange opinion, namely, that this Iland was called Britannia of Bretta a Spanish word which signifieth Earth, for that it was separated from the maine land, and, say they, it was once ioined with the continent of France. Of this opinion are Antonius Volscus, Dominicus Marius Niger, Seruius Honoratus, Vinianus, Bodine, Twyne, and Verstegan. But how that name from that separation may be gathered I vnderstand not: for if it be granted, that this Iland also was cut from the continent (as it is thought all others in the world were,) by the violent rage of the vniuersall floud, yet it followeth not, that this only should claime that name, and from that occasion, more then any other, or then all of them so diuided and set apart in the maine Ocean. Others there are that would haue the name Britaine to bee brought from Britona a Nymph in Greece, daughter to Mars, who (as they say) to auoid the lasciuious intents of Minos, forsooke the country, and passing the seas ariued in this Iland and by her the name arose, this hath Textor. But I might as well cite Calepine for his Anglia, and Marianus for his Albina, being all fables consorting alike together, and fictions of the same authority that Virgils Dido is. Hesychius deriueth the name Britaine from Britannus the father of Celtice on whom Hercules begat Celtus the originall of the Celtæ as Parthenius Nicæus a very ancient author writeth. And Sir Thomas Eliot a learned Knight draweth the name of this Iland from the Greek fountaine also, but of other signification, viz. Πρυτανία Prutania, by which terme the Athenians signified their publike reuenues, and yet that is iustly excepted against, seeing that it is a peculiar terme only to the Athenians, and that the Grecians called this Iland Πρυτανία not Πρυτανία Goropius Becanus in his Originall of Antwerp saith, that the Danes sought here to plant themselues, and so named this Iland Bridania, that is, free Denmarke. And others deriue it from Prutenia a country in Germany. But that both these are fictions it manifestly appeareth, for that this Iland was famous by the name of Britaine many hundred yeeres before that either Dania or Prutania were heard of in the world.

Pomponius Letus would haue it Briton, and that name giuen it from the Britons in France. Indeed it is probable, that from the Celtes, the old Gaules, our originals descended: but that the name should come of them hath no colour of truth, seeing that those Britons came from vs, and not we from them: and in Cæsars time that coast was called Armorica, but this of ours Britaine. Forcatulus deriueth the name thereof from Brithin a drinke, which as Athenæus saith was vsed among the Greeks. And others will haue it from the Bruty a roauing and stragling people in Italy: both which are accounted but idle conceits and for no lesse we will leaue them. White of Basingstocke will haue the name thereof deriued from an Hebrew word, and Isidore from a word of her own language. Thus then is Britanny burthened with many titles vnder one truth; and these are the ascriptions, causes and exceptions, as far as we are able to gather: all which must giue place to that which is to follow out of the painfull collections and iudicious obseruances of our illustruous Antiquarie Master Cambden. Whose words I will abridge, and by his good fauour bring to furnish this chapter, and further to satisfie the vnsatisfied Reader.

(7) This then he holdeth for granted, that ancient nations in the beginning had names of their own: and that after from these the Greeks and Latines by wresting them to the analogie or proportion of their speech, imposed names vpon Regions and countries, which tooke their denominations from their people and in-dwellers. So Iewry was named from the Iewes, Media from the Medes, Persia of the Persians, Scythia of the Scythians, &c. And why not then by the authority of Martial, Iuuenal, Ausonius, Procopius, and in old inscriptions set vp by the Britaines themselues, BRITTA, BRITO, BRITONES, BRITTVS, from BRIT, or BRITH, from whom any one being of that nation might be termed NATIONE BRITTO, as is seene so inscribed in Saint Mary the Round at Rome? The Saxons likewise themselues called the Britains Bpiop, and Witichindas the Saxon euerie where nameth the Britaines Britæ: so that the word BRIT is doubtlesse the Primitiue, from whence BRITTO is deriued, and from whence the first glimpse of light leading to the word BRITAINE, seemeth to appeare. And that all nations deuised their names of that, wherein they either excelled others, or were knowen by from others, whether in regard of their first founders honor, as the Iones of Iauan, the Israelites of Israel, the Cananites of Canaan; or whether in respect of their nature, conditions, and inclinations; as the Iberi after the Hebrew Etymologie because they were Miners; the Heneti because they were straglers; the Nomades for that they were breeders of Cattell; the Almanes for their esteemed valour and manhood; the Frankners for being free; the Pannonians, as Dio conceiteth, of their coats with cloth-sleeues; the Aethiopians of their blacke hue: and the Albanes because they were borne with white haire, for so saith Solinus, that the colour of their heads gaue name vnto the people. Seeing then that these our Ilanders were known and called by a name common to both them and their neighbors, Cimbri or Cumeri, and had no better marke to be distinguished and knowen from the borderers; then by their custome of painting their bodies, whereof the most approued authors doe witnesse, as Cæsar, Mela, Pliny, Martial and others, who affirme that the Britanes vsed to colour themselues with woad, called in the Latine glastum (and Glase at this day with them doth signifie blew) what if I then should coniecture (saith he) that they were called Britains from this their painted bodies? for what is thus stained or coloured, in their ancient country speech is called BRITH. Neither let this Etymologie of Britains seeme to be either harsh or absurd, seeing the very words sound alike, and the name also as an expresse image representeth the thing which in Etymologies are chiefly required: for Brith, and Brit, doe passing well accord: And the word Brith among the Britaines, implieth that which the Britans were indeed, to wit, painted, stained, died, and coloured, as the Latine poets describe them: hauing their backes pide or medly coloured, as Oppianus termeth them. From which colours and vse of painting, the ancient Britaines (as he thinketh) had their names, and as yet in vse among the Welsh. But this is certaine that a Britain is called in the British tongue BRITHON, and as BRITO came of BRITH, so did BRITANNIA, who as Isidore saith tooke the name from a word of their owne nation: for what time the ancient Greeks (that first gaue name to this Iland) either as rouers or merchants trauelled into other remote and farre disioined countries (as Eratosthenes reporteth) learned from the Inhabitants themselues, or els of the Gaules which spake the same language, that this our nation was called Brith and Brithon: They then vnto the word BRITH, added TANIA, which in the Greek Glossaries betokeneth a REGION, and whereof they made a compound name Βριτανία, that is, the BRITONS-LAND. And that this is so, the countries also lying in the West part of the world, as Mauritania, Lusitania, and Aquitania, doe sufficiently confirme: for the Grecians being the first Surueiors of those regions, of Mauri, whom Strabo saith was called Numidia, made Mauritania; of Lusus the sonne of Bacchus, Lusitania, and of Aquis (waters, as Iuo Carnotensis is of opinion) called the country Aquitania: as also Turditania, and Bastinania, Prouinces in Spain, might arise from the Turdi, and Basti their possessors. And that this manner of composition is most vsuall in the names of countries we see: For came not Ireland by composition of the Irish word Erim? Did not Angle terre grow together of an English and French word and became England, Doth not Franc-lond proceed from a French and Saxon word? Came not Poleland from a Polonian word, which with them betoketh a plaine? and was not Denmarch compounded of Dan and the Dutch word March, which signifieth a bound or limit? Neither haue we cause to wonder at this Greek addition TANIA, seeing that S. Hierome in his questions upon Genesis, proued out of most ancient Authors, that the Greekes inhabited along the sea coasts and Iles of Europe thorowout as far as to this our Iland. Let vs read, saith he, Varroes bookes of Antiquities, and those of Sisinius Capito, as also the Greeke writer Phlegon, with the rest of the great learned men, and we shall see, all the Ilands well neere, and all the sea coasts of the whole world, to haue been taken vp with Greek inhabitants, who, as I said before, from the mountaines Amanus and Taurus euen to the British Ocean, possessed all the parts along the sea side. And verely, that the Greeks ariued in this our region, viewed and considered well the site and nature thereof, there will be no doubt nor question made: if we obserue what Athenæus hath written concerning Phileas Taurominites who was in Britaine in the yeere one hundred and sixty before Cæsars comming: if we call to remembrance the Altar with an inscription vnto Vlysses in Greek letters, erected in Caledonia as Solinus saith, and lastly if we marke what Pytheas before the time of the Romans here, hath deliuered and written as touching the distance of Thule from Britaine. For who had euer discouered vnto the Greeks, Britain, Thule, the Belgick countries, and their sea coasts especially, if the Greek ships had not entred the British and German Ocean, yea and related the description therof vnto their Geographers? Had Pytheas, thinke you, come to the knowledge of six daies sailing beyond Britaine, vnlesse some of the Greeks had shewed the same? Who euer told them of Scandia, Bergos and Nerigon, out of which men may saile into Thule? And these names seem to haue been better knowen vnto the most ancient Greeks, then either to Pliny or to any Roman. Whereupon Mela testifieth, that Thule was much mentioned and renowned in Greek writers: Pliny likewise writeth thus; Britain an Iland famous in the monuments and records both of the Greeks and of vs. By this meanes therefore, so many Greeke words haue crept into the British, French, and withall into the Belgick or Low-Dutch language. And if Lazarus Bayfius, and Budæus doe make their vant and glory in this, that their French-men haue been of old φιλολογοι that is, louers and studious of the Greeks, grounding their reason vpon few French words of that Idiome, which receiue some marks and tokens of the Greek tongue: if Hadrianus Iunius ioyeth no lesse, because in the Belgick words there lie couertly Greek Etymologies: then may the Britains make their boast in whose language many words there be deriued from the Greeks. Which name we find first mentioned by Polybius the Greeks historian, who liued and traueled with Scipio thorow most parts of Europe, about 265. yeers before the birth of Christ. And after him Athenæus a Greek authour of good account, and before the yeere of grace 179. mentioneth the name of Britaine, and that vpon this occasion: King Hiero, saith he, framing a ship of such hugenesse and burden, as was admirable to the world, was much troubled for a tree, whereof he might make the maine mast: which at last with much adoe was found in Britaine, by the direction of a Swineheard: and by Phileas Taurominites the Mechanick conueied into Sicilie, whereby that want was sufficiently supplied. To this let not the Criticks from Cæsar say, that Britaine brought foorth neither Beech nor Firre, as he in his fift book of commentaries affirmeth (if by fagus he meane the Beech) seeing that the same kind doth most plentifully grow in all parts of this Iland, and the Firre-trees for masts in the North west of Scotland vpon the bankes of the Lough argicke of such great height and thicknesse, that at the root they beare 28. handfuls about, and the bodies mounted to 90. foot of height they beare at that length 20. inches Diametre, as hath been measured by some in commission, & so certified to his Maiesty: and at this present growing vpon the lands of the right worthy Knight Sir Alexander Hayes, his Maiesties principal Secretay for Scotland.

(8) Other names hath this Iland beene termed by, and that either by way of note for her situation, as Insula Cæruli, the Iland in the Sea, so written in the sonet or parodia made against Ventidius Bassus, and by Claudian confirmed, whose fides (saith hee) the azure Sea doth wash. And in a very ancient manuscript it is found written, Insula florum, an Iland of flowers, for the abundance of Graine therein growing: as also for her subiection to the Romanes, hath beene called by Aegisippus, the Romane World, and by her owne Historian Gildas, Romania: for being first subdued by them, the very name of seruitude (saith he) stucke fast to the soile. And Prosperus Aquitanis in expresse words calleth it, the Romane Iland, and so did the South-saiers when the statues of Tacitus and Florianus the Emperours were by lightning ouerthrowen, who prophecied, that an Emperour should arise out of their familie, that should send a Pro-consull to the Romane Iland. Vpon the like cause of conquest and subiection we read in Amianus, that what time the Iland had assaied a dangerous reuolt in the raigne of Valentinianus the Emperor, Theodosius as then Gouernor of Britaine, reducing them vnder their wonted obedience, in honor of Valentinianus, caused the Iland to bee called VALENTIA, which name notwithstanding died either with, or immediately after the death of the said Emperour.

(9) But about the same time, when as by Gods decree the Romanes fulnesse was come to the wane, and the greatnesse of their glory did abate; by the downefall of that one Empire many Kingdomes beganne to arise, and to haue their Rulers, Lawes, and Limits of themselues. Among the rest, this Iland Britaine shortlie came to be diuided into three seuerall Kingdomes, and each of them to retaine an absolute power in their owne dominions, and knowen by their seuerall and proper names. The first was Scotland from Scotia, and that from Scythia, as the best suppose, whose Southerne bounds was the famous Wall from Carlile to Newcastle, and from thence the enorme tract of all that Northerne promontorie was called Scotia, or Scotland. The second was Cambria, of vs called Wales, sited in the West of this Iland, inclosing those waste mountaines with a ditch drawen from Basingwarke in Flint-shire in the North, to the mouth of Wye neere Bristoll in the South, so separated by great Offa the Mercian King. And the third was Angle-lond, the East, the most fruitfull, and best of the Iland, lying coasted with the French and Germane Seas; so named when the vnited Heptarchie of the Saxons was ruled by King Egbert, who by his edict dated at Winchester, Anno 819. commanded the same to bee called Angle-lond, according to the name of the place from whence his ancestors the Angle-Saxons came, which was out of the continent part of Denmarke, lying betwixt Iuitland and Holsatia, where to this day the place retaineth the name Engloen. And therefore Calepine is to be reiected, that would haue the name from Queene Angela, and Goropius, of good Anglers; either from Pope Gregorie his attribute of Angell-like faces; or from others that would faine it from Angula the Giant-like brother to Danus; or force it from Angulus Orbis.

This Iland diuided in to three kingdomes.

The first, Scotland, whose partition southward is from Carlile to Newcastle.

The second. Cambria or Wales, whose partition is from Basingwark to Wye.

The third. Angle-lond coasted with the French and German Seas.

This Iland named Angle-lond of a place in Denmarke called Engloen.

Gregorie 1.

(10) Neither indeed was it called England before the daies of Canutus the Dane; but with Angle-land, retained still the names both of Albion and Britaine, as in a Saxon Charter made by King Edgar the tenth in succession from Egbert, and no lesse then one hundred forty and nine yeeres after this Edict is seene, where in the beginning he stileth himselfe thus: Ego Edgar totius Albionis Basileus, &c. And in the end of the same charter thus: Edgar Rex totius Britannia Donoconens, nem tum figillo S. Crucis confirmat. And yet vpon his Coines wrote himselfe Rex Anglii, whereby wee see the reliish of the former names not vtterly extinct, though a new was imposed by the Saxons.

This Iland not called England before the daies of Canutus the Dane.

This Iland vsually called both Angle-lond, Albion, and Britain, before Canutus daies.

The name England not changed either by the Dane or Normane Conquerours.

(11) This last name this Iland still retained, though two seuerall Conquests of two seuerall Nations were made of the same. Neither did William the Conquerour attempt to alter it, it sounding belike so Angel-like in his eares, accounting himselfe most happie to be King of so worthy a Kingdome: the glorie whereof is further inlarged by the ranking of Christian nations, assembled in their generall Councels, wherein England is accounted the fifth, and hath place of presidencie before kingdomes of larger territories.

Hath the fifth place in all Generall Councels.

This name of England continued for the space of seuen hundred eighty and three yeeres, vnto the coming in of our Soueraigne Lord King IAMES, in anno 1602. who by the hand of GOD hath vnited all these Diademes into one Imperiall Crowne, and reduced the many Kingdomes in one Iland, vnder the gouernment of one Monarch: and after the manifold conquests, irruptions, and dissensions, hath settled an eternall amitie; and extinguishing all differences of names, hath giuen the whole Iland the ancient name of GREAT BRITAINE, by his Edict dated at Westminster, quartring the royal Armes of his seuerall Kingdomes in one royall Scutchion, and for his motto, as is most meet,

BEATI PACIFICI.

Hath continued and kept the name England the space of seuen hundred eighty and three yeeres.

Now reduced to the name of Great Britaine.

CHAPTER III.

Britaine replenished with people before Noahs flood.

IT is not to bee doubted, but that this Iland with the Vniuersall was replenished with people, immediately after that men began to be multiplied vpon the earth, euen in the daies of the former Patriarkes, and long before the Flood of Noah, as sundrie ancient Writers haue related. And surely if wee consider in those first ages of the world the long life of man (the only meanes to multiplication) and the worlds continuance for one thousand six hundred fiftie and six yeeres before it was destroied, wee shall easily yeeld, that euery Country and corner of the earth was plentifully peopled and inhabited. And so much doe the Sacred Scriptures intimate vnto vs, where, by the Prophet Esay it is said, Thus saith the Lord, that created heauen; God himselfe, that framed the earth, and made it: he hath prepared it; he created it not in vaine; he formed it to be inhabited.

Isa.45.18.

(2) But when the wrath of GOD was executed vpon the world for sinne, and all ouer-whelmed with a Flood of waters, the whole earth thereby became altogether vnpeopled, eight persons only with the breed reserued creatures saued in the floting Arke: Whose Port or Hauen was the mountaine of Araret in Armenia; whence, with the blessing of procreation, mankinde againe began to be multiplied vpon the earth; and from the confusion of Babels building, to be scattered by Tribes and Colonies, according to the diuersitie of Languages, into diuers parts and Countries of the world, giuing names to the places where they seated, according to the names of their Princes, or chiefe Commanders. Amongst whom the sonnes of Iapheth the eldest sonne of Noah (whom Moses declareth to haue peopled the Isles of the Gentiles) betooke themselues into Europe, these westerne parts of the world: as Sem did into Asia, and Cham into Africa: whose posterities accordingly dispersed Iosephus in his first Booke of Antiquities hath both branched into their seuerall diuisions, and reduced them to their first roots and originals.

(3) Now that the Iles of the Gentiles mentioned by Moses, were these of Europe, all learned men confesse: and therefore those especially of Britannie and Sicilie, as Wolfangus Musculus is of opinion. And that Europe fell to Iaphets portion, Iosephus and Isidore doe agree: who affirme his off-spring to haue inhabited from the Mount Taurus all Europe Northward, so farre as the British Seas, leauing names both to places and people. And Gildas, as Nubrigensis witnesseth, and Polydore Virgil granteth, will haue this Iland inhabited euen from the Flood. But of these ancient things, saith Sebastian Munster, no man can write certainly, it depending only vpon coniecturals, and the same by heare-say, and flying reports of priuate men, as Origen speaketh.

For so iudgeth a learned Britain himselfe, who saith his countrimen the Welsh which are vnlearned, as yet know no other name for their land and people, but only Cumbri.

(5) And that of these Gomerians were also the Gaules, learned Clarenceaux that brightest lampe to all Antiquities, out of Iosephus and Zonaras sufficiently hath obserued; who that they were also called Cimbri, he proueth out of Cicero, & Appian Alexandrinus; that those Barbarians whom Marius defeated, Cicero plainly termeth Gaules, where he saith C. Marius represt the armies of the Gaules, entring in great numbers into Italy: which, as all Historians witnesse, were the Cimbrians. And the Habergeon of their king Beleus digged vp at Aqua Sextiæ, where Marius put them to flight, doth shew the same: whereon was engrauen in strange characters BELBOS CIMBROS; as also the testimony of Lucan doth no lesse, who calleth the Ruffine hired to kill Marius, a Cimbrian, whom Liuy and Plutarch in the life of Marius affirme to be a Gaule. They also who vnder the conduct of Brennus spoiled Delphi in Greece, were Gaules, as all writers with one voice agree; and yet that these were named Cimbri, Appian in his Illyricks doth doth teſtifie. And for Brennus their Grand-Captaine, our Hiſtorians report him to be a Britaine: as likewiſe Virgil (though in taunting wiſe) termeth that Grammarian the Britaine Thucydides, whom Quintilian affirmes to be a Cimbrian.

The Turkes, the Iones, Medes, and Thracians come of Noahs nephewes.

(6) And if of the reſt of Noahs nephewes, ſeated in ſeuerall countries, the Nations proceeding from them, are knowen by their originall names, as the Turkes of Togorma, whom the Iewes to this day ſo terme, the Iones from Iauan, the Medes from Madai, the Thracians from Tiras, and ſo of the reſt, whoſe names as yet ſound not much vnlike to their firſt planters; why then ſhall not we thinke, that our Britanes or Cumerians, are the very of-ſpring of Gomer, and of Gomer tooke their denomination, the name ſo neere according? Sith granted it is, that they planted themſelues in the vtmoſt borders of Europe, as Iſodore hath ſaid. For the Ark reſting in Armenia, and the people thence flowing like waters from the ſpring, repleniſhed thoſe parts firſt that lay next their ſite: as Aſia the leſſe, and Greece before Italy: Italy before Gaule, and Gaule before Britaine. And if we conſider the occaſions, that might be offered, either for disburdening the multitudes of people, for conqueſt, deſire of noueltie, ſmalneſſe of diſtance, or commodities of the aire and ſoile, we may eaſily conceiue this Iland to haue been peopled from thence. For it ſtandeth with ſenſe that euery country receiued their firſt inhabitants from places neere bordering, rather then from them that lay more remote: for ſo was Cyprus peopled out of Aſia, Sicile and Candie out of Greece; Corſica and Sardinia, out of Italy, Zeland out of Germany, Iſland out of Norway, and ſo of the reſt. Now that Britaine had her firſt inhabitants from Gaule, ſufficiently is proued by the name, ſite, religion, manners, and languages, by all which the moſt ancient Gaules and Britaines haue beene as it were linked together in ſome mutuall ſociety; as is at large proued by our Arch-Antiquary in his famous worke, to which I refer the ſtudious reader.

(7) And although the inner parts of the Iland were inhabited, as Cæſar ſaith, of ſuch whom they themſelues out of their owne records, report to haue been borne in the Iland: yet the ſea coaſts were peopled by thoſe, who vpon purpoſe to make war, had paſſed thither out of Belgia, and Gaule, who ſtill caried the names of thoſe cities and ſtates, out of which they came: as the Belgæ, the Attrebatij, Pariſi, and the like names of people both in Gaule, and in Britaine, that after the warres there remained. Which is the more confirmed in that both the Prouinces were gouerned by one and the ſame Prince, as Cæſar in his owne remembrance knew, and nameth one Diuitiacus to hold a good part of Gaule, and alſo of Britaine vnder his gouernment. Yea and Tacitus the moſt curious ſearcher into Britaines affaires, in the life of Agricola thus diſciphereth them. Now (ſaith hee) what manner of men the firſt inhabitants of Britannie were, forraine brought in, or borne in the land, as among a barbarous people, it is not certainly knowen. Their complexions are different, and thence may ſome coniectures bee taken: for the red haire of the dwellers in Caledonia, and mighty limmes, import a German deſcent. But generally it is moſt likely, the French being neereſt, did people the Land. In their ceremonies and ſuperſtitious perſwaſions, there is to be ſeene an apparant conformitie. The Language differeth not much: like boldneſſe to challenge and ſet into dangers: when dangers come, like feare in refuſing: ſauing that the Britaines make ſhew of great courage, as being not mollified yet by long peace.

(8) Whereby wee ſee, that theſe Cimbrians (of whom, as Appian Alexandrinus ſaith, came the Celts, and of them the Gaules, as Plutarch in the life of Camillus affirmeth, with whom both Plato and Ariſtotle agree) were the ancient progenitors of theſe our Britaines: and them, with the Gaules, to be both one and the ſame people, is allowed by Pliny, that placeth them both in the continent of France; for ſo Euſtathius in his Commentarie vnderſtandeth Dionyſius Afar, that theſe Britaines in Gaule gaue name to the Iland now called GREAT BRITAINE, as Pomponius Lætus and Beda before him had done. Theſe things conſidered, with the neereneſſe of their ſites for ready entercourſe, made both Ceſar and Tacitus to conceiue as they did. Neither were theſe things following ſmall motiues vnto them: for their religion was alike, ſaith Lucan and Tacitus: their boldneſſe in warres, and maner of armes alike, ſaith Strabo, Tacitus, Dion, Pliny, Herodian, and Mela: Their building alike, ſaith Ceſar and Strabo: their ornaments and manners alike, ſaith Pliny and Ceſar: their wits alike, ſaith Strabo and Tacitus: their language alike, ſaith learned Bodine: and in all things the vnconquered Britaines to the ancient Gaules alike, ſaith Tacitus. And all theſe doe warrant vs (me thinkes) to come from the Cimbrians, whoſe ſonnes, and our fathers, were the Celts and Gaules: the bands of whoſe amities were ſo linked together, that the Britaines gaue aid, and aſsiſted the Gaules againſt Ceſar, which was no ſmall cauſe of his quarrell againſt them.

2887. and after the vniuersall flood 1231. in the eighteenth yeere of Heli his Priesthood in the land of Israel, and before the incarnation of Christ our Sauiour one thousand fifty nine. This Brute is brought from the ancient Troians by descent, yea and from the persons of the heathen deified Gods: as that he was the sonne of Syluius, who was the sonne of Ascanius, the sonne of AEneas, the sonne of Anchises by Venus the Goddesse, and daughter to Iupiter their greatest in account. And if Pliny and Varro hold it praise worthy to challenge descents (though falsly) from famous personages, wherby, as they say, appeareth an inclination to vertue, and a valorous conceit to perswade vnto honor, as sprung from a race diuine and powerfull: then by all meanes let vs listen to him of Monmouth, who hath brought his Nation to ranke in degree with the rest of the Gentiles, which claime themselues to be the Generation of the Gods.

(12) But why do I attribute the worke to him, as the Author, sith he professeth himselfe to be but the translator of that history out of the British tongue, which Walter the Archdeacon of Oxford brought out of Normandie, and deliuered vnto him? For the further confirmation thereof, and more credit to his story, Henry of Huntington, who liued in the time of king Stephen, and wrote likewise the history of this land, bringeth the line of Brute from AEneas the Troiane, and his arriuage and conquest to happen in the time of Heli his Priesthood in the land of Israel, as Geffrey ap Arthur hath also done: not taking (as some thinke) any thing thereof from him, but rather out of an ancient booke intituled De Origine Regum Britannorum, found by himselfe in the library of the Abbey of Bec, as he trauelled towards Rome: which history began at the arriuall of Brute, and ended with the acts of Cadwalader, as by a treatise of his owne inditing, bearing the same title, hath been compared, and found in all things agreeing with our vulgar history, as industrious Lamberd affirmeth himselfe to haue seen. And Ninius is said by the writer of the reformed history, to bring these Britaines from the race of the Troians, foure hundred yeeres before that Geffrey wrote: yea and long before Ninius also, Taliesin a Briton Poet in an Ode called Hanes, of Taiess his course of life, in these words, Mia deythym yma at Wedillion Troia, that is, I came hither to the Remnants of Troy.

Henry of Huntingdon died in Anno 1148.

Henry Huntington also recordeth Brutes line and arriuall in Britaine.

A booke hereof found.

(13) That William of Malmesbury (who wrote in the daies of King Henry the first) was before him of Monmouth, is most certaine; yet doth he make mention of Arthur a Prince (saith he) deseruing rather to be aduanced by the truth of records, then abused by false imputation of fables; being the only prop and vpholder of his country. And Beda, his ancient also, nameth Ambrosius Aurelianus to be King of the Britaines, long before that Geffrey was borne: So was Brennus mentioned by Liuy; Bellinus, (if he be Belgius) by Iustine; Cassibelan by Cæsar; Cunobilin by Suetonius; Aruiragus by Martial; Lucius by Eusebius; Coel, Constantius, Carausius, and others by Eutropius, and Paulus Diaconus; and Helena by Nicephorus, Ambrose, and Socrates. These are the affirmatiues that giue countenance to the Archdeacon of Monmouths translation, and credit to Brutes conquests and successours; yea and Iohn Harding his Herauld, in his home-spun poetry, can easily emblaze his armes to be Gules, charged with two lions rampant endorsed Ore; and the same to be borne by the Kings of Troy. And his banner displaied at his entrance is said to be Vert a Diana of gold fitchel, crowned, and inthronized, the same that AEneas bare, when he entred the land of the Latines. But the censures of these relations I leaue to the best liking of iudicious Readers, only wishing them to be vnlike the inhabitants vnder the rockes of the Cataracts of Nilus, whereof Cicero and Ammianus make mention, who were made deafe by the continuall noise of the fall of Nilus: lest by the sound and loud voices of these writers, the exceptions of others can not be heard, which from the fulnesse of their pennes I will likewise declare, without offence, I hope, vnto any.

Cicero de Som. Scipionis.
Ammianus Marcel. lib. 22. cap. 14.
Histories must be weighed with iudgement.

(14) First (with a reuerend reseruation had to the sacred histories) Varro the most learned Latine writer, diuiding times motions into three seuerall parts, that is, from the creation to the flood, which he termeth altogether vncertaine: from the flood to the first Olympiad (by Beroaldus computation set in the yeere of the world 3154. and thirty one of the raigne of Ioas, king of Iudah: seuen hundred seuenty and foure yeers before the birth of our Sauiour) he calleth fabulous: and the last age from the first Olympiad to himselfe he nameth historicall. Now the story of Brute beginning two hundred sixty seuen yeeres before the first Olympiad, falleth in the time wherein nothing els is related, either of the Greeks or Latines, the only learned writers, but fables and tales, as both himselfe and others haue told vs, much more then, among the barbarous, vnlettred, and vnciuill nations, as all these parts of the world then were.

Times motions diuided into three parts. Beroaldus.

The third only historicall.

The story of Brute fabulous.

(15) Whereupon Gildas our ancientest home-borne writer, (cited and in whole sentences followed by venerable Beda, who termeth him the Britaines historiographer) in this of Brute is silent, and in his lamentable passions neuer dreames of him, but as one ouerwhelmed with griefe bewaileth the wickednesse of the time wherein he liued, who was born, as himselfe saith, in the forty fourth yeere after the Saxons first entrance, about the yeere of Christs incarnation 493. and died, as Bale citeth out of Polydore, the yeere of our redemption 580. Ninius also another ancient writer, who liued aboue eight hundred yeeres since, taking in hand the Chronicles of the Britaines, complaineth that their great Masters and doctors could giue him no assistance, being ignorant of skill, and had left no memoriall of things passed, nor committed their acts vnto writing, whereby hee was inforced to gather what he had gotten from the annals and Chronicles of the holy fathers. Beda likewise, whose history ended in anno 733, beginneth no sooner then with Iulius Cæsars entrance; notwithstanding he had the assistance of the Abbat Albinus, who was brought vp vnder Theodorus Archbishop of Canterbury, and had begun the history of this land with most diligent search from the records of the kingdome of Kent, and the prouinces adioining; as also being further assisted by Daniel Bishop of the West-Saxons, who sent him all the records that were to be found of the same Bishoprick, South-Saxons, and the ile of Wight. The like helpes had he from Abbat Esius, for the country of East-Angles; from Cymbertus and the brethren of Lastinge for the prouince of Mercia, and East-Saxons. And from the brethren of Lindisfarnum, for the country of Northumberland; besides his owne paines in collections, knowledge and experience: all which he did digest and historically compile, and before the publication thereof sent it to king Ceolulphe at that time raigning in Northumberland, to be approued or corrected by his most learned skill: yet in none of these found he that history of Brute nor his successors, which as some would haue it, was then vnbegotten in the world.

Gildas.

Beda hist. Angli. lib. 1. cap 22. Gildas maketh no mention of Brute.

(16) After him Elward, as William of Malmsburie calleth him, or rather (as he writeth himselfe) Patricius Consul fabius Questor Ethelwerdus, a diligent searcher of antiquities, a reuerend person, and of the blood roiall, wrote foure bookes, briefly comprising the whole history of England, from the beginning of the world vnto the time of king Edgar wherein he liued; of Brute nor his Britaines speaketh a word; but passeth with silence to the Romans and Saxons. What need I to cite Ingulphus, who died anno 1109. Florentius of Worcester, that florished in the daies of King Henry the first, or William of Malmsbury, that wrote vnto the end of his raigne; all of them writers before Geffrey of Monmouth, but none of them mentioning this story of Brute. This moued William of Newbourgh, borne (as himselfe saith) in the beginning of King Stephens raign, & liuing at one and the same time with this Archdeacon of Monmouth, too too bitterly to inueigh against him and his history, euen so soone as the same came foorth: as in the proeme of his booke is to be ſeen. And that the words are his and not our own, take them from him as they lie. In theſe our daies (ſaith he) there is a certaine writer riſen vp, deuiſing fictions and tales of the Britaines out of the vaine humors of his owne braine, extolling them far aboue the valorous Macedonians, or worthy Romans; his name is Geffrey, and may well aſſume the ſirname Arthur, whoſe tales he hath taken out of the old fables of the Britaines, and by his owne inuention augmented with many vntruths, foiling them ouer with a new colour of the Latine tongue, and hath inueſted them into the body of an hiſtory. Aduenturing further to diuulge vnder the name of autentick propheſies, deceitfull coniectures and foredeemings of one Merline (a Wizard), whereunto alſo he addeth a great deale of his owne. And againe: In his booke which he hath intituled the Britaines Hiſtory, how ſhameleſly, and with a bold countenance he doth lie, there is no man that readeth therein can doubt, vnleſſe he hath no knowledge at all in ancient true hiſtories; for hauing not learned the truth of things indeed, he admitteth without diſcretion and iudgement, the vanitie and vntruths of fables. I forbeare to ſpeake (ſaith he) what great matters this fellow hath forged of the Britaines acts before the Empire and comming in of Cæſar. Thus farre Paruus.

Merline a wizard.

But I know the anſwer to this ſo great an accuſation: namely, that this William making ſuit vnto Dauid ap Owen Gwyneth, Prince of North-wales, for the Biſhoprick of Saint Aſſaphs, after the death of Geffrey, and thereof failing, falſly ſcandalized and impudently belied that moſt reuerend man. Which ſurely had been a great fault, and might of vs be beleeued, had not others of the ſame ranke and time, verified aſmuch.

A deuice to put by this William of Newburghs accuſation.

(17) For Sylueſter Giraldus, commonly called Cambrenſis, that flouriſhed in the ſame time with the ſaid author, made no doubt to terme it The fabulous ſtory of Geffrey. The like is verified by Iohn Weathamſtead Abbat of Saint Albanes, a moſt iudicious man that wrote in anno 1440. who in his Granarie giueth ſentence of this hiſtory as followeth. The whole diſcourſe of Brutus (ſaith he) is rather poeticall, then hiſtoricall, and for diuers reaſons is built more vpon opinion then truth, firſt becauſe there is no mention thereof made in the Romane ſtory, either of his killing his father, or of the ſaid birth, or yet of baniſhing the ſonne. Secondly, for that Aſcanius begat no ſuch ſonne who had for his proper name Syluius by any approued Author: for according to them, he begat only one ſonne, and his name was Iulius, from whom the family of the Iulii tooke their beginning. And thirdly, Syluius Poſthumus, whom perhaps Geffrey meaneth; was the ſonne of Aeneas by his wife Lauinia, and he begetting his ſonne Aeneas in the thirty eighth yeer of his raigne ended his life by courſe of naturall death. The kingdome therfore now called England, was not heretofore, as many will haue, named Britaine of Brutus the ſonne of Syluius. Wherefore it is a vaine opinion and ridiculous to challenge noble blood, and yet to want a probable ground of the challenge: for it is manhood only, that enobleth a nation; and it is the mind alſo with perfect vnderſtanding, and nothing els, that gaineth gentility to a man. And therefore Seneca writeth in his Epiſtles to Plato; that there is no King but he came from vaſſals, and no vaſſall but he came from Kings. Wherefore to conclude, let this ſuffice (ſaith he) that the Britaines from the beginning of their nobility haue been couragious and valiant in fight, that they haue ſubdued their enemies on euery ſide, and that they vtterly refuſe the yoke of ſeruitude.

(18) Now that William of Newborough, had ſufficient cauſe (ſay ſome) to exclaime againſt the fantacies of Merline, and the fictions of Arthur, is made manifeſt in the ſequel, not only by the decree of that obtruded Councell of Trent, wherein was inhibited the publication of Merlines books; but alſo (in effect) by the ſtatute enacted the fifth yeere of our laſt deceaſed Queene Elizabeth of bleſſed and immortall memorie, wherein is forbidden ſuch fantaſticall predictions, vpon occaſions of Armes, Fields, Beaſts, Badges, Cognizances, or Signets, ſuch as Merline ſtood moſt vpon; and likewiſe William of Malmsbury ſaith that Arthur being the only proppe that vpheld his country, deſerued rather to be aduanced by truth, then abuſed with fables wherewith that ſtory is moſt plentifully ſtored. And alſo, that Weathamſtead had reaſon to account Brutes acts and conqueſts, to be rather poeticall then any waies warranted by the records of truth, appeareth by the ſilence of the Romane writers therein, who name neither Brute nor his father in the genealogie of the Latine Kings: and if any ſuch were, (ſaith the contradictors) how could they be ignorant of the vntimely death of their king, ſlaine by the hand of his naturall (though in this act vnnaturall) ſonne? or what ſhould moue them, being ſo lauiſh in their own commendations, to be thus ſilent in their Brutes worthineſſe, that with ſeuen thouſand diſperſed Troians warred ſo victoriouſly in Gallia, conquered a kingdome of Giants; ſubdued a moſt famous Iland, raigned glorioufly, and left the ſame to his poſterity; none of them, either in proſe or poetry once handled, but left to deſtiny to be preſerued by a long enſuing meanes, or to periſh in obliuion for euer? And ſurely this moued the whole ſenate of great Clerks to giue ſentence, that neuer any ſuch Brute raigned in the world; ſuch as were Boccace, Viues, Hadrian Iunius, Polydore, Buchanan, Vignier, Genebrard, Molinaus, Bodine, and others.

(19) Yea, and there are ſome Criticks that faine would take aduantage from the defenders of Brutes hiſtory themſelues, as from Sir Iohn Prys, that produceth many vncertaine enſamples of the originall of other nations; which granted, (ſay they) doth no waies confirme the truth or certainty of our owne; neither is it any honour to deriue theſe Britaines from the ſcumme of ſuch conquered people as the Troians were. Humfrey Lhuyd likewiſe denying abſolutely the deriuation of the Britaines name from Brute, and bringing it from two compounded words, (as we haue ſaid) doth thereby weaken the credit of his conqueſt of this Iland to their vnderſtanding, as alſo the catalogue of his ſucceſſors, which are ſaid to raigne ſucceſſiuely for many hundred of yeeres after him. And another induſtrious Britiſh writer, hauing the helpe of two moſt ancient Britiſh copies, the collections of Caradock of Carnaruan, their owne Bardies euery third-yeeres viſitation, and twenty ſeuen authors of good account, (all of them cited in the preface of his Chronicle) beſides his helps had in the offices of records for this realme; yet aſcending no higher then to the perſon of Cadwallader, Prince of Wales, whoſe raign was in the yeere of Chriſts incarnation 682. and no leſſe then one thouſand ſeuen hundred twenty and ſixe yeeres, after that Brute is ſaid to come into this Iland, doth not warrant (ſay they) the ſtory that is included betwixt, but rather euen the ſame is enterlaced with many doubtfull vncertainties, and ſo left diſputable by the ſaid compiler himſelfe; as namely whether that this Cadwallader whom the Britaines claime to be their king, be not the ſame Chedwald whom the Saxons would haue theirs; both liuing at one time, both in acts alike, and names neere, both abandoning their kingdomes, both taking the habit of religion, both dying in Rome, both buried in one Church, nay, ſay they, in one Sepulchre. The like he bringeth of the Britaines Iuor, and the Saxons Iue, in the like coherences of names, acts, deuotions, and deaths: ſo that this hiſtory of Brute carieth not ſo ſmooth a current for paſſage as is wiſhed, nor is that Gordeons knot ſo eaſily vnlooſed.

Thus far Iohn Lewis: and for the exceptions made against Brute: wherin I haue altogether vsed the words of others; and will now (without offense, I hope) adde a supposall of mine owne, seeing I am fallen into the computation of times, which is the onely touch-stone to the truth of histories, especially such as are limited by the bounds of the sacred Scriptures, as this for Brutes entrance is. And that the same cannot bee so ancient (supposing it were neuer so certaine) as the vulgar opinion hitherto hath held, the circumstance of time, to my seeming, sufficiently doth prooue.

The Authours owne opinion of Brutes historie.

(20) For Brutes conquest and entrance are brought by his Authour to fall in the eighteenth yeere of Heli his Priesthood in the Land of Israel, and so is fastned into a computation that cannot erre. Now the eighteenth yeere of Helies gouernment, by the holy Scriptures most sure account, is set in the yeere of the worlds creation 2887. after the vniuersall flood 1231. and before the birth of our blessed Sauiour 1059. yeeres. Brute then liuing in this foresaid time, was foure descents from the conquered Troians, (as he of Monmouth hath laid downe) which were Æneas, Ascanius, Syluius, and himselfe: so that by these generations succesiue in order, the very yeere almost of Troys destruction may certainly be pointed out and knowen: which in searching hath beene found so doubtful, that by some it hath beene thought to be a meere fable. Yet with more reuerence to antiquitie obserued, let vs cast and compare the continuance of these foure generations vnto Brutes Conquest, not shortning them with Baruch, to be but ten yeeres to an age; neither lengthning them with Iosephus, who accounteth one hundred and seuenty yeeres for a generation: but with more indifferencie let vs with Herodotus, who wrote neerer these times, allow thirty yeeres for a succession, as hee accounteth in his second booke. Now foure times thirty make one hundred and twenty, the number of yeeres that these foure Princes succesiuely did liue: by which computation likewise measured by Scripture, the ruination of Troy fell in the thirtie eighth yeere of Gideons gouernment in Israel, and was the yeere after the worlds creation 2768. But the authoritie of Clemens Alexandrinus, alleged out of Menander, Pergamenus, and Letus, destroieth that time of Troies destruction, and placeth it fully two hundred and thirtie yeeres after, euen in the raigne of King Salomon: for in his first booke Stromat.n thus he writeth: Menelaus from the ouerthrow of Troy came into Phœnicia, at that time when Hiram King of Tyrus gaue his daughter in mariage vnto Salomon King of Israel. Where, by him we see, that Troies ruines and Salomons raigne fell both vpon one time. And so Brute hath lost of his antiquity, by this account, 230. yeeres; and entred not in Helies Priesthood, but rather in the vsurpation of Iudahs Kingdome by Athalia, and in the yeere of the world 3118.

1.Sam.4.18. Heli his priesthood in anno mundi 2887. Brutes conquest in the eighteenth of Heli his priesthood.

2. King. 11. 3. Brute his conquest rather in Athalia her time. Ioseph. cont. Appion. lib.1. & 2.

(21) To whom let vs ioine Iosephus, an Authour of great credit, and without suspicion in this case, who in his Nations defense against Appion, in both his bookes, confidently affirmeth himselfe able to proue by the Phœnician Records of warrantable credit, that the City Carthage was built by Dido, sister to Pigmalion, one hundred fiftie and fiue yeeres after the raigne of King Hiram, which was Salomons friend, and one hundred forty three yeeres and eight moneths after the building of his most beautifull Temple. Now wee know by Virgil, from whom all these glorious tales of Troy are told, that Carthage was in building by the same Dido at such time as Æneas came from Troies ouerthrow, through the Seas of his manifold aduentures. If this testimonie of Iosephus be true, then fals Troies destruction about the twentieth yeere of Ioas raigne ouer Iudah, which was the yeere of the worlds creation 3143. whereunto if we adde one hundred and twenty yeeres for the foure descents before specified, then wil Brutes conquest of this Iland fall with the twelfth of Iothams raigne in the Kingdome of Iudah, which meets with the yeere of the worlds continuance 3263. And so hath he againe lost of his antiquitie no lesse then 375. yeeres.

(22) And yet to make a deeper breach into Brutes storie, and to set the time, in a point so vncertaine, as from which neither circle nor line can be trulie drawen; Manethon the Historian Priest of Egypt, in his second booke cited by Iosephus, affirmeth that the Israelites departure from Egypt was almost a thousand yeeres before the warres of Troy. If this be so (as it seemeth Iosephus alloweth it so) and one hundred and twenty yeeres more added, for the foure descents aboue mentioned, the number will fall about the yeere of the worlds creation 3630. long after the death of Alexander the Great, and Greeke Monarch. By which account the great supposed antiquity of Brute, is now lessened by seuen hundred fiftie and two yeeres; and the time so scantelized betwixt his and Cesars entrance, that two hundred forty six yeeres onely remaine: a time by much too short for seuenty two Princes, which succesiuely are said to raigne each after others, and from Brute to Cesar recorded to haue swaied the regall Scepter of this Iland.

Manethon cited by Ioseph. cont. Appion. lib.2. Israelites depart from Egypt 1000. yeeres before the warres of Troy, by Iosephus account. Ioseph. cont. Appion. lib.1. Brutes conquest rather after Alexander the great.

Two hundred forty six yeeres a time too short for the raigne of seuenty two Kings.

(23) But vnto these obiections I know the answer will be ready; namely, the diuersities of Scriptures account, being so sundrie and different, that the storie of Brute cannot thereby bee touched, but still standeth firme vpon it selfe. Indeed I must confesse, that from the first Creation, to the yeere of mans Redemption, the learned Hebrewes, Greekes, and Latines, differ much, and that not only each from others, but euen among themselues so farre, that there can be no indifferent reconciliation made, as by these seuerall computations may be seene, as followeth:

The great differences in computation of yeers among Writers.

And yet doe these disagreements helpe little the Obiectors if this be considered, that the maine foundation of these diuersities consisteth chiefly in the first world before the Flood, wherein it is manifest, that the reputed Septuagint addeth to the Hebrew Originall fiue hundred eighty and six yeeres. And from the Flood to Abrahams birth, is accounted two hundred and fiue yeeres more then Moses hath. As likewise the like is done in the latter times: for from the Captiuitie of Babylon to the death of Christ, one hundred thirty and seuen yeeres are added, more then the Sunnes course hath measured: so that it seemeth the differences were not great for the times of Heli, Salomon, nor Iudahs Kings, in whose raignes Brute is brought to people and possesse this Iland. But leauing these diuersities, and to come to a certaintie, let vs calculate the yeeres of the holy historie according as Functius, Beroaldus, and sundry other Theologicke Chronologers

These differences were chiefly before the Flood. Septuagint.

The accounting of yeeres by the Scripture is a most sure maner of computation.

nologers haue done; who from the Scriptures most sure account, so tie the stories of times together, that like to a golden chaine, the linkes are fastned each to other, and the whole so compleat, that a yeere is not missing from the fall of man, vnto the full time of his redemption.

From the foundation of the Temple, to Salomons death, 36. yeeres. 1.King.11.42.

From Salomons death, to the burning of the Temple, 390. yeeres. 2.King.25.8. Ezc.4.v.2.& 5.

From the burning of the Temple, to the end of Iudahs captiuity, 51. yeeres. Ier.25.11. Isa.45.1. 2. Chron. 36. 21.22.23. Ezra 1.1.2.

From the first yeere of Cyrus, vnto the death of Christ, 490. yeeres.

Dan.9.24.

(24) First then from the Creation to the Flood are reckoned yeeres 1656. gathered by a triple account, from the ages, begettings, and deaths of the fathers. The like is thence obserued for foure hundred twentie and seuen yeeres, that is, to the seuentie fifth of Abrahams life, wherein God began to tie the times accounts in holier summes: for Terah, the first recorded Idolater, was the last in honour that had the Sunnes course measured by mans life. And now the bounds of time tie the Promise to Abraham, to bee before the Law foure hundred and thirty yeeres, as the Apostle to the Galathians affirmeth. From the Law to the building of Salomons Temple, and that in the fourth yeere of his raigne, were yeeres foure hundred and eightie: and from that foundation, to his death, were thirtie six yeeres: for his whole raigne was fortie. From his death and Kingdomes diuision, vnto the burning of that Temple, which was executed in the nineteenth of Nebuchadnezzar King of Babel, were yeeres three hundred and ninetie, as by the daies of Ezekiels siege and sleepe appeareth in the second and fifth verses of his fourth Chapter. From the burning of the Temple, to the end of Iudahs captiuitie, were yeeres fiftie and one, for the whole time of Babels bondage contained seuenty yeeres, as Ieremy 25.11. whereof nineteene were expired; and fifty one remaining vnto the first yeere of Cyrus their deliuerer, whom the Lord in that regard calleth his annointed Isay.45.1. In the first yeere of whose Monarchie he published an Edict for the returne of the Iewes and new building of their Temple, as in the books of Chronicles and of Ezra is seene. And from this first yeere and proclamation of King Cyrus, vnto the last yeere and death of Christ our Sauiour the great yeere of Iubilie, the acceptable time, wherein he troad the winepresse alone; to the finishing of the ceremonies, the taking away of sinne, the reconciling of iniquity, the bringing in of euerlasting righteousnesse, to the sealing vp of vision and prophecie, and to the anointing of the most holy; were yeeres foure hundred and ninety, as the Prophet Daniel from the Angell Gabriel receiued, and vnto vs hath deliuered Dan. 9.24. all which added together make the number to be three thousand nine hundred and threescore yeeres. And by this said computation, I haue accounted Brutes story, as all others wherein I shall bee occasioned to speake.

(25) Lastly, if from among these misty cloudes of ignorance no light can be gotten, and that we will needs haue our descents from the Troians; may wee not then more truly deriue our blood from them through the Romanes, who for the space of foure hundred threescore and six yeeres were planted amongst vs? in which continuance it is most certaine, they tooke of our women to be their wiues, and gaue their women to be wiues vnto vs, seeing that some of their Emperors did the like themselues, and from whose blood, saith Beda, the Britaines Ambrosius lineally descended. And if beauty and parts be the instigaters vnto loue, as in the first world we see it was, no doubt then the features of the Britains were mouing Angels vnto the Romanes, whose faces euen in those times were accounted to be angelicall, and whose personages as yet, are respected as the best (if not better) then any other in the world. But that the Romans themselues descended from the Troians, or AEneas should be the roote of the Iulian family, howsoeuer the fictions of Poets as a spring tide haue flowed from the fulnesse of their pennes, yet Tacitus their best writer accounteth those things not far vnlike to old fables, wherein he iudgeth that Nero to win credit before the Consuls, and to get reputation in the glory of eloquence vndertooke the pleading of the Ilienses cause, declaring the Romanes descent from Troy: and the Iulij from the loines of AEneas, which notwithstanding he censureth as is said. And Iosephus in the dispersion of Noahs sonnes and families, affirmeth that Romus was the Originall of the old Romanes and he of Chus, and Cham, if he meane as he speaketh. To conclude; (by what destiny I know not) nations desire their originals from the Troians; yet certaine it is, that no honor from them can be brought, whose city and fame stood but for six descents, as vnder the raignes of Dardanus, Erithonius, Troos, Ilion, Laomedon, and Priamus, during which time they were thrice vanquished; twice by Hercules in the daies of Laomedon, and the third time rased by the rage of the Grecians in the raigne of King Priamus, and the Troians themselues made as it were the scum of a conquered people. And therefore as France hath cast off their Francio King Priamus his sonne, Scotland their Scotia King Pharaoes daughter, Denmarke their Danus, Ireland their Hiberus, and other Countries their Demi-gods; so let BRITAINES likewise with them disclaime their BRVTE, that bringeth no honour to so renowned a Nation, but rather cloudeth their glorie in the murders of his parents, and imbaseth their descents, as sprung from Venus that lasciuious Adultéresse.

Britaines may more truly deriue their descent from Troy by the Romanes. Britains tooke wiues of the Romanes, and they of the Britaines. Beda hist. Angliæ. lib.1.cap.16. Gen.6.1.

THE MANNERS AND CVSTOMES OF THE ANCIENT BRITAINES.

CHAPTER IV.

HAuing thus farre spoken of the ancient Names of this famous Iland, and of the Nations acknowledged to bee the first Planters and Possessors thereof; it remaineth that somewhat be mentioned of the Manners and Customes of those people and times, though not so pleasing or acceptable as were to be wished, for that the clouds of ignorance and barbarous inciuilitie did then shadow and ouer-spread almost all the Nations of the earth: wherein I desire to lay imputation no further then is sufficiently warranted by most autenticke Writers: and first from Cesar, who formost of all the Romanes discouered and described our ancient Britaines.

(2) Touching their persons: All the Britaines (saith Cesar) vsed to die themselues with woad, which setteth a blew colour vpon them, and that maketh them more terrible to behold in battle. But Pomponius Mela therein moueth ueth a doubt. They died their bodies (saith he) with woad; but whether to make a gallant shew, or for what other cause else is vncertaine. And yet Herodian herein absolutely determineth, where hee saith, that the Britaines knew no vse of garments at all, but about their wastes and neckes wore chaines of iron; supposing them a goodly ornament, and a proofe of their wealth: and their bare bodies they marked with sundry pictures representing all manner of liuing creatures; and therefore they would not be clad; for hiding the gay paintings of their bodies. To which painting Pliny also agreeth, and describeth that hearbe woad, to bee like to the Plantine in Gallia, naming it Glastum, with the iuice whereof (saith he) the women of Britaine, as well wiues as yoong women, anoint and die their bodies all ouer, resembling by that tincture the colour of the Æthiopians, in which manner they vse at solemne feasts and sacrifices to goe all naked. And Dio Niceus out of the epitome of Xiphilinus, saith, that the custome of that Nation was, to abide in tents all naked and vnshod. Notwithstanding, Cesar doth elsewhere report, that they clad themselues in leather, which perchance is meant of the ciuiller sort of them, and in time of battle. Solinus likewise speaking of the Britaines, saith, their Country is peopled partly with Barbarians, who by meanes of artificiall incisions of sundry formes, haue from their childhood diuers shapes of beasts incorporate vpon them; and hauing their markes deepely imprinted within their bodies, looke how their growth for stature, so doe these pictured characters likewise increase. Neither do these sauage Nations repute any thing a greater testimonie of their patience, then by such durable skarres to cause their limmes drinke in much painting and colour. These skarres by Tertullian are tearmed Britannorum stigmata, The Britaines markes. And vnto this skie-colour, or blewish dyings, it seemeth Martial had relation in his praises of Lady Claudia:

Claudia cæruleis cùm sit Rufina Britannis,
Edita cur Latia pectora plebis habet?
Sith Claudia comes of Azurde Britaines race,
Whence comes her minde so deckt with Roman grace?

And of this vse of painting, as our great Antiquarie iudgeth, both the Britaines had their primitiue deriuation, and the Picts (a branch of British race) a long time after, for that their accustomed manner, were called Picti by the Romanes, that is, the painted people.

(3) The haire of their heads, saith Cesar, they let grow, and wore long, which naturally was curled, and of colour yellow, (as in the Panegyricke Oration ascribed to Mamertinus, and spoken in praise of Maximianus, is to be seene) all other parts of their bodies being shauen, sauing only the head and vpper lippe. Yet their complexions were much different, as by Tacitus wee see, who auoucheth that some of those Ilanders were red of haire, as the Caledonians in the Northerne Promontories; the haire of the Silures coloured and curled, like to the old Spaniards; and those neerest vnto Gallia resembled their complexions, though not altogether so yellow, saith Strabo. But their wit by Tacitus is preferred before them, and their statures more tall, as Strabo affirmeth, whose lineaments shewed a good making of body, and measurable proportion in all parts answerable. Their women faire, and of exceeding good features, as is described by the Romane Writers. Such was Boudicea, saith Xiphilinus; Claudia and Helena, saith Martial and Eutropius.

(4) That the strength of nature wrought long in the Britaines, we read out of Plutarch, who reporteth that the people liued one hundred and twenty yeeres, for that, saith he, their cold and frozen Country kept in their naturall heat: whose conditions by Diodorus Siculus are commended to be plaine and vpright, farre from the wilinesse and craft of the Romanes. And by Strabo their dispositions are partly resembled to the Gaules, but yet somewhat more rude and plaine; and those most ciuill, who were the inhabitants of Kent, by reason of their oftner conuersing with other Nations, as Cesar sheweth. But the farther from the continent, the more rude, and lesse acquainted with other kind of riches besides cattell, as Pomponius Mela affirmeth.

(5) Now touching their domestick matters. Their buildings were many, and like to them of the Gaules saith Iulius Cæsar; notwithstanding they giue the name of Townes to certaine combersome woods, which they haue fortified with rampires and ditches, whither they retreat, and resort to eschue the inuasions of their enemies. Which stand them in good stead, saith Strabo: for when they haue by felling of trees, mounted, and fenced therewith a spacious round plot of ground; there they build for themselues houses and cottages, and for their cattell set vp stalls and folds, but those for the present vse onely, and not for long continuance. Which, as Diodorus Siculus saith were vsually thacked with reed; but the cities without walls, and the country without townes, as Dion describeth the Calidonians and Meats.

(6) Their wiues were ten or twelue a peece, as Cæsar hath alledged, which they held common among brothers and parents, yet the issue reputed his, who first maried the mother when she was a maide: and Dio indeed affirmeth no lesse, adding withall, that the children thus begotten, were fostred and brought vp in common among them. And Eusebius likewise testifieth, that many Britaines together kept one wife in common to them all. This community in mariage moued Iulia the Empresse of Seuerus, to twite the wife of Argetexaxus, that the fashion of the women of Britaine in accompanying with men, was very impudent; to whom she replied and said, we British women do indeed herein differ from you Roman Ladies; for wee satisfie our appetite, by accompanying with the worthiest men, and that openly, but you with euery base fellow, in a corner.

(7) For their diet; it was a heinous matter with them to eat either Hen, Hare, or Goose, saith Cæsar, which notwithstanding they bred for their pleasures; neither fed daintily at full and rich tables, as Diodorus Siculus affirmeth, but rather in necessity could liue vpon barkes and roots of trees, and with a kind of meat no bigger then a beane, after which for a good time they did neither hunger nor thirst, saith Dio Niceus: who likewise testifieth that the Britains, did till no ground, neither eat fish, though their riuers thereof be pleneously stored, but liue vpon prey, venison, and fruits: to which also Cæsar addeth milke, whereof (saith Strabo), they had not then skill to make cheese. And according to Solinus, their vsuall drinke was made of barley. But for tillage Pliny seemeth to contradict Dio, affirming that the Britaines manured their grounds with Marle in stead of dung; which argueth no such simplicity in gardening, planting, and in other like points of husbandry as Strabo doth taxe them with. And this foresaid temperance of diet differeth much from that, which Saint Hierome chargeth their neighbors the Anthropophagi of Ireland, who vsed to feed on the buttocks of boies, and womens paps, as their most dainty and delicate dish.

(8) For their religion, or rather diabolicall superstition, was as the rest of the world, (some few excepted) when Satan had clouded the truth of Gods doctrine, by the foggy mists of confused darknesse. For Tacitus makes their superstitions, and ceremonies to be the same in conformity with the Gaules. And what that was, Dio Cassius in his Nero, and Solinus in his history, doe declare; who doe ascribe to them the most inhumane offering of mans flesh in their sacrifices. And besides their ancient Idols, such as Dis, Iupiter, Apollo, Diana, and the like, they worshipped Andates for their Goddesse of Victory, vnto all which they performed no small adorations and honors, imputing their prosperities vnto them: vnto whom also they erected temples with such magnificence as they then had; whose walles, as it seemeth, long after remained, whereon some of those prophane portraitures with deformed lineaments were seene by mournfull Cil-

The Druides determine almost all controuersies.

Excommunication of great force in the time of the ancient Britaines.

Among the Druides one Primat and chiefe ouer the rest.

They assemble once a yeere at a place in France to heare controuersies.

Here appeareth, that Academies were then amongst the Britans, and from their example deriued into other countries.

They are exempted from war.

Their schollers must learne a great many verses by heart.

They vse the Greek letters lest their skill should be too common.

Their Theology is, that the soule dieth not, but passeth from one to another.

das, carrying a sterne and grim countenance, after the wonted heathenish manner: here see we (saith he) vpon these desert walles, the vgly features of the Britains Idols, meerly diabolicall, and in number almost exceeding those of Egypt. So by Tacitus they are noted with the common custome of the Gentiles, which was that they sought for the direction of their Gods by the looking into the entralls of Beasts, yea and of men too; and that they honored the Altars of their Gods with the sacrifice and blood of such as they tooke captiue in wars. And Plinie writing of Magick, saith, that in his daies the art thereof in Britaine was highly honored, and all the people thereunto so much deuoted, yea and with all such complements of ceremonies in the same to be performed, that a man would thinke the Persians had learned all their Magick skill from them. Priests and instructers had they, whereof the chiefe were called Druides, whose office was imploied about holy things, saith Cæsar; for they had the managing of publike and priuate sacrifices, and to interpret and discusse matters of religion. Vnto them doe resort great numbers of yong men to learne at their hands, and they be had in great reuerence. For they determine almost all controuersies, and matters in variance, as well publike as priuate. And if there happen any thing to be done amisse, if there be any murther committed, if there rise any controuersie concerning inheritance or bounds of lands, they take the matter into their power, and award either recompence or penalties in the case. And if there be any, be he priuate person, or be it corporation, that will not stand to their iudgement, they interdict him, which punishment among them is held most grieuous. They that are so excommunicated are accounted in the number of the wicked and vngratious: all men shun them, all men eschue their company and communication, lest by conuersing with them, they should defile themselues and receiue harme. If they demand law, they may not haue it: neither may they enioy any place of honor. Ouer all these Druides there is one Primate, which hath chiefe authority ouer them. When he is dead if there be any of the rest that excelleth in worthinesse, he succeedeth: or if there be any equall, he is chosen by voices of the rest, and diuers times they striue for the soueraignty by force of armes.

These men at a certaine season of the yeere, in the borders of the Carnutes (whose country is counted the middle of all Gallia) do sit together in a place hallowed, whereunto resort from all sides all such as haue any controuersies: and looke what is decreed and iudged by them, that they stand vnto. This order of discipline is thought to haue had beginning in Britaine, and from thence to haue been brought into Gallia. And at this day, they that are desirous to attaine this skill more exactly, do commonly repaire thither to learne it. These Druides customably are exempted from the wars, neither do they pay taxes and tallages with other folke: for they are priuiledged as from the warres, so from all other burthens. Allured with so great rewards, many euen of their owne accord, do register themselues in that order, and diuers are sent thither by their parents and kinsfolke. Where they are reported to learne a great number of verses by heart. Whereof it commeth to passe, that diuers continue twenty yeeres in learning. Neither do they thinke it lawfull to put them in writing, whereas in all other things, for their accounts, as well publike as priuate, they vse the Greek letters.

This order they seeme (in mine opinion) saith he, to haue taken for two considerations: partly because they will not haue their discipline published among the common people; and partly because they will not that they which shall learne, trusting too much to their bookes, should haue the lesse regard of remembrance: in that it hapneth well neere to most men, that vpon trust of the helpe of their booke, they are slacker in learning things by heart, and lesse care to beare them in mind. This is one of the chiefest things that they labour most to beat into mens minds, that the Soules die not, but do after death passe from one to another: and hereby they thinke men should be most stirred vnto virtue, when the feare of death is nothing regarded. Also they dispute many other things: as of the starres, and of their mouings: of the bignesse of the world, and the earth: of the nature of things: of the strength and power of the goddes immortall: and do therein instruct the youth. Vnto these Druides and their doctrine had Lucan the Poet relation in his first booke towards the end, where he writeth thus of them.

(9) These Britaines being meerly barbarous, as most of the Western parts of the world then were, liued priuately to themselues with scarce any commerce, or entercourse with any other nation: neither indeed were much known to forraine people, for a long time. For the first notice of them extant, was by Polybius the Greek writer, that accompanied Scipio in his warres, about the yeere of the worlds creation 3720. and two hundred and nine, before the birth of our Sauiour Christ. Which Author nameth their Iland to be plenteously stored with Tynne: but of other things therin is silent, saying that al those parts which lay betwixt Tanais and Narbor bending Northward in his daies were vnknown and vncertaine, and therefore the reporters of them he held as dreamers. So doth Master Cambden another Polybius, & no way his inferior, account it a prodigall humor of credulity, to be perswaded that Himilco, from the state of Carthage sent to discouer the coasts of Europe, in the said expedition entred this Iland: or that Hannibal should war in this Iland, because Polybius in the Eclogues of his tenth booke saith that he was inclosed within the streits of Britaine, which place is mistaken for the Brutij in Italy: or that Alexander came from the East Indians, to Gades, and from thence into Britaine, though Cedrenus say so, seeing all other writers are against it; or that Vlysses, (ancient enough if he be that Elishah the sonne of Iauan, the fourth sonne of Iapheth) should visit Britaine in his trauels, whereof Brodæus maketh doubt; though Solinus report that an Altar in Caledonia was erected, and Vlysses in Greeke letters thereon inscribed. Which might very well be: for who doubteth but that the Greekes, in their vaine deuotions, did both build and sacrifice vnto their Gods, which they made of their worthiest men? and sith Vlysses, (in regard of his farre sea-trauels) was had in speciall account among all nauigators, why might not such monuments be reared, and his name inscribed, as farre as the Grecians trauelled, though his person neuer came there?

ent times, as that neither Thucydides nor Herodotus made mention of them: yea and with much adoe at last were heard of by the Grecians themselues: as Iosephus affirmeth; And if the Gaules and Spaniards, (inhabitants in the continent) for many yeeres together were vtterly vnknowen to the worlds historiographers; shall we then thinke, that this remote Iland, and people then far from ciuility, were noted foorth with markes of more certainty? surely to my seeming, nothing lesse: seing that their next neighbours the Gaules knew not so much as what manner of men they were: none resorting thither, except some few merchants, and they no further, then vpon the sea coasts, neither able to describe the bigneſle of the Iland, the puissance of the inhabitants, their order for war, the lawes that they vsed, the customes of the people, nor their hauens for the receit of ships; all which Cæsar by diligent inquiry sought after, but could find no satisfaction till he had sent some purposely to search it out.

(10) Neither is this their want of knowledge to bee wondred at, seeing the entercourse of their trafficke was vpheld by so meane commodities: for Strabo saith, that their merchandizing chiefly consisted in Iuory Boxes, Sheeres, Onches, Bits, and Bridles, Wreaths & Chains, with other conceits made of Amber and Glasse; for which notwithstanding they were compelled to pay customes and impostes vnto Octauian Augustus, as elsewhere shall be shewed.

(11) And as their commodities were very mean, so were their meanes either for exportation or importation very slender in those times; I meane their shipping. It is true, that some are of opinion, that Ships were first inuented in these our Seas: but that this should be true, I haue cause to doubt, that Art being long before inspired by God himselfe into the heart of Noah for making the Arke, and no doubt practised by that paterne of many others. But that the ancient Britaines had ships of reasonable vse, though of simple Art, Cæsar testifieth, saying, that the keeles and ribs of their ships were of light wood, and couered ouer with leather: which kinde the now-Britaines call Corraghs: and with them (saith Polyhistor) they did saile betwixt Britannie and Ireland, (which sea for roughnesse and danger may bee compared with any other whatsoeuer) though the bulke of their vessels were but of some flexible wood, couered with the hides of Buffiles: and as long as they were sailing, so long did they abstaine from meat: whereby it seemeth they neuer sailed any great iourneys. And of this their shipping Pliny also speaketh, and Lucan singeth, thus:

Their shipping very meane. Ships first inuented in Britaine, is a matter to be doubted.

And Britaine Pilots saile on surge of Ocean wide.

But after-times brought the Britaines to more exquisite skill in nauall affaires, insomuch as the royall Nauie of this Kingdome hath beene reputed (and so is at this day) not only the inuincible walles of our owne, but the incredible terror of al other Kingdoms, which haue or shall enuy our happie peace: and the aduentures likewise of Merchants, and the skill of our Seamen, hath left no corner of the world vnsearcht.

(12) And their trafficke amongst themselues was not of much worth, in that, as Cæsar saith, the Coines which they had were either of brasse, or else iron rings sized at a certaine waight, which they vsed for their monies. Of which kind some haue auerred they haue seene found and lately taken vp in little cruses or pitchers of earth. But as times grew more ciuill, and trafficke more frequent, they shortly after stamped both siluer and gold; and thereon the faces of their Kings, euen in the daies of Iulius Cæsar, who was the first that had his owne

(13) We come lastly, to speake of the manner of their warfare, which Cæsar thus describeth. First (saith he) they ride round about all parts of the battell, casting off their darts: and often times with the terrible noise of their horses, and the ratling of their chariot wheeles, they amaze the enemy and breake their array. And when they haue wound themselues in among the troopes of horsemen, they leape foorth of their waggons, and fight on foot. In the meane while the waggoners withdraw themselues somewhat out of the battell, and set their waggons in such order, that if they be ouercharged by the enemy, they may haue speedy and easie recourse vnto them. By meanes whereof they are both as ready to remoue as the horsemen, and as stedfast to stand in the battell as the footmen, and supply both duties in one. And they are come to such perfectnesse by daily practice and exercise, that euen in steepe and falling places they will stop their horses running a full gallop, and guide and turne them in a short roome, & run vpon the vergies, and stand stedfastly vpon the beames, and quickly recouer themselues back againe into the waggons.

They amaze the enemy with the ratling of their chariot wheeles.

These would often giue ground to egge their enemies from their maine battell, and then would leape out of their chariots and fight on foot. And they kept also such an order in fighting on horseback, that whether the enemies chased, or were chased, they were alwaies in danger. For they neuer fought in great companies together, but scatteringly a great way distant the one from the other, and had stals lying in diuers places one to supply another, hauing euer fresh and lusty men in the roomes of them that were weary. Of this their manner of fight in chariots, Strabo also declareth; and Diodorus Siculus saith that the Britaines liued after the manner of the first age of the world, vsing chariots in their fight, as the report goes of the ancient Greeks at the Troian warres. Pomponius Mela also describing these Britaines, affirmeth that their fight was not only with horsemen and footmen, but also with waggons and chariots, harnessed, and armed at the ends of the axle-trees with hookes and sithes, after the manner of the Gaules; but with apparance of greater courage, as Tacitus saith; as being not yet mollified by long peace. Their strength in field consisteth most of footmen, yet some countries there are (saith he) that war in waggons, the greatest persons guiding the same; and so much doth Iuuenal intimate, who in shew of prophecie but indeed in flattery of the Emperor Domitian, salutes him after this manner.

And Herodian saith that their shields were narrow and speares short, wearing swords hanging down their naked loines, hauing neither knowledge nor vse either of corslet or helmet.

all for the Britains to fight vnder the conduct of women, (which the Romans found to their ſmart) nor to make any difference of ſexes for gouernment. A more noble patterne whereof, neuer had any age, then in our late glorious Virgin Queen, (the wonder of her ſexe, and of al future ages,) who, as ſhe was inferior to no Prince euer liuing, for her admirable gouernment in vpholding of her kingdomes peace, ſo was ſhe a match (to ſay no more) to the proudeſt monarchs, in her managing of her wars; as (when occaſion was offered) ſhe was ready to make good, in her owne roiall perſon in the field. But beſides the vſe of armes, the ancient Britiſh women had another imploiment in the field, which I will only ſet downe in Tacitus his words, ſpeaking of Paulinus Suetonius his aſſailing of Angleſcy: The Britiſh Army (ſaith he) ſtood on the ſhore, thicke of men and munition, and women running vp and downe amongſt them, like furies, carrying burning firebrands in rufull attire, and with their haire hanging about their ſhoulders. The Druides meane while went with their hands lift vp to heauen, pouring out praiers and imprecations. The ſtrangeneſſe of which ſight ſo amazed the Roman ſouldiers, that they ſtood ſtill like ſtocks, whiles the other wounded them at their pleaſure; till Paulinus encouraged them, and they excited one another, not to be ſo danted by an army of women and wizards. &c.

(15) In the relations of theſe things, let no man thinke, that the glory of theſe ancient and warlike nation of Britains, is any waies diſparaged, or made inferior to them that would be more famous, whoſe beginning haue been as meane, and ſtate as rude, if not more. For let vs conſider the Romans ſo lauiſh in their owne worths and greatneſſe; who notwithſtanding, bring their name and originall from Romulus, a baſtard by birth, nouriſhed by a beaſt, educated among a ſort of ruſtick ſhepheards: and grown to the ripeneſſe of his owne affections, he became ring-leader of a damned crue, that liued by robberies and without lawes: beſides the ſhedding of his naturall brothers blood, as Titus Liuie their owne hiſtorian witneſſeth: and both himſelfe and followers, had in ſuch contempt and deriſion by their neighbour nations, that they both diſdained and refuſed to giue them their daughters in mariage, leſt in time they alſo ſhould become lawleſſe, vntill that by ſubtilty and force, they had rauiſhed their virgins, and thereby made them vnworthy of other matches. Yet when their after fortunes and ſucceſſe had mounted them vpon the wings of glory, and ſeated them on the necks of their ſubdued neighbors, their Cæſars would needs be more then mortall, and their pedigrees muſt lineally be brought from the Gods.

Nay what more is, that pretious, roiall, and Gods only people, from whom the eternall King of Kings deſcended, in their offrings made in time of their higheſt glory, were by the Lord thus commanded to acknowledge and ſay: A Syrian was my father, who being ready to periſh for hunger, went down into Egypt, and ſoiourned with a ſmall company. THE GOVERNMENT OF GREAT BRITAINE.

CHAPTER V.

The Britiſh gouernment.

WEE come, at length, to ſpeake of the gouernment and politicall eſtate of the Britaines, which doubtleſſe (the times then conſidered) was as honorable in their rulers, and as manageable in the ſubiects, as any other nations in theſe Weſt parts of the world: their temperance, religion, learning, and noble reſolution ſhewing no leſſe. But in this point I muſt craue pardon of our Britiſh Heraulds, and ſome learned Antiquaries, if I bring not a lineall ſucceſſion from Brute, and a monarchicall gouernment in thoſe times of obſcurity, through whoſe miſts no Egles eies could pierce, before the daies of Geffrey ap Arthur, as before was touched. And therefore following his counſell, who is beſt able in theſe things to giue direction; I will begin the ſucceſſion of Great Britains Monarchs, at the entrance and perſon of Iulius Cæſar; at which time, it ſeemeth, by him and other Latine writers (the beſt Recorders of kingdoms affaires,) this Iland was gouerned rather after the manner of an Ariſtocratie, that is, by certaine great Nobles and Potent men, then vnder the command of any One as an abſolute Monarch: though herein is a difference, in that in the Ariſtocraticall regiment, the rulers are all Peeres of one Common wealth; whereas here, as many Princes, ſo many ſeuerall Publike weales. For ſo Cæſar himſelfe found the ſtate of Britaine to be diuided into Prouinces vnder the names of her inhabitants; and to be ruled by diuers Peeres or petty Kings.

Not meerly monarchicall.

(2) And ſuch a Gouernor was Caſsibelan, ouer the Trinobantes: Cingetorix, Caruilius, Taximagulus, and Segonax, all foure Rulers together in Kent: Comes ſuppoſed to be King of the Atrebatij, and to be the ſame Comius of Arras, whom Cæſar imploied to teaſe and worke the Britaines to his ſubiection. Caractacus the warlike King of the Silures, Galgacus the worthy King of the Caledonians; yea and women alſo, without exception of ſex, held gouernment among them, ſuch as was faithleſſe Cartiſmandua Queen of the Brigantes, and famous Boudicea Queene of the Icenians. Whereby it ſeemeth that euery ſeuerall Prouince owed ſeruice and alleageance only to their owne Prince. And as their gouernments were confined vnto certaine bounds and limits, ſo were the Inhabitants diuided and diſtinguiſhed by diuers Names: of whom becauſe we ſhall haue occaſion hereafter often to ſpeak, it ſhal not therfore be amiſſe in this place once for all, table-wiſe to lay downe the ſame; whereby our narrations may paſſe vntroubled without more explanations, and the readers mind carried with leſſe incombrances. Thoſe ancient names of people, and places for abode, throughout the whole Iland, from Ptolemie were as follow.

Their emulations & ambition.

(3) Theſe States ambitiouſly banding ech againſt others, to raiſe their owne Prince to a more ſoueraigne ſupremacy, and to enlarge their Prouinces vpon the borders of the next, were euer ready, the leaſt occaſion miniſtred, ſaith Pomponius Mela, to enter quarels, and ſeldome held amity, or were quiet. This was the cauſe, as Tacitus tells vs, which brought that puiſſant nation into bondage: and was the only helpe to the Romans victories: for ſeldome it chanced (ſaith he) that two or three ſtates met in counſell, and concurred in opinion to repulſe the common danger: ſo that whilſt they reſiſted and fought one by one, all at length were ſubdued. But this was not at once performed by Iulius Cæſar the firſt Roman enterer, who (as he ſaith) rather ſhewed the place to poſterities, then gaue them the poſſeſſion thereof, ſuppoſing it his glory ſufficient, to haue done what he did. For vnto the daies of Domitian, they held play with the Romans, and that with ſuch valour, that the ſubduing of ſome ſmall part of this Iland was accounted by themſelues to match the conqueſts of other mightier countries, and more notes of honour ſhewed in their publike triumphs for one Britaines miſſortune, then vſually was ſolemnized for whole kingdomes ſubdued.

(4) That ſuch people poſſeſſed, and that many Kings together raigned here in Britaine, Pomponius Mela doth ſhew: Britaine (ſaith he) bringeth foorth Nations, and Kings of nations, though they be all without ciuility and barbarous. And Cæſars intendments being known vnto them, it is ſaid that many of their Cities ſent him by their Embaſſadors profers of ſubmiſſion: whereby appeareth their diuerſities of States, whereof only two held promiſe, and the reſt failing was the occaſion of his ſecond expedition for Britaine. And Tacitus, ſpeaking of the ſhipwrack ſuffered by the Romans in the raigne of Tiberius, ſaith, that many of their ſouldiers then diſtreſſed and torne, being caſt vpon the coaſts of Britaine, were by the people curteouſly releeued, and by their petty Kings ſent backe vnto Germanicus their Generall into Germanie; which Princes or petty Kings, were drawn (as elſe where he ſaith) by emulation into many partialities and factions; which was indeed their owne deſtruction. And by Gildas theſe were termed cruell Tyrants, taking his authority out of Saint Hierome.

(5) Let thus farre ſuffice, in generall, of theſe ancient Britains; whoſe particulars we will further proſecute in the places of their reſiſtances, leſt otherwiſe they ſhould ſeeme to fight only againſt themſelues. And therefore ſo many of theſe Gouernors, as either yeelded their ſubiections to the Romans, or ſtood their oppoſits till their owne ſtrengths were ſpent, I will briefly touch, vntill ſuch time as the land was made a Prouince, by the valour and induſtry of Iulius Agricola the firſt Roman that found it an Iland, and left it more ciuill, and in ſubiection to the Roman Empire; and by the way I will inſert ſome of ſuch ancient Coynes, as among them were then vſed, expreſſing their names, and places of coynage.

THE KINGS AND GOVERNORS OF GREAT BRITAIN VVITH THE ANCIENT COINES VSED IN THEIR TIMES.

CHAPTER VI.

THe firſt Britiſh Coyne (as is ſuppoſed) both by the faſhion thereof being ſhield-like, and Name thereupon inſcribed REX COM: denoteth Comius, (if he be a Britaine) King of the Atrebatij in this Iland: whom ſome iudge to haue fled thence vnto Cæſar, as a traytor to his Natiue country; and in Gallia vanquiſhed thoſe parts, that lay coaſted againſt the Whight, wherein (by Ptolemy) the people called likewiſe the Atrebatij inhabited: ouer whom he receiued the gouernment by the gift of Cæſar, and was by him imploied to worke the Britaines to his obedience. And that he was King of the Atrebatij in Britaine, may be ſtrengthned by that which Cæſar in his ſecond book of Commentaries affirmeth, where, by his owne knowledge he ſaith, that one Diuitiacus raigned ouer a great part of Gallia, and ſome portion of Britaine alſo: and ſo likewiſe this Comius is reported to be of great reſpect among our Britaines, and able in that country to doe much. Neither is it altogether vnlikely, ſeeing the Britaines diſtaſted his loyalty to Cæſar, and his Ambaſſage for their ſubiection, with ſuch diſlikes, that they laid violent hands only vpon him, and caſt him in priſon; vſing no ſuch rigor againſt the reſt of their owne Ambaſſadors. Notwithſtanding when ſucceſſe altered, they ſet him at liberty, and made him their meanes to pacifie Cæſar.

Other Coynes I haue inſerted to ſuch Britiſh princes as by their inſcriptions are known to be theirs. And whereas ſome are not yet noted by that honor to the world; I haue vnto ſuch added only blankes, if happily more be reueiled hereafter, and the bowels of the earth deliuer to others, her treaſures hid, as formerly (and in theſe our ſearching daies) ſhe hath already done.

(2) Caſſibelan

(2) Caſsibelan, as the moſt worthy among the Britains Kings, to withſtand the common danger now ready to light vpon them all, by the inuaſions and wars of the Romans; was by a generall conſent choſen their chieftaine, though in times paſt, he had moleſted his neighbouring prouinces to the inlargement of his owne. Whoſe ſigniories, as Cæſar ſaith, were ſeuered from the Cities towards the ſea coaſt by the riuer Thames, about foureſcore miles from the ſame. He had obtained the gouernment of the Trinobantes, by the ſlaughter of Imanuence, and the expulſion of Mandubrace his ſonne. And, with great valour, held oppoſit to the Romans, vntill the reuolt of his chiefe Citie, the Cenimagues, Segontians, Ancalits, Bubroces, Caſsians, and other ſtates, which drew backe, and yeelded to the enemie; his confederates, the foure Kings of Kent, ouerthrown, his owne towne won, and himſelfe forced to yeeld vnto Cæſar, and the land to pay a tribute of 3000. pound yeerly to Rome. A Britiſh Coyne of gold with the inſcription CAS in ſcattered letters we haue inſerted; as alſo another wheron is inſtamped the word VER, ſuppoſed to be his, becauſe it is thought to haue bin coined in antient Verolam, the City of Caſsibelan, and that in his daies, before the Romans won it.

Cæſar. comment. lib.5.

Verolam a famous City neere to the place where now S. Albons is.

(3) Cingetorix: Caruill: Taximagull: Segonax: whom Cæſar calleth Kings that raigned in Kent, were inſtigated by Caſsibelan ſuddainly to ſet vpon, and to aſſault the Roman forces, that lay incamped vpon the ſea ſhore whilſt he kept Cæſar occupied further in the mayne: which thing they attempted, but failed of their hoped expectation, their men being ſlaine, three of them chaſed, and Cingetorix the chiefeſt taken captiue. This heauy newes and vnfortunate ſucceſſe, cauſed Caſsibelan to ſue vnto Cæſar, and by the meanes of Comius obtained his peace.

(4) Mandubrace a prince of the Trinobantes, but a traytor to his country; whoſe father Imanuence being ſlaine by Caſsibelan, and his owne life likewiſe ſought after, and in danger, fled vnto Cæſar into Gallia, and followed his fortunes in the wars; wherein, he was a great ſpurre vnto Cæſars forwardneſſe for Britain, both to be reuenged vpon the murtherer of his father, and to recouer the gouernment of the Trinobantes vſurped by Caſsibelan: preferring his owne ambitious deſire, and the reuenge of one mans death, before the freedome of his natiue Country, or the deaths of many his coũtrimen, that daily ſtopped the Romans paſſage with ſtreames of their blood. He recouering his chiefeſt Cty with the protection of the Romans, yeelded ſubiection, & forty hoſtages to Cæſar: whoſe example drew others to ſell their owne liberty, & to buy many miſeries at too deere a rate, and with too late repentance, him doth Beda call Androgorius.

Theſe people or ſtates, ſeeing the proceedings and happy ſucceſſe of Cæſar, after the example of the Trinobantes, whoſe chiefeſt Citie had yeelded him obedience, and were thereby ſecured, and protected from the harmes of his ſouldiers, ſent him likewiſe their ſubmiſſions, and were accepted into ſubiection: ſo ready were they to ſaue their owne ſtakes, that they left the whole to the hazard of loſſe, which ſoone after followed as an ouerflowing flood, wherein was laſtly drenched the whole Ilands liberty.

(6) Cunobeline

(6) Cunobeline (for ſo vpon his Coynes his name is inſtamped) was the ſon of Theomantius and he the ſonne of Lud (as ſay our Britiſh hiſtorians, by whom his name is corruptly written Kymbeline) he liued at Rome, and in great fauour with Auguſtus Ceſar the Emperor, by whom he was made Knight, and by his meanes the peace of Britain was continued without the paiment of their Tribute, as Fabian out of Guido de Columna hath gathered. In the foureteenth yeere of his raigne the Day-ſtar of Iacob appeared, and the rod out of Iſhai did flouriſh from the wombe of a Virgin, when the wonderfull Counſellor, the mighty God and Prince of Peace, the Emmanuel with vs was borne at Beth-lehem of his maiden-mother the bleſſed Virgin Mary, and was made man like vnto vs in all things, ſinne only excepted. Theſe were the times that great Kings and Prophets deſired to ſee, but ſaw them not, when the Wolfe and the Lambe, the Leopard and the Kid, the Calfe and the Lyon fed together; for war was not heard of then in the world, but rather their ſwords were made into mattocks, and their ſpeares turned into ſithes, as the Prophets, Sibyls, and Poets from them haue affirmed. In Rome the temple of Ianus was ſhut, and in Britaine Cunobeline enioied peace with the reſt of the world, and his fame made more famous by the many Coynes inſtamped of him, and whoſe face thereon among all the Britiſh Kings was firſt inſcribed, as by theſe here inſerted doth euidently appeare, one with two faces, like vnto Ianus, and foure more with his owne, beſides three others wherein is read his name, one of them with a womans head, another with a horſe, and the third with a wreath; all theſe (if not more) are knowne to be his, which ſheweth his wealth, his fame, and his ciuill reſpect. The chiefeſt Citie for his princely reſidence was Camalodunum, now Malden in Eſſex, wonne by Claudius from the ſonnes of Cunobeline, as by the inſcription of the Coyne next enſuing appeareth, and wherein many of the Britiſh monies alſo receiued their impreſſe. This City with the free towne Verolam afterwards felt the heauy hand of mercileſſe BODVO in her reuenge againſt the Romans, who laid the beauty and gorgeous buildings thereof ſo leuell with the earth that thoſe walles and mounted turrets neuer ſince aſpired to halfe their wonted heights.

(7) Adminius the first ſonne of Cunobeline, King of the Britaines, by Suetonius his report, vpon ſome offence was baniſhed the Iland by his father; and with a ſmall traine fled ouer the ſeas into Belgia; where Caius Caligula was in making his ridiculous expedition againſt the Ocean. And yeelding himſelfe to his protection, added matter to his vaine glorious humors, as of a great victory and conqueſt; ſending the newes therof to Rome, with an eſpeciall command that his letters ſhould be deliuered in the Temple of Mars, and that in the aſſembly of a full Senate. It is iudged by learned Cambden that the Roman Coyne aboue prefixed, vpon whoſe reuerſe is inſcribed Metropolis Etiminij Regis, to be meant of this Adminius the ſonne of Cunobeline, whoſe Citie Camalodunum, Claudius Caſar the Emperour afterwards wonne, and wherein a temple was built and conſecrated vnto him, attended by the Prieſts Auguſtals: which heauily burdened the poore eſtates of the Britaines.

Sueton. in vita Caligula, fol. 44.

(8) Catacratus another ſon of Cunobeline, immediatly after the death of his father, found himſelf agreeued at the Romans, for the retaining of certaine fugitiues the betraiers of their natiue country; whereof one Bericus was a chiefe, and a great firebrand of Claudius his attempts againſt the Britains. This Catacratus maintained reſiſtance againſt Aulus Plautius the Emperors Deputy, with ſuch noble reſolution and warlike encounters, that often he endangered both his perſon and army. But Fortune and victory attending the Romans, brought at length Catacratus their captiue into bands, with great ſlaughters of his Britaines, himſelfe led ſhortly after in great triumph through Rome, in honor of Plautius his ſo fortunate ſucceſſe. The miſeries of others thus made the Romans to mount the chaire of their triumphs; and the chaines of their captiues, the records of their preſent aſpired pride.

Dio calls him Catacratus.

But the bordering Dobuni ſeeing his fall, made their owne ſtandings ſurer by yeelding themſelues ſubiects to Rome.

(9) Togodumnus the third ſonne of Cunobeline, and ſucceſſor to Catacratus, proſecuted his countries quarrell with the like boldneſſe and reſolution as his brother before him had done: & was the only touchſtone that gaue Veſpaſian his luſtre, whoſe interpoſitions (as Tacitus ſaith) was the beginning of that greatneſſe whereunto afterwards he aſpired. And with ſuch manhood followed the chaſe of the Romans, that in a bloody battell he ended his life, and brought Plautius their Lieutenant vnto a ſtand, where ſtraitned in dangers both of place and people, he was forced to ſend to Claudius the Emperor; whoſe conceit was then grounded, that in Britaine was greateſt glory to be gotten, and therefore came to his aſſiſtance in perſon himſelfe, the firſt ſince Iulius Caſar that attempted their conqueſt. His recorded compoſitions made with Aruiragus, the mariage of his daughter and building of Gloceſter, I leaue to be read out of Geffrey of Monmouth, and to be allowed at the choice of his hearer; only noting that the poſſeſſion of ſo faire a land drew the affection and aged perſon of this Emperor to vndergoe ſo farre diſtant and dangerous a iournie, as this of Britaine lay from Rome.

vſe Kings themſelues for inſtruments of bondage, both in admittance of their authority, and in protecting them againſt their oppoſits. Other memoriall of him none remaineth, but that he is reported to haue reſted euer moſt faithfull to the Romans, and was of them accordingly eſteemed, albeit his owne people bare him no ſuch good will, but rather accounted him and others his like, to be Romes only inſtruments, and Britaines vipers, that brought in ſtrangers to eat out the home-bred inhabitants, and fettered the freedome of their land, with the heauy chaines of a forrein ſubiection.

(11) Caractacus the moſt renowned prince of the Silures, in nine yeeres reſiſtance waded through many aduentures againſt the common enemy. For when as the Icenians, Cangi, and Brigantes began to faint and giue ouer, he only with the Ordouices held out with ſuch ſeruice and fame, that thereby he grew both famous and fearefull to the Romans. But Deſtinies determining the downfall of Britain, the props that were ſet to ſtay it ſtill vp, proued too ſlender and brake vnder the waight. For this bold Caractacus ouerthrown in battell, his wife, daughter, and brethren taken priſoners, and his forces defeated, committed himſelfe to the protection of Cartiſmandua the Brigantes faithleſſe Queene: who by her was deliuered to the Romans; and by P. Oſtorius brought to Rome; where beholding the riches and glory of that City, he openly and boldly checked the auarice and ambitious humors of the Romans, who being owners of ſo great and glorious things, were (notwithſtanding) couetous and greedy for the poore poſſeſſions of the Britains. And there being led in triumph, with admiration he was beheld of all the ſpectators, and for his vndanted ſpirit and magnanimous reſolution releaſed of bands, and taken into fauour by Claudius the Emperor. And the Lords of the Senate aſſembled together made glorious diſcourſes touching Caractacus captiuity, affirming it to be no leſſe honorable then when P. Scipio ſhewed Syphax vnto the people, and L. Paulus, Perſes, or if any other had exhibited to the view of the people kings vanquiſhed and ouercome. The Britiſh Coyne here aboue ſhewed, by the ſcattered letters therein inſcribed, is by the iudicious obſeruers of ſuch ancient monies ſuppoſed to be his.

Tacit. Annal. 12. cap. 8.

(12) Venutius, a famous King of the Brigantes, and husband to Cartiſmandua, (a woman of an high and noble linage, but of a baſe and vnſatiſfied luſt:) finding his bed abuſed by Vellocatus his ſeruant and harneſſe-bearer, raiſed his power againſt her, and her paramour. With him ſided his Brigantes, and the neighbour countries adioining, whoſe good will went generally with the lawfull husband, fearing the ambitious authority of a luſtfull woman. With her went the Romans, at the command of Didius their Deputie: and theſe ſtriking battell won the day: yet ſo, as the war continued to the Romans, the kingdome to Venutius, and the infamy with Cartiſmandua, both for betraying the pledge of her truſt repoſed by Caractacus in his diſtreſſe, and her truth to Venutius her noble Lord and husband: preferring the licentious pleaſures of a vaſſall, before the bed of chaſt mariage, or the nuptiall imbracements of a worthy King, and hath to ages following left her name noted with the ſcarres of infamy, that time nor continuance ſhall euer weare away. His ancient coyne is thought to be as thou ſeeſt here aboue deſcribed.

(13) Praſutagus, Boduo } King and Queene of the Icenians, a people vnſhaken by war, and themſelues rich, (as Tacitus reporteth;) the only cauſe of their ruines, for which the Romans then warred; were brought to deſtruction vpon this inſuing occaſion. King Praſutagus dying, by will left Nero his heire (ſuppoſing by this meanes to leaue his ſtate the ſafer,) together with the protection of his two daughters. Theſe, contrary to truſt, were abuſed and defloured, the mother Boduo turned out of all, and againſt all manly ciuility, or womanly (much leſſe, princely) reſpect, contumeliouſly and deſpitefully whipped. In the reuenge of which vnſufferable wrongs ſhe ſo oppoſed and oppreſſed the Romans, that at one battell ſeuenty thouſand (or as Dion Caſſius ſaith 80000. of their ſlaughtered bodies ſhe ſacrificed to her dead husbands ghoſt; and hath left the fame of her proceedings regiſtred, euen by her enemies themſelues, to her immortall and neuer dying memory. The ſtrong Cities, Camalodunum, and Verolanium, lanium, ſhe ſacked with the rage of mercileſſe war; Petilius, Lieutenant of the ninth Legion, ſhe diſcomfited, Catus the Procurator droue ouer the ſeas, Poſthumus the Campe-maſter durſt not reſiſt her, and all indeed feared the valour of this heroick Lady: whoſe lawes were not martiall to ſaue vpon ranſome: whoſe reuenge was not pacified with yeeldings or ſubmiſſion, nor did ſhe thinke there was blood enough in the Romans to imbrue the altars of her aſſiſting gods, or to waſh off the ſtaine of their vnnoble and vnmanly iniuries. But when ſucceſſe altered; after loſſe, and valorous reſiſtance, ſhe made an end of her life by poiſon, leſt liuing ſhe ſhould ſee either her owne miſeries in their triumphs, or leaue her remembrance in the records of their lauiſh and ſelfe-pleaſing hiſtorians. Her Coyne of gold we haue here expreſſed, the forme ſhield-like, and vpon the emboſſement thus inſcribed: BODVO.

(14) Aruiragus, the valiant Britiſh King, whom Humfrey Lhuyd confidently affirmeth to be the ſame man that is called Meurigus, and is ſaid to withſtand Claudius in his enterpriſes for Britaine, vntill a compoſition of mariage was concluded betwixt the Emperors daughter and himſelfe. Notwithſtanding by Iuuenal it is plaine, that this Aruiragus was in his fame in the daies of Domitian, vnto whom the Poet, as a Prophet, would foredoome his happy ſucceſſe in the diſpoſſeſſion of his gouernment ouer the Britaines, as in theſe his verſes are ſeene;

It bodes great honor to thy ſelfe, ſome King thou ſhalt deprive,
Or els Aruiragus from the rule of Britains waine ſhalt driue.

An ancient Britiſh Coyne of ſiluer is here inſerted, and a mans head thereon inſtamped, which is ſuppoſed to be his, the letters alluding ſo neere to his name.

(15) Galgacus, a worthy and moſt valiant prince of the Caledonians, for vertue, and birth, preferred before any other in the Northern parts of this Iland, and made their Generall againſt the inuaſions of Iulius Agricola, was the laſt Britaine, that againſt the Romans ſtood out: accounting thoſe only happy, which were free from the contagion of that Roman tyranny, and themſelues the flower of all the Britiſh nobility, that yet had not ſubiected their necks to their yoke. The reſiſtance which he made was great and warlike, but againſt the decree of God no man can ſtand; for the Romans, riſen to their greatneſſe, bare downe all that withſtood them; and in a bloody battaile ſubdued him, and his forces, making all ſilent before them where they came, and leauing deſolation in the places where they had been. Thus then was the whole Iland ſubiected to the Roman Emperors, about one hundred thirty and ſix yeeres after Cæſars firſt entrance, and the land that had been ruled by many petty kings, was brought now (as moſt parts of the world beſides were) vnder the gouernment of one abſolute Monarch. Grieuous, no doubt, was the loſſe of their liberties, but a greater gaine was gotten not many yeeres after; for from the rude and ſauage manners of the barbarous, they were reclaimed, and became moſt ciuill. And he that had giuen their Iland to his Chriſt, prepared their hearts to receiue him their King; vnto whoſe ſubiection alſo they were motiues to the Romans themſelues. Two ancient Britiſh Coynes ſtamped in ſiluer we haue here ſet downe, attributing them both to this Galgacus of Caledonia. Notwithſtanding in theſe (as in the reſt) I muſt ſubmit my ſelfe to the more experienced, and the cenſures of theſe ancient things to the learned and more iudicious. Pſal.2.

(16) Theſe then were the reſiſters of the Romans proceedings, that rather yeelded their breſts to the ſword, then their necks to the yoke of a forrein ſubiection, and made their aſſaulters more famous in their conqueſts, and themſelues more renowned to following poſterities: neither in theſe relations haue we followed the records of our owne, but the approued teſtimony of their beſt writers, who haue deliuered what we haue ſaid, and no doubt felt the like repugnancy of many others, both in the South and North of this Iland, though their names died with their valiant reſiſtance. And as theſe Britains held the Romans at euen hand the ſpace of one hundred thirty and ſix yeeres, neither yet then were ſubdued without themſelues, that euer ſided with the enemy againſt themſelues, and whoſe factions made way for the feet of their conquerors, as from Tacitus we haue declared: So their ſucceſſors the Saxons found as warlike withſtanders, till God for Britains ſinnes had caſt downe their ſtrength, whereof more ſhall follow (Chriſt aſſiſting) in the due place of their ſtories, that from the raigne of Vortigerne the ſcourge of of his country to Cadwallader the laſt prince of the Britains, ſpent their liues in the quarrell of liberty, and hath left their memorials famous for their countries defence.

(17) But the ſtate of kingdomes (how largely ſo euer extended, or by what humane wiſedome ſtrengthned with defence) do find their periods not to exceed much the number of ſix hundred yeeres, as by common experience among moſt nations is ſeene. In theſe times therefore when the world was ſhaken with wars, firſt by the Romans that ſtroue to mount hie the ſpires of their intended glory, and were by Gods decree appointed to ouerrun and afflict the earth, when Kings of people (I ſay) were enforced to lay the Crownes from their heads at their conquering feet; and free nations loaded with the yokes of their bondage: then was fulfilled the reſolution of this queſtion demanded, Alas who ſhall liue when God doth this? And then among the reſt, Britaine gaue place to neceſſity with as manlike reſiſtance as did ſtates more ſtronger, or kingdomes confined with far more larger compaſſe. And Cæſar himſelfe bought his entrance with ſuch loſſe to the Romans that no Emperor after aſſaied the like, before aged Claudius, whoſe opinion was, that thence the remembrance of his ſucceeding glory ſhould wholly ariſe.

But when the props of that Empire began for to faile, as nothing can bee firme in this ſtill-wearing world, the Saxons, for their valour a ſecond triumphant nation, began as it were where the Romans left: for beſides the continuall poſſeſſion of their owne country, as in that caſe vnpartiall Tacitus doth tell vs; their legions were tranſported into all parts of the world, and without whom almoſt no victory was wonne: of whoſe power and proweſſe in the expeditions of warre both Dionyſius, Arrianus and Seneca, doe ſpeake. To theſe then likewiſe if the Britains gaue place, their lots came foorth with the like price of the reſt, and in this Iland they bought their conqueſts as deere as they had done in any other part of the world. Neither was Britaine ſubdued by either of theſe nations, or their inuerſion and exchange of policie altered, but with as vnwilling ſubiection and ſtreames of blood as had been ſuſed out of the ſides of their mightier nations, or by them had bin tamed to follow their triumphal chariots. And more honour attributed to paſſe theſe Britiſh ſeas, with more admiration only to ſee the Iland it ſelfe, then was vſually conceiued of kingdomes more larger, or that lay iacent as farre from Rome. And the conqueſt of ſome ſmall parts of Britaine in no ſmall ſelfe-glory to be inſcribed as trophies of their victories vpon their Coynes, and to giue ſirnames to the Emperors and their ſonnes: as ſhall be ſhewed, when the age of this hiſtory ſhall be increaſed with the times of the Romans affaires in this Iland. Free from ſubiection before the attempts of Caius Iulius Cæſar by the teſtimony of Diodorus Siculus, and neuer had yeelded to any forrein power, as not prouoked by Dionyſius or Hercules, nor inforced by any to maintaine their liberties by the feats of warre. But Cæſar in Gallia thirſting after nouelties, or his conceited humor to purchaſe renowne, made the ſea ſeeme ſafe from dangers in paſſage, and himſelfe reſolute to venture his perſon amongſt thoſe bold and barbarous Britains: wherein he left no meanes vnaſſaied for their conqueſt and ſubiection, nor his ſucceſſors omitted any prouident care to retaine and keepe the land in their poſſeſſions, which whilſt it ſtood a prouince in their obedience was held and accounted the faireſt plume in their triumphant Diadem, and the loſſe thereof (if no more but only in name) as was publikely affirmed, wold proue a great detriment to the Empire. This made the Romans to deſire it as they did, who beſides the great glory they conceiued in the conqueſt, made it the granary for the weſterne gariſons, beſides the delicate prouiſions for their Emperors owne tables.

And the German Saxons ſtraitned in their owne countries through increaſe of their people, or haply to ſupply their owne wants, infeſted with piracies theſe Weſt parts of the world, and among all others ſet the eie of their affections vpon this moſt beautifull Iland, and neuer left their attempts vnaſſaulted till they ſet the glorious diadem thereof vpon their owne heads. Changing the name Britannia into Anglia, a terme moſt fit to expreſſe that ſubiect, and pleaſing in ſound as Angelicall like, neither haue themſelues proued vnworthy of ſo rich a poſſeſſion, that in wars haue maintained, and by voiages made known her fame as far as the ſunne hath his beames, or the endleſſe Ocean her ebbes and tides. But of theſe things wee ſhall haue occaſion hereafter.

And now addreſſe our ſelues to deſcribe our ancient Britaines, and to ſhew their true pictures as they are reported. At firſt rude and vnciuil (I taske them no further then all others then were in the world, ſome few excepted that were only taught by God) and with the firſt were reclaimed to a more ciuill reſpect, both in their apparell and apprehenſion of literature; whoſe pictures in the Chapter ſucceeding we will demonſtrate as they are deſcribed by Cæſar, Pliny, Dio, Herodian and others; at firſt altogether naked, cut, and painted as thou ſeeſt, afterwards partly clad in imitation of others which frequented their country either for traffick or conqueſt; in both which manner take them as they are reported to bee by theſe authours, and impute no liberty in the draught to the workmans beſt liking, nor thy ſelfe any whit diſparaged to be brought from ſuch parents, which here are ſet as the pillars ſpoken of by Ioſephus, that after the flood did preſerue the inuented ſcience of the celeſtiall bodies, leſt time or elements ſhould conſume that knowledge or deuoure thoſe rules before demonſtrated: So the true portrature of our ancient progenitors may by theſe be preſerued from the ruines of time & made our motiues to be thankful vnto him that hath brought vs forth in theſe moſt ciuill times, and not only clad vs with the garments of humanity, but by his ſpirit hath guided vs vnto a celeſtiall knowledge.

CHAPTER VII.

THe vnderstanding and apprehensions of men clouded in ignorance, are by a Great Philosopher compared to the eye-sight of such men, as stand and behold things afarre-off; because both of these, though they apprehend some generall shapes and notices, yet can they not discerne of the true proportions and proprieties of their Obiects. The like happeneth in the search and survey, as of all other Nations, so of our owne, of our first beginnings, our antique Customes, behauiours, habits: the true Circumstances whereof are the more difficill to find, in that those things are not onely remote many degrees beyond the kenning of our Eye, (yea so manie Ages from the times wherein we liue,) but are also shadowed and enwrapped in manifold vncertainties and contrarieties, wherewith euen those Writers haue perplexed our way, who vndertooke to be both our Guides and our Lights. Notwithstanding, our purpose being to propose vnto the eye of our now glorious and gorgious Britaines, some generall draughts of our poore and rude Progenitours, (that as King Agathocles in his chiefe feasts vsed onely earthen dishes to put himselfe in minde that his Father was but a Potter, so wee may remember that true British Nobilitie is more in Vertue then in Aunceſtors,) let vs first see what the principall notes and markes are whereby the persons of those first Britaines were made so remarkeable among all other Nations.

Aristotle.

The reason why Nations Originals are so hardly found out.

(2) These Notes were chiefly three; first, their going naked; secondly, their staining and colouring of their whole Bodies; thirdly, their cutting, pincking and pouncing of their flesh, with garnishments (for so they thought them) of sundry shapes and fashions, as the two first ensuing Icones or Portraitures doe represent. Touching all which, the reports of Authors are very discrepant: and therefore, sith light is gotten out by collision of flintes, wee will essay, whether out of those Writers contradictions (brought to the stroke, and confronted together) we may strike some glimering light to direct vs how to paint them forth, who so delighted in painting themselues.

The three chiefe notes of the Britaines.

(3) First touching their going naked, the authority of Cæsar must ouersway (as being auncienteſt) the too-generall reports of such others, as seeme to relate that the Britaines generally vsed no Couerture, as neglectiue either of weathers iniurie, or of ciuill modesty; for he saith, interiores plerique pellibus sunt vestiti: the In-land men for the most part were clad with skinnes. And yet these Inlanders were the rudest of all the rest, the Kentish and Sea-borders being full of humanity and little differing from the French ciuilitie.

Cæsar.

So that when Herodian saith, Vestis vsum non cognoscunt, nec induuntur quidem, They neither know the vse of Garments: nor put any on: either he speaks on heare-say; or his large report must bee restrained to some certaine Persons, Times, and Places. And for certaine Persons and Times indeed Plynie somewhat limits it, saying, that their married weomen, both elder and yonger, (coniuges, nurusq;) in certaine festiuals vsed to goe starke naked: so doth Dio also for certaine Places: in their Tents (saith he) they liued naked and vnshod, where he seemeth to allow them some couerture abroade. The like may be supposed in time of Winter or War, where Herodian himselfe saith onely, pleraq; corporis nudi, A great part of their body was bare.

(4) It may seeme hereby, that those Originals of Particular Nations were not much vnlike that first beginning of the vniuersall prosemination of Mankind, when our first Parents innocencie walked in naked simplicitie: the foundations of all things being, as fartheſt from our sight, so more simple and farre from those artificiall fraudes, which some call Wit and cunning. And though an *ancient Father be mistaken, in conceauing that by the foure letters of the name of Adam, were signified the foure quarters of the World, (that being an Hebrue name of three letters, and not a Greeke of foure) yet all those Quarters of the World participate somewhat of Adams dispositions; and as all Naturall things retourne by course to that whereof first they were framed, so if Lawes, discipline, and Customes, did not restraine men, they would in time, of themselues reuolue to that first neglectiue condition, and careleſsenes of those outward respects whence men are now named Ciuill.

*Saint Cyprian interprets. A anatole, East. D. dusis, West. A. arctos, North. M. mesimbriat. South.

(5) But in our Britaines, three reasons there seeme of this their going vncloathed. First, their hardines, which was partly naturall, and partly acquired by practise of their bodies to durance: of whom Dio records that all of them had an excellent habit in tolerating hunger, cold, and labours, insomuch as they could endure to abide many daies together in the water vp to the chinne without any food at all; that they would liue in the woods on roots and barkes of trees; though one kind of foode he there mencioneth vnknowne in our times, whereof vsing to make as much as a beane onely, they were not subiect either to hunger or thirst. No maruaile, if those, who would endure this, could endure the want of garments: especially in a soile whereof wee find this Euloge. Tu nimium nec strictà gelu, &c.

Nor freezing cold, nor scorching hot thou art;
Twixt both thou hold'st the meane and pleasing'st part.

The like patience we find euen now not onely in the wilder Irish, and Virgineans, but in rogues and Wanderers of our owne Country, who often pittileſse of themſelues voluntarily depriue their Bodies of this Protection againſt the Aires offence, to procure pittie of others. And what ſpeake we of theſe? ſeeing euen children for Cuſtome, and Women for pride, wil ſuffer their Breaſts, and moſt tender parts of their Body, to be expoſed not only to offence of weather, but of modeſty alſo? yea generally, the handes, and faces, being of moſt ſubtileſt ſence, yet by cuſtome are enabled now to endure that, which by the like cuſtome the olde Britaines endured in their whole Bodies; whereby Plutarch thinkes they vſually liued ſo long euen to the age of ſixeſcore, the externe cold keeping-in and augmenting their internall heate.

Plutarch.

2. Ignorance.

(6) As abilitie to endure colde, ſo ignorance (in many) of meanes to preuent it, may ſeeme another occaſion of theſe Britaines nakednes. The Romans (it ſeemes) in their old Conſuls times, and after, had not the skill nor vſe of Hats, Breeches, &c. That Britaine abounded with wooll and other materials for cloathing, is paſt all doubt, for which cauſe, by one Panegyrick, it is named Riche in Paſturage, which by another is thus explicated, that therein was an infinite multitude of tame cattell both with Vdders full of milke, and loaden with Fleeces to the ground. So then Woll was not wanting, but Will, or Skill, the latter in moſt likelihood: for, as Strabo ſaith, that though thoſe ſtrutting Vdders yeelded great ſtore of milk, yet ſome of them had not skill to make cheeſe, and hauing ſo rich grounds, yet had not the art of tillage, ſo their ſheepe might haue ſuch heauy fleeces, yet ſome of their Owners no cunning to keepe themſelues warme therewith. Some of them, I ſay; for otherwiſe, as Pliny, touching Tillage, giues light to Strabo, witneſſing, that others of them were ſo good Husbands as to manure their grounds with Marle, as likewiſe doth Dioſcorides, ſaying they had skill to make drinke of Barley: ſo probable is it, that thoſe other who were by Cæſar and Tacitus ſaid to be ſo like the French in conditions, had alſo ſome part of their Art in fitting the Burthen of their Sheepes backes to couer their owne.

(7) The laſt reaſon of ſuch their going naked ſometimes, was out of an opinion that no cloathing ſo adorned them, as their painting and damasking of their Bodies, for which cauſe (ſaith Herodian) they would not couer themſelues, leſt then their gay painting ſhould not be ſeene: but Pomponius Mela makes doubt, whether their thus painting themſelues were for ornament or for ſome other vſe; which doubt Cæſar ſeems to reſolue, as if the men did it; becauſe it made them looke more terrible in warre.

(8) And thus we are now orderly fallen on the ſecond of thoſe three notes appropriated by Authors to our Britaines, which is their painting and ſtaining of their Bodies, which appeares by Cæſar to haue beene more vniuerſally vſed, then going naked, for all the Britaines (ſaith he) die their bodies with ſtaining. As Authours differ in the reaſon of this their painting, (as we ſhewed) ſo in the name, perchance alſo in the ſubſtance of that wherewith they ſtained themſelues, and ſomewhat alſo in the colour it ſelfe. The ſubſtance Cæſar calles luteum, which yet in vulgar acception is thought to be ſome yellow ſubſtance, as Pliny cals luteum oui, the yolke of the Egge; Pliny himſelfe ſaith the Frenchmen call it glaſtum, deſcribing it to be an herbe like Plantayne, which Oribaſius (as learned Cambden ſheweth) doth terme Vitrum, in which ſenſe Mela is vnderſtood, to ſay, that they were ſtained Vitro (and not Vltrò), it being generally taken to be Woad, from thoſe ancient times hitherto vſed for theſureſt ſtaine. But for the colour which is made, Cæſar and the reſt agree, it was Cæruleus, blewiſh or azure, which colour the Cambro-Britannes doe yet call glace, whence our glaſſe for windowes (called alſo vitrum) ſeemeth by reaſon of the colour, to haue taken name. Onely Pliny leaueth ſome ſcruple, in ſaying, that the naked painted women imitated the Æthiopian colour; which muſt be vnderſtood either comparatiuely, in reſpect of People white and vnpainted, or becauſe blew a farre-of hath the appearance of blacke.

(9) That the Britaines tooke their Name from this this painting, hath beene already ſhewed out of Iſidore, who writes, that they had that name from a word of their owne language, wherein Breeth ſignifieth as much as painted or ſtained; but whether thoſe other Inhabitants of the more Northerne parts of this Iland, called alſo Picti or painted, had their name vpon the ſame ground, & whether they were ſome branch of the Britiſh ſtocke, or of ſome tranſmarine Colonie, it is a queſtion not yet decided. Pomponius Lætus, and ſome other, deriue them from Germany, ſome from the Pictones in France; but Beda, from Scythia, whence ſaith hee, they are reported to haue come into Ireland in a few long bottomes, and finding no ſeating there to haue entered into Britaine. Though Beda his authoritie be venerable, yet the learned find reaſons to induce them rather to beleeue, that they were the remaines of thoſe ancient Britaines which either inhabited the North-part of this Iland, before the Romanes entrance, or which (vpon their Conqueſt) fled thether to auoid the Romiſh yoake, where the difficulties of the aire & ſoile protected them from the Romanes ambition and inuaſion. Whereto Tacitus well accordeth, ſaying, that Agricola droue the Romanes Enemies (he meanes the more vntractable Britaines) into thoſe parts, as it were into another Iland. And it is thought incredible, that thoſe Enemies of the Romanes, who ſent forth againſt Agricola an Army of thirty thouſand ſtrong, and who ſo vexed Seuerus, that in one Expedition he loſte ſeuenty thouſand of his Romanes, & their Aiders were ſo vtterly extinct, as that none of them remained; but that rather they wonderfully multiplied, being thoſe who afterward much perplexed and ouerran the Romane Prouince, and to whom (not vnlikely) ſome other, ſuch as Beda mentioneth, did afterward ioine themſelues.

Iſidore. What the Picts were.

(10) If we would adde reaſons vnto Authorities, to proue that theſe Picts were no other then that multiplied offſpring of thoſe Britaines, we could produce their* language, their manners, their kind of Gouernment (all bearing Britiſh Reſemblance) to confirme the ſame. But what neede? ſince the ſelfe-manner of painting is an vndoubted marke in the Children repreſenting of what Parents they were borne. That they were painted, Claudian ſhewes, calling them, The Pictes, ſo truly named; which Iſidore well expounds, The Pictiſh Nation had their name from their Bodie, depainted with the iuice of an herbe growing amongſt them. When therefore the Romanes excluded them from their other Prouinciall Britaines, this name (Pictes) for diſtinctions ſake was in vſe amongſt them; before which times, yea and long after, they were knowne to Writers by no other name then Britaines, and the Romaine Emperor, Commodus, Seuerus, Baſſianus, Geta, vpon the Conqueſts of them, inſtiled themſelues Britannici, Britiſh (not Pictiſh) Conquerors. But after the Romane tongue had preuailed with the Romane ſword, the Britaines themſelues vſed to name any thing painted by the name of Picte; as may bee gathered out of Vegetius, who ſaith, that the Britanes called certaine Shallops, Picts, becauſe their ſailes, tackle, and Marriners apparell, were coloured blew, the very colour, wherewith theſe Britiſh Pictes (as * ſomewhere they are truely called) vſed to ſtaine themſelues. When afterward the Iriſh-Scots had confederated themſelues with theſe againſt the Romanes, they all beganne by degrees to be more ciuilized: the more Southerly of them being by Ninian the Britaine conuerted vnto Chriſt, about the yeere of Grace 430. thoſe other more Northward, by Columbanus Anno 565. by which time, it is likely, that Ciuilitie increaſing, their painting and other like ruder Cuſtomes were well nigh forgotten, both amongſt them, and alſo amongſt thoſe other Britaines vnder the Romanes Gouernment. In which regard we haue beſides thoſe præfixed Icones, and Patternes of their firſt and moſt ſauaged times, here added alſo their Habits, when they beganne to put on, with conditions, a little better cloathing alſo.

colouring of their Bodies: for beſides it, ſome other belliſhments they had, which they eſteemed much more gracefull, then either their painting was, or any Cloathes could be. Which of the Britaines, Solinus thus deliuereth: The Country is in part (note that he makes it not generall) inhabited by People barbarous, who by artificial formes of inciſion haue from their Childhood ſundry ſhapes of Beaſts depourtraied in their bodies, and as their limmes increaſe in growth, ſo doth the pictured worke together therewith, neither doth theſe wild People boaſt of any greater kind of patience, then in bearing long-laſting ſcarres, where the paint had deeply ſuncke into their ſliced fleſh. The very paralell whereof is alſo by Iſidore ſet downe touching our Picts whoſe bodies ſliced and pinked be an artificiall punchion, did ſuck in the iuice of the ſtayning herb, carying theſe raſures on their pictured limmes, as badges of their Noblenes, thus endamasked. Neither only the ſhapes of Beaſts, but of all other things, were ſo printed in their fleſh; which Herodian takes to bee the prime reaſon, why they delighted to goe naked, leaſt they ſhould hide theſe their pleaſing garniſhments. Where alſo by the way may be obſerued, ſince Solinus ſaith that the barbarous onely vſed ſo to doe, and Herodian, that thoſe who did ſo, vſed therefore to goe naked; that therefore not the Britaines in generall, but the moſt barbarous of them vſed to goe naked. And very anſwerable to Solinus, (who elegantly calleth ſuch their figuring of themſelues, inſcriptis viſceribus, a writing on their Bodies,) is that of Claudian, Perlegit exanimes Picto moriente figuras, On dying Picts he reades the breathles ſhapes, as if the beaſts ſo liuely portraited on them, ſeemed to lie dead together with the murdered bodies of the Picts.

But for their Virgins, their whole Body was garniſhed ouer with the ſhapes of all the faireſt kinds of flowers & herbes; which (to ſpeake indifferently) could not but yeeld, though a ſtrange, yet no vnpleaſing aſpect. Whereas the Men were (as Cæſar ſpeakes) very horrible to bee looked on, hauing all their breaſt & bodie diſfigured with vgly Beaſts, Serpents, rauenous Birdes, ſcales and finnes of fiſhes &c. In which relation yet, this ſcruple will not eaſily be remoued (if it bee true, that from their childhood their prints encreaſed with their bodies) how thoſe, who being Virgins had no prints but of herbes and flowers, becomming Wiues were ſo eaſily tranſformed either into Beaſts or heauenly Creatures.

But about their necks they wore a round circle of Iron (as an ornament no leſſe eſteemed then gold with other Nations) as alſo about their waſte, whereat they hung their skeines: being doubtleſſe, a moſt warlike Nation, (as their poſterity haue euer ſince proued,) and moſt deſirous to ſpill blood, wherein yet their Offſpring by diuine bleſſing are now moſt different from their Anceſtors.

THE SVCCESSION OF THE MONARCHS OF GREAT BRITAINE IN THE TIME OF THE ROMANS, WITH AN HISTORICALL RELATION OF THE LIVES, ACTS, AND GOVERNMENTS OF THEIR EMPEROVRS AND LIEVTENANTS:

So farre as toucheth the affaires of this Iland, and so long as it stood a Prouince to that Empire.

BOOKE VI. CHAPTER I.

The Romans the second possessors of this Iland. Iulius Cæsar the first Roman attempter.

THE next Nation that to the Britains obtained possession, and soueraignty of this Iland, were the Romans, and of them Caius Iulius Cæsar the first; what time their State had vndergone all kinds of gouernments, and now aspired almost to their highest pitch of glory. This Cæsar bearing the office of Questorship in Spaine, and naturally disposed for great assaies, was thereto the more incited at the sight of Alexanders portraiture, standing in the temple of Hercules at * Gades, where beholding it with great admiration fell into a sudden dislike of himselfe, and (as Alexander in seeing Achilles tombe) with an ambitious, yet honorable emulation, sighed and said: Hast thou at my yeres atchieued the conquest of the whole world, my selfe hitherto hauing done no memorable act? Euer after which he disdained that his petty charge, and made suite to the Senate to be dismissed, holding that the cloude which ouershadowed his following and (soone after) flowing fortunes. And forthwith returning to Rome obserued euery occasion that might make him gratious in the peoples eies, hauing the aduantage of the time which then was swaied with most dislikes: and entring into many factions, yea and some of them not without suspition of conspiracy, did notwithstanding so manage his proceedings, that their constructions were euer made honorable, and himselfe the man by all assents that did support the glory of their State; vnto whom offices of high dignities were assigned, which daily increased his credit and power. And in the time of his Consulship, tooke vpon him the gouernment of Gallia, where he remained ten yeeres together, and forbare no occasion for warre, were it neuer so vniust or dangerous: Insomuch that framing a Bridge of wood ouer the broad and swift riuer Rhene, he entred the country of the Sweuians, being the first Romane that assailed the Germans: And thence with victory returning, found his charge the Gaules in quiet: both which fortunes were as spurres to his aspiring minde, and set his thoughts to worke vpon other attempts.

(2) For now intending a voiage into Britaine, he prepared thitherward, as well to inlarge the extent of his ambition and glory, as to satisfy himselfe with the sight and seate of the Iland, as for a further knowledge of those people the inhabitants, after whom he had most diligently inquired, yet by no relation could find content. But his pretence was reuenge against the Britains, for that thence (as himselfe speaketh) the Gaules had receiued most of their supplies against him in all his warres, or as some haue written, for the desire of Pearles that therein plentifully grew, whose beauty and weight he had oft obserued.

Causes of Cæsars inuasion.

Sueton. in vita Cæsar. Strabo.

But because the summer was almost spent, and that the voiage seemed dangerous through want of knowledge, either for place of entrance, or safety in harbour (for our learned countriman Roger Bacon was doubtlesse in an error, who thinketh that Cæsar set vp perspectiue glasses on the coast of France, and thence saw all the ports and creeks in England) he thought good to send one Caius Volusenus a military Tribune in a galley before him, giuing sufficient instructions for so great an enterprise in hand, himselfe drawing towards those parts of Gallia, that lay neerest coasted vnto Britaine, thence expecting his successe.

(3) These things were not so secretly done but that the Britaines receiued notice thereof, and therupon some of their priuate States sent Ambassadors with proffers of submission vnder the assurances of their hostages. Which Cæsar accepted and sent back again with liberall promises, ioining in commission with them Comius a king of the Atrebatij (for so he is stiled vpon his Coyne) a man well reputed, and respected among the Britains, that he might perswade the rest of the States to imbrace Cæsars amitie. In effecting of which businesse, some fiue daies being spent, Volusenus returned, hauing wafted vpon the coasts of Britaine so far, as with safety he might, which was no further then to view it with the eie, his foot not daring to tread the shoare replenished with those barbarous people, as it pleased the Romans to terme the Britaines: His discouerie and relation gaue small encouragements to Cæsars hoped successe, and had not the Morines yeelded him their obedience, it may be thought his voiage at that season had been staied.

(4) But now composing his affaires in Gallia, and hauing ready an hundred ships (wanting but two) besides many Gallies also for transporting his army, he loosed from the shoare, hauing a good wind, about the third watch of the night, taking order for his horsemen to imbarke with all speed and follow after him; himselfe early in the morning attained the sight of Britaine, whose cliffes he found couered with armed men, and place for entrance so naturally beset and strengthned with steepe hills and rocks, that hee there cast anchor, and called to counsell the Legats and Tribunes, declaring vnto them the danger of the hauen that gaue such aduantage to their enemy, whose darts from the higher ground might much impeach their arriuage, and therefore determined their landing elsewhere.

(5) Their Counsell was no sooner dismissed, but Cæsar both tide and wind fitting him, not foreslowing the occasion, gaue signe of remoue, and some eight miles distant came to * a plaine and open shoare, and made preparation to land his men. Thither also the Britaines had remooued part of their forces, and so valiantly withstood the enemies, that Cæsar himselfe, though wholly addicted to honor himselfe and his Romans, yet confesseth that his army was sore ouerlaid and terrified with that incounter: and had they not been assisted from the Gallies with an vnusuall kind of Engines, which did beat backe the Britaines (vnexpert of that strange manner of assault) from the shoare, the Romans had not set foot on British soile, neither durst they then aduenture it, vntill the standard-bearer for the tenth legion desperately leapt foorth of the ship with his Eagle, calling on the danted souldiers and asking whether they would dastardly forsake their ensigne and betray it through cowardize to the enemy? which opprobry prouoked them to follow his example, and so they got the shoare after an encounter fierce and terrible on both parts, as Cæsar acknowledgeth. But the first of all (euen before the Stander-bearer) who put courage into the Romans and taught them how to deale, was (as testifieth Eutropius) one Scæua a Britaine (who formerly had fled to Cæsar) and guiding foure other souldiers in a boat to a rock nere the shore, where the tide leauing them, his fellowes slunke backe in the boat, but hee most boldly defended himselfe from the rocke against the Britains, like a Beare at a stake among a multitude of mastiues, till hauing all his armour broken in peeces and himselfe all wounded with darts, he swamme to the fleet; and begging pardon for his foole-heady forwardnesse, Cæsar both forgaue him, and rewarded his valour with the honour of a Centurion: and hee did Cæsar afterwards noble seruice at Dyrrachium in the ciuill warres. Cæsar confessing, that hee alone saued the fortification against Pompey, at which time his target was shewed to Cæsar, hauing 230. holes pierced in it by the enemie, whereof Iosephus Iscanus that ancient Poet of Excester writeth thus:

Cæsar putteth the Britains to flight.

(6) This enterprise for landing thus atchieued, Cæsar charged so fiercely vpon the enemie, that hee put them to flight; but wanting his horsemen to follow the chase, (which as yet were not arriued) he proceeded no further, but encamped his host vpon a great plaine, not farre from the Sea, and not without likelihood thought to be Barham Downe: for so neere lay it vpon the shoare, that thence he beheld the dispersion and losse of his 18. ships (comming vnder saile with his horsemen to his assistance) through the violence of a storme, and rage of Sea.

(7) In the meane time the Britaines, that after flight had againe recouered head, and in their assemblies aduisedly considered their imminent dangers, concluded their submission for the safest remedie, and to that end sent their second Embassadours vnto Cæsar, with whom Comius before remembred was imploied, whom they had retained in strait prison for Cæsars cause, but now made him a meane to worke their peace; which was granted after some soft and gentle reproofes, with hostages receiued for performance of Couenants, and resort of their Nobles to Cæsars campe, to yeeld themselues and Cities to his will.

The Britaines second ambassage to Cæsar.

(8) These Britaines, although rude in regard of the Romanes, and vnmatchable to them in educated ciuilitie, yet were so skilfull in the affaires of warre, and so ready to discerne the least aduantage, that they easily perceiued the weakenesse of Cæsars power, both in want of horsemen to equall their wagons, wherein chiefly stood the strength and order of their fight, as also of ships for seruice and safety, as occasions should be offred: whereby their mindes touching their promised submission began to wauer, and the matter with better aduice to be pleaded in their assemblies; for that not only these foresaid ships for Cæsars supply were dispersed and hindred, but euen his owne fleet, which lay then in harbour by the rage of winde and sea, (being then spring tide, and the moone in the full) was not onely filled with waues, but also their tacklings, sailes, and anchours spoiled or lost, the violent storme so dashing the bulkes one against another, that their bruised bottomes were thereby made vnfit for burden.

Cæsars ships distressed.

(9) This losse was so great, that it is accounted the first of the three aduerse fortunes which euer happened to Cæsar in all his proceedings: and it was so well obserued by the Britaines, that immediately they intended a reuolt, and in Counsell vrged this, as the materiall point that breathed hope and life to their former liberties, condemning themselues as impious if they should refuse to ioine consent with the heauens, whose elements had thus farre fought for their freedome and full deliuerance, assuring themselues (if on this aduantage they might cut off these new guests) that neuer any afterward would aduenture to enter Britanny in hostile manner.

Suetonius in vit. Cæsar.

And thereupon they began both to slacke the performance of couenants, and daily to withdraw themselues from Cæsars Campe, which gaue him iust occasion to suspect whereat they aimed. And to preuent their proceedings he as wisely wrought: for first repairing his Nauie with the huls, timber, and tackling of the most bruised ships, with the losse of twelue ships only, the rest were made able to brooke the seas. And prouiding against the aduantage of the enemie, he sent foorth the seuenth Legion for forrage to supplie any occasion.

(10) This Legion taking the coast cleere, and little surmising so sudden a reuolt, fell to the sickle and sithe like haruest labourers, and laid their weapons apart, mistrusting no Enemie. Now the Britaines as forward to put in practise what they had determined, closely had laid themselues in ambush, for thither they knew the enemie would come, a peece of corne there standing, whereas in all other parts haruest was past: and so hauing these workmen in their danger, suddenly fell vpon them, slaying some, and forcing the rest out of their array, who not knowing the order of their fight, cast themselues in a ring (the best defensiue forme of embattelling) and stood on their guard as they might: but had they not happily beene rescued, Cæsar had lost one whole Legion at that time.

The Britaines suddenly assaile the Romanes.

(11) For though this skirmish thus in acting was altogether vnknowne and vnexpected to the rest of the Romans, yet by the rising of the dust, appearing to

to the Cohorts that warded before their Campe, the ſame was miſtruſted, which cauſed Cæſar in all haſte to make thitherward with part of his hoſt.

(12) The Britaines thus preuented, ſeeing more ſupply to maintaine the battle, ſtood ſtill, without further ſtroke: and the Romanes as much amazed at this ſudden attempt, and order of their fight, made a ſtand, not venturing any further. Which order in fight ſo often mentioned, and ſo much admired, in Cæſars words we will declare, the rather becauſe ſome haue thence collected, that the Britaines were the offſpring of the Troians, who with other Eaſterne Nations only vſed this kinde of fight in Chariots.

The manner of the Britaines fight.

(13) They vſed (ſaith he) to ride in wagons againſt the approch of the enemie, and to circulate them about with a whirling compaſſe, and ratling noiſe, each waies caſting their darts as they did driue, and euer as they ſaw aduantage would winde themſelues in amongſt the horſe and foot, to breake the array; which done, they would forſake their wagons, and on foot moſt dangerouſly aſſaile the enemie. In the meane while the Wagoners would with-draw themſelues ſomewhat out of the battle, and place their wagons in ſuch order, that if their maſters were ouer-charged, they might haue ſpeedy acceſſe, and opportunity of retrait, by which meanes they were euer as quicke to moue as were horſemen, and as ſtedfaſt to ſtand the battle as were the foot, whereby they did ſupply the duties of both at once, and by daily exerciſe grew ſo expert in managing their horſes, that running them forcibly downe a ſteepe hill, they would ſtop, and turne them in the mid-way: and they would run along the beame, and ſtand firme vpon the yoke; whence with like facility they would againe returne into their Chariots.

This order Cæſar ſo well obſerued, as that notwithſtanding his deſire of reuenge, yet wanting his horſemen (as he pretended) wherein conſiſted the chiefeſt reſiſtance, hee durſt attempt no further on them, but was content to keepe the field without profer of battle.

(14) The Britaines likewiſe hopeleſſe of further ſucceſſe at that preſent, departed without any impeachment, intending to proſecute their cauſe with a greater and more generall ſupplie: and thereupon ſent meſſengers to their ſeuerall States, with notice of their hopes againſt ſo ſmall a power; whoſe Campe by them if any way might bee vanquiſhed, the purchaſe of ſpoile, beſides their freed liberties, would requite the paines.

The Britains gather a greater power.

(15) Theſe States, though maintaining ciuill factions amongſt themſelues, yet ſeeing the intended danger of this generall enemie, preſently aſſembled a great power, purpoſing yet once againe to trie the hazard and fortune of warre. Cæſar, whoſe vigilancy did euer equall his valour, prepared his armie, wherein now only 30. horſemen were preſent, and thoſe brought to him by Comius the King. The battle ioining continued not long, but that the Britaines gaue backe and fled, whom the Romanes purſued as farre as ſtrength indured, and returned with the ſlaughter of many, burning the Country where they came.

(16) Thus the Britaines once againe vanquiſhed, foorthwith ſent their third Embaſſage vnto Cæſar, deſiring peace, with promiſe of quiet ſubiection; whom he with hard termes now reproued, and impoſed a double number of hoſtages to be brought him into Gallia, whither he made all poſsible preparation, for that the Æquinoctium drew neere, doubting his crazed ſhips would hardly brooke the winter ſtormes, that vſually rage vpon theſe Seas. And hauing gotten a faire wind, imbarked all his forces about midnight, and ſo brought moſt of his fleet ſafe to the continent. CHAPTER II.

Moſt of the Britaines breake couenant with Cæſar.

ÆSAR expecting the performance of Couenants agreed vpon in the treaty of peace with the Britaines, receiued hoſtages from two of their Cities onely, and no more: the reſt drawing backe, refuſed his ſubiection: whereupon intending not to loſe ſo rich a prey, nor to ſuffer that Sunne to bee eclipſed, whoſe glory thus farre in his Horizon had aſcended, hee appeaſed ſome troubles in Gallia, and in the winter ſeaſon began his preparation to that enterpriſe. And hauing had experience of his former wants, he furniſhed himſelfe accordingly, and the next ſpring following drew his forces towards Calis, the ſhorteſt cut into Britaine. There committing the charge of Gallia to T. Labienus his Lieutenant, himſelfe with fiue Legions of ſouldiers, 2000. horſemen, and 800. ſhips, about going downe of the Sunne looſed from the ſhoare, and with a ſoft Southerne gale were carried into into the streame. But about midnight the winde failing, and their sailes becalmed, the tide diuerted their course: so that in the dawning he well perceiued his intended place for landing to be passed.

Cæsar arriue landeth at the place of his first arrival

(2) Therefore falling againe with the change of tide, and indeuours of their Oares, about noone the same day hee recouered the shoare, euen in the same place (and that without any shew of resistance) where he had found best landing the Summer before. There in conuenient manner he encamped his host, and by certaine Fugitiues got notice of the power and place of the enemie.

(3) And lest delay should afford them aduantage, he committed the gouernment of his ships at anchor to Qu. Atrius, and his campe on land to the guard of ten Cohorts, besides the strength of three hundred horsemen; and himselfe with the rest about the third watch of the night tooke their march towards the enemie, proceeding with such celeritie, that by the day dawning they were entred twelue miles higher into the Continent: where seeking to passe a riuer, which is supposed to be the water Stower, the Britaines with their darts and chariots began in most terrible manner to assault the Romanes. But being at length by them repulsed, tooke into a wood strongly fortified both by nature and mans industrie. For in the time of their owne dissensions they had formerly made this place one of their strongest fortresses, and had cut down many trees, which ouerthwart the waies of entrance they had bestowed.

Cæsar resisted at the riuer Stower.

(4) In this they secretly kept, and where they saw aduantage, would by companies sallie out vpon the enemie to their no little annoiance. Whereupon Cæsar commanded the seuenth Legion to raise a banke, and to build a Testudo of boards, couered with raw hides, by which meanes the place without much adoe was won, and the Britaines forced to forsake the woods. Whose chase Cæsar forbade both in regard the day was neere spent, as also that the countrey was altogether vnknowen to the Romanes. But the next day the pursuit being begun, sudden newes was brought from Q. Atrius, that most of his ships the night before by a violent tempest were cast on Land, their bulks shaken, their cables broken, and anchours lost. Cæsars experience in like mishaps the Summer before, made him so much more ready to preuent the worst. And therefore recalling his forces, in all haste returned to his Campe, finding the relation too true in their wracke, wherein forty of his ships were quite lost. Wherefore he wrote to Labienus his Lieutenant in Gallia for supply of ships, thence to bee sent in all haste. Then gathering his shipwrights out of the legions, with the ruines of the bruised bulkes, he repaired the whole; and now hauing twice felt the dangers of these seas, caused his whole fleet (a strange attempt) to be drawn on land, euen into the midst of the fortifications of his campe, so to secure them from the like mishap, and that one strength might defend both.

The Britains driuen from their fortresse.

Cæsars Nauie greatly impaired by tempest.

Hee draweth his fleet on shoare.

(5) In which admirable toile ten daies and nights were altogether spent, before hee could returne to the place from whence he came; where now the Britaines through great confluence of people had increased their power, and entred againe their fortresse and wood. The chiefe command of these affaires was committed to Cassibelan, whose coine wee haue heere likewise set, a Prince of good repute for feats in warre, whose Seigniory was seuered from the Cities towards the Sea, by the great and famous riuer Thamisis, and extended into the land full foure-score miles.

This Cassibelan present Gouernour of the Trinobants, had attained to the possession of their chiefest Citie by the slaughter of Imanuence their former Ruler (a man well respected, and much lamented after death) whose sonne Mandubrace, a gentleman of great hope, fearing the like danger, by the new established authoritie of Cassibelan, had made ouer into Gallia, crauing Cæsars assistance to set him in his right.

Cæsar. Com. lib. 5.

(6) Cassibelan (if among these authenticke Authors the British Writers may bee heard) was the brother of King * Lud, and in the nonage of his nephewes gouerned the Trinobants, whose bounds hee sought to enlarge vpon the bordering Countries of his neighbours, and in his fortunes had so borne himselfe, that he was much maligned, and more feared. But now all their dangers yoked alike in a common perill, they laid aside priuate grudges, and held him the only man to support the strength of their troubled and declining estate, and by a common consent made him Generall of their warres. The expectation of whose proceedings he long delaied not, but with a fierce and hot encounter did assaile the Romans, and so manfully discharged the parts of his place, that in the sight of the whole Campe Quintus Laberius a militarie Tribune was slain, (in memorie wherof the place as yet, though somewhat corruptly, is called Iul-laber) and Cæsar himselfe professeth he learned many points of martiall policie by their braue and running kinde of encountring.

(7) But his next daies seruice prooued not so fortunate; for the Romans hauing learned their owne defects by the former daies experience, laid aside their weighie armour, that with the more facilitie they might both assaile the enemies, and with like nimblenesse auoid their furie, they hauing now bestowed their powers dispersedly, and scattered their troupes into companies, wherby the Romans were still matched with fresh supplies. A policie no doubt of no small consequence, had not destiny determined the fatall subiection of the Britaines, and Fortune now raised the Romans almost to the height of their Monarchie.

(8) For this failing, the Britaines neuer after shewed themselues with any vnited resistance, but hauing lost the day departed, thinking it better to secure euerie priuate by his owne meanes, then by a generall power to hazard all, as hopelesse any more to vphold that which the heauens (they saw) would haue down. And Cassibelan himselfe despairing of happy successe, drew into his owne territories, keeping with him not aboue 4. thousand wagons. And fearing the Romans further approch, fortified the riuer Thamisis (then passable onely in one place) with sharpned stakes bound about with lead, and driuen so deepe into the bottome, that Beda and Asser report them so to remaine in their times. All which notwithstanding, the Romans passed with the repulse of their enemies, and Cæsar, who grew now to the height of his honour, marched further into the Continent, and comming forward, was met by Ambassadours from the chiefest Citie of the Trinobants, which first of all the States profered submission, and promised subiection, with this intreatie also, that Mandubrace (who being Cæsars follower, and doubtlesse the contriuer of this submission) might be Gouernour of their Citie.

Thither Cæsar came, and with little losse or labour won the place, and many of the miserable Britaines both taken and slaine. Cassibelan now despairing of his owne power, farre vnable to match, and much lesse to ouermatch his Enemies, instigated the Gouernours of Kent, being foure in number, Cingetorix, Caruilius, Taximangulus, and Segonax, (whom Cæsar termeth

Cassibelan solliciteth for peace.

(10) Cassibelan beholding these vnfortunate proceedings, feared the end of vnhappie successe, for hee saw his Country wasted, his owne designes defeated, and himselfe forsaken by the traiterous reuolt of many Cities and States on euery side. Therefore as bootlesse to bandy against fortune, he sought to hold his owne with others, and sent Comius King of the Attrebatij to be his meane to Cæsar for peace, which was the willinglier heard and granted, for that he determined to winter in Gallia, his affaires so requiring it.

A great Tribute.

So saith an old written Chronicle, the Author not named.

(11) The conditions were hard, but necessitie must be obeied: for Cæsar imposed a grieuous Tribute to be taxed of the Britaines, of no lesse then three thousand pounds yeerely to be paid, and moreouer included the safety of Mandubrace, with his Trinobantes taken into friendship, and protection of the Romans; & lastly, that these Couenants should be faithfully obserued, he cõmanded hostages for assurance forthwith to be deliuered. These things thus compounded, he tooke the Seas, about the second watch of the night, which then began to equalize the day in length, and safely arriued in the Continent of Gallia; Hauing rather shewed the place to posterities, then deliuered to the Romans the possession thereof, as Tacitus saith, supposing it his glory sufficient to vndergoe a matter so rare and difficult, and at his comming to Rome, to haue presented his British Captiues; whose strangenesse for attire and behauiour filled the peoples eies both with wonder and delight. He offred also in the Temple of Venus genitrix, a Surcoat made all of British pearles, as a Trophey and Spoile of the Ocean. And now his fortunes comming to the highest, the title of perpetuall Dictator (then which the State of Rome could affoord nothing greater) sufficed him not, but a King hee will be, and sole gouernour ouer all, though contrarie to the Law and liking of the Romanes; whereof in short time grew such heart-burning and hatred, that seuenty principall men conspired his death, and after his many dangers of enemies in battles abroad, was in the Senate-house amongst his supposed friends, and in peace (if treacherie may be called peace) cruelly murdered, receiuing in his body three and twenty wounds, whereof he died, after he had sate Emperour only fiue moneths.

British Writers vary from Cæsar.

That Cassibelan repulsed Cæsar twice.

Nenion won Cæsars sword.

Beda hist. li.1 c.2.

(12) I am not ignorant that the British Writers doe varie from Cæsar in relating these his proceedings, and speake more honourably of their owne resistance then himselfe hath set downe, namely, that by the valour of Cassibelan their King, in his first attempts hee was twice driuen backe without his purpose, and forced to take the Seas, to the great hazard of his ships and men, yea and with the losse of his owne sword, which with great prowesse was wonne from him in a single encounter by Nenion Cassibelans brother. And surely howsoeuer Polydore accounteth their Story new, and Cæsar carrieth himselfe gloriously in his owne affaires; yet by sundry other renowned writers it seemeth, that the currant of his Conquest went nothing so smooth and vntroubled, or with so little losse of the Romans, nor the Britaines liberties forgone by so easie resistance: which may be collected euen out of some couert passages of Cæsars own words, where it appeareth, that hee durst not at sundry times giue the Britaines battle, though they were only harnessed in leather, and his Souldiers were all old Legionaries of long seruice, called for their huge armour, Milites grauis armaturæ, as hauing a helmet, corslet and boots, all of massy brasse or iron, with a large target, a strong two-edged sword, and a great staffe or clubbe headed with an iron pike; which oddes notwithstanding had not Cassibelan been vndermined by Mandubrace, and traiterously forsaken (which Cæsar himselfe confesseth) by the Princes which promised him assistance, but euer maligned him, and had now a faire time of reuenge, perhaps Cæsar might haue missed this parcell of his glory. Yet for all these helpes, Lucan saith expresly of him,

Territa quæsitis ostendit terga Britannis:
He Britaines found, but left them soone by flight.

Lucan.

Eutropius saith, He was wearied out and quelled both with the fierce battles of the enemie, and crosses of tempests. Tacitus saith, Hee found out Britannie for the Romans, but could not winne it for them: which was the very cause why (as Dio witnesseth) for twenty yeeres after Cæsars entrance, Britannie kept their owne Kings and their owne lawes, and had no forraine Prefects to command them. And Beda sheweth, that Cæsar in this Land was both receiued with sharpe and sore fight, and weakened by the losse of his ships, and with the most part of his men at armes. Tacitus also, vsing the speech of Caractacus to his Souldiers, hath these words: He called (saith he) vpon the names of his Ancestors, which chased Cæsar the Dictator out of the Ile, by whom and by whose valour they were deliuered from Hatchets and Tributes, and enioied freely their wiues and childrens bodies vndefiled. Againe, in the consultations of the Britaines intending a reuolt, hee allegeth their arguments, whereof one was the sudden departure of Cæsar out of this Iland, little better then a flight. With whom Dion Cassius also agreeth, affirming that Cæsar got nothing in Britaine besides the honour and renowne of that voiage, and sight of that Country, vntill then vnknown to the Romans. And againe (saith hee) Cæsar departed thence hauing done no memorable act, which caused the Britaines to be secure and careless to prouide themselues against his second arriuage. Whereby is apparant (euen by Romane Writers) both the bold resistance that the Britaines made, and the deare subiection that the Romans bought. But in matters so farre past, it is hard for mee to auouch any thing resoluedly, vnlesse I could meet with that aged Britaine whom M. Aper conferred with heere in Britanny (as Quintilian writeth) who auowed that hee was in the British Campe when they did beat Cæsar from the shoare.

(13) Neither will I vrge that for truth, which Authours haue left vs in their reports, concerning the many prodigies before going, and forewarning his death: things rather to be accounted the superfluities of their owne pens, and vaine imageries, euer working vpon accidentall euents, and ascribing issued successe to a supernaturall cause. Such conceit had Cæsar of himselfe, that for his fortunes hee would bee stiled amongst the Gods: and his deitie to that credulous generation was further strengthned by the appearance of a blazing starre, which mooued (no doubt) an ouerlarge opinion of his humane power, and caused his glorie much to surmount it selfe. And therefore lest ignorance should any way blemish his immortalitie, they haue fained the manner of his dying best pleasing to himselfe, and many ominous signes to foreshew the same: all which he either lightly despised, or carelesly neglected, as they would haue their Readers beleeue.

(14) Such was that of Spurina his diuiner, that forewarned him of great danger, which should not passe the Ides of March. And Suetonius out of Cornelius Balbus reporteth, that in the ancient Monuments of Capua, discouered but few moneths before, was found a Table of brasse, wherein was written the manner of his murder, and the reuenge that should follow: his owne dreames the night before, wherein he seemed to flie in the clouds, and to shake hands with Iupiter: as also his wiues, that thought him stabbed in her armes, and to lie all bloody in her bosome. Besides many other obseruances both of beasts and birds, and that in such plentie, that it yeelded sufficient matter for Ouid the Poet to furnish and fill vp the latter part of his last booke of Metamorphosis. His feature, qualities, and fortunes, are by them thus described: Of personage to be tall, strong, and well limmed, faire, and full faced, with blacke

He was well learned, and therewithall very eloquent: and although so great a warriour, thirsting after fame, yet would he be easily reconciled to his enemies, yea and often times seeke the meanes first himselfe. And hee held it no lesse valour to subdue his wrath, then his enemie; as likewise in his disasters hee was of great temper and moderation, insomuch that Seneca writeth of him, that whiles he was in Britaine, hearing newes of his daughters death (which was lamented as a great losse to the whole State) hee conquered that sorrow as easily and as quickly as hee subdued all things where euer he came. And of his other moderateneſſe, Cotas (who then held the second place of honour and command in the Armie) writeth, that though Cæsar was then so great and glorious a Commander, yet he was so farre from outward pompe, as that when he came into Britannie hee had onely three seruants to attend him.

Chapter III.

AFter the death of Cæsar, thus slaine in the Senate, Octauian (the grand-childe of Iulia, Cesars sister) whom hee had adopted, and declared his heire, returned vnto Rome from * Apollonia, where he studied Philosophie, intending to prosecute the reuenge of Cæsars death; where falling at oddes with Marcus Antonius a man of great spirit and power, and setting himselfe against Brutus and Cassius, with their Complices, for the murder of his vncle, secretly wrought the friendship of the Citizens, before whose eies also Cæsars wounds seemed yet to bleed.

(2) These factions thus begun, grew to such height, that in the Senate-house their causes were pleaded, and by the instigation and eloquence of Marcus Tullius Cicero, Antonius was proclaimed enemie to the State: against whom Octauian was sent, with Ensignes of Consul, and title Proprætor, being yet not twentie yeeres of age; which duty and office he so well discharged in the parts of a valiant Captaine, that Antony was forced out of the field, albeit in this battle the one Consul was slaine, and the other deadly wounded. For which seruice so effected, he entred Rome in Triumph; though the glory thereof was much blemished, being obtained but in an inteſtine and ciuill warre. Marcus Antonius, to recouer himselfe, and make good his cause, ioined friendship with Marcus Aemilius Lepidus, Captaine of the horse, who together interposed themselues against Octauians proceedings; but by mediation of friends all three were reconciled, and iointly erected that forme of gouernment which thence was named the Triumuirat: for the establishment whereof they had seuerall iurisdictions assigned them: to Lepidus, Africa, whereof he was present Gouernour: to Antony, the Countries as well of Greece as Asia, that lay betwixt the Ionian Sea, entring at the gulfe of Venice, vnto the riuer Euphrates: and vnto Octauian all these West parts of Europe, amongst which this our Britaine was one.

But yet the truth is (as Dion Caſſius hath it) that Octauian deſirous in all things to be like vnto Cæſar, ſeeing their tribute neglected, had intended a voiage towards Britaine; but hauing ſet forwards into Gallia, he had there tidings of the ſudden reuolt of the Pannonians, againſt whom he diuerted his prepared power, and left his firſt deſignement for that time. And albeit theſe and other Heathen Writers aſcribe theſe things either to Auguſtus himſelfe, or to ſome of his fauorites, yet wee ſee them accompliſhed in none other but Ieſus Chriſt the Meſſiah our bleſſed Sauiour, in whom only the Kingdome of God began, with the vtter ſubuerſion of all their heatheniſh Oracles, which at his birth, or at furtheſt at his death, ceaſed all, and gaue place to HIS eternitie. (7) This Emperour raigned in great honour the ſpace of fifty ſix yeeres, and was obeyed both by the Eaſterne Indians, and the Northerne Scythians, with the ſubiection of the Parthians, a fierce and vntamed people, and generally with the loue of all. Hee was a Prince indued with great wiſdome, magnanimitie, and Iuſtice; yet faulty in this, that he tooke from Tiberius Nero his wife Liuia, both great with child, and hauing alſo formerly borne him a ſonne. Deuout hee was in the worſhip of the Romane Gods; amongſt whom in the Capitoll he built an Altar vnto the Hebrew childe, with this inſcription: The Altar of the firſt begotten Sonne of God: being thereunto mooued by the Oracle of Apollo that had anſwered his owne deſtruction by the birth of this childe. Of Stature he was but low, and of a good complexion; gray-eied, his haire ſomewhat yellow, and his body freckled with ſpots, which as his flatterers would haue the world beleeue, were in forme like ſtarres. Predictions foreſhewing his gouernment and death are alleged, the which I willingly ouerpaſſe, holding moſt of them rather fantaſies then truth. At his death hee demanded of the ſtanders by, whether he had well acted the enterlude of his life vpon the ſtage of this world: and died fourteene yeeres after Chriſt his incarnation; leauing after him ſo honourable an eſtimation of his glory, that as the ſucceeding Emperours in remembrance of Iulius Cæſar gloried to be called Cæſars, ſo they euer held the name of Auguſti to be ſacred, and only befitting perſons deſtinated to imperiall Maieſtie. TIBERIVS.

Chapter IV.

Auguſtus Cæſar thus glorioufly raigning, and peaceably dying, had ordained for his ſucceſſour Tiberius Nero, the ſonne of Tiberius the Patritian, and of Liuia his wife, whom (as we ſaid before) he had taken for his Empreſſe, and by whoſe incitements and continuall inſtigations that matter was procured: though Suetonius thinketh, it was by Auguſtus his owne ambitious conceit, to make himſelfe the ſooner miſſed, and the more lamented, in leauing his ſonne ſo vnlike him to ſucceed, whoſe conditions as they ſtood vpon their owne baſis, hee knew to bee both reproouеable, and alſo contemptible.

(2) But before the death of Cæſar could be diuulged, to write his imperiall ſtile as it were in blood, he began with the murder of young Agrippa the ſonne of Iulia, daughter to Octauian, and once his owne wife, and continued his raigne with ſuch tyrannie, that many he ſlaughtred, without reſpect of perſon or cauſe; and in his looſeſt laſciuiouſneſſe, thought of nothing but how to ſubuert the Nobilitie; for rare it was in his daies that any ſuch died a naturall death: and maintaining a race of men (Promoters, as Tacitus tearmes them, found out for a common ouerthrow and deſtruction of others) allured them by rewards to accuſe the rich, though guiltleſſe; only this fauour granted to the condemned, that if they ſlew themſelues before the day of execution, their bodies ſhould haue buriall, their goods not confiſcate, and their teſtament ſtand good in law.

(3) A great diſſembler he was, ſeeming euer to hate thoſe vices which in truth he loued, and to loue thoſe vertues which he did moſt deadly hate: and for life and libidinous filthineſſe ſo extreme, that a Chriſtians pen may not expreſſe, when the Heathen themſelues doe bluſh to name ſuch things as hee ſhamed not openly to commit: his publike drunkenneſſe, and continuall banquettings, whereat hee ſpent whole daies and nights together without intermiſſion, cauſed exchange of names from Tiberius Nero to * Biberius Mero.

(4) In this ſtate, amongſt others neglected, Britaine ſtood, wherein Tiberius neither maintained garriſon, nor attempted alteration, and whereby (as it may be thought) their owne Lawes and Princes bare ſway among themſelues, howſoeuer the cauſe for Tribute was ballized betwixt them. And moſt certaine it is, the Britaines, if not in ſubiection, yet were well affected to the Romanes, as appeareth by Tacitus in the kinde entertainments, and in releeuing their ſhipwracked ſouldiers, that in croſsing the Seas were by tempeſt driuen vpon their Coaſts, and courteouſlie ſent thence by their petty Kings vnto Germanicus their Generall. Notwithſtanding, Ieffrey Monmouth ſeemeth to affirme the contrary, that bringeth the raign of one Guiderius, and the valour of Aruiragus, the ſonnes of Cunobeline (of whom more heereafter) to withſtand the Romiſh Command, and vtterly to refuſe the paiment of Tribute, banding both againſt Tiberius, as alſo againſt Caligula and Claudius the Emperours ſucceeding.

He was of perſonage tall, and of body ſtrong, broad chefted, and vſed both his hands alike, faire of complexion, but great and goggle-eied, whereby he ſaw ſo cleerely as is incredible to report.

CAIVS CALIGVLA.

CHAPTER V.

Caius Caligula his parents. Tacit. Annal. lib. 1. cap. 9.

NExt vnto Tiberius ſucceeded his nephew Caius Caligula, the ſonne of Germanicus, (whoſe face is expreſſed aboue) the ſonne of Druſus. His mother was Agrippina, the daughter of Iulia, Cæſars wife; liked rather for his fathers vertues, (who was for learning, vertue, valour, and courteſie, the moſt admired man of that age) then for any parts of his owne anſwerable to ſo high a place, as being neither naturally framed for good preſence in Throne, nor qualified in minde for an Imperiall Command. Euer in condition oppoſite to all, and (which is more) moſt times to himſelfe. One while laſciuiouſly prodigall, in exceſsiue banquets, admirable Sea-workes, with needleſſe leuelling of mountaines, and filling vp their vallies: Another while extremely couetous, impoſing taxes vpon the Prouinces, and exacting gaines out of the baſe earnings of pollutions: Alwaies cruell and libidinous. His owne mother he defamed to bee inceſtuouſly begotten; his grand-mother he poiſoned; his brother Tiberius he murdered; with his three naturall ſiſters hee liued inceſtuouſly, and vpon Druſilla the ſecond (who was contented to be deflowred by him when they were both but children) he ſo incredibly doted, that he vſed to ſweare by her ſacred name, and deified her for a Goddeſſe by the name of Panthea, commanding diuine honours to bee done vnto her. The like deitie conceited he of himſelfe, cauſing his Statue to be worſhipped, and placed in his vſuall roabes amongſt the Romane Gods, and would haue ſet it in Ieruſalems Temple (as Ioſephus recordeth) had not that great God cut him off by death. His Imperiall gouernment was without either inlargement of circuit, or inforcing by armes a dutifull ſubiection, rather ſeeking to make himſelfe himselfe feared by Tyrannie at home, then any waies famous by Acts abroad.

(2) How the other Prouinces stood affected, I leaue to themselues; but by Tacitus it should seeme the Britaines and Germans were not his best subiects: for these are his words, that Caius had a meaning to inuade Britaine, it is certainly knowen: but his rash running head, and hasty repentance in his attempts against Germany, turned all to nothing. And Suetonius ascribes the foolish erection of that admirable bridge ouer a creeke of the Sea in Campania (whereof Dion writeth at large) to his vaine-glorious conceit, that by a brute blazed abroad of so huge and monstrous a worke, he might terrifie Germanie and Britaine, vpon which Countries he meant to make warre. The issue whereof was as fruitlesse as his great cost was ridiculous. For hauing set forward for the conquest of Britaine with no small preparation, he proceeded no further then to those parts of Holland that confront against Northfolke, where hee suddenly pitched his tents, and staied.

(3) At which time, Adminius the sonne of Cunobelin King of Britaine being banished by his father, fled ouer Sea with a small power, and submitted himselfe vnto Cæsars protection: wherupon Caligula wrote vaunting letters to the Senate, as if the whole Iland had beene yeelded into his hands: commanding the messenger that his letters should be carried in a Chariot into the Curia, and not deliuered but in the Temple of Mars, and that in a frequent and full assemblie of the Senate. And hauing no further matter to worke vpon, hee caused certaine Germane prisoners secretly to bee conueied into a wood, and word to bee brought him in great feare and amazement of the sudden approch of the enemie; against whom with shew of great manhood and noble resolution in all haste and warlike manner he marched, and in chaines openly shewed them as his captiues taken in warre, forbidding the Senators the wonted celebration of their Feasts, or to enter their Theaters to take solace, seeing their Cæsar exposed himselfe to so many perils, and fought so great battles with hazard of his life. Last of all, as if he had meant to make a finall dispatch for euer of the warre, hee drew his forces downe to the Sea-coast of Belgia, and embattailed his army vpon the Ocean shoare; planting his balists and other Engines of artillerie in their seuerall places, no man witting what hee meant: which done, himselfe in a Galley launched into the Sea, and immediately returning, caused the Trumpets to sound the battle, and commanded his Souldiers forthwith to fall a gathering of cockles and muscles into their helmets, terming them the Spoiles of the conquered Ocean: Against which hee also built a Tower, as a Trophey of his victorie, the ruines whereof as yet remaine in Holland to this day, and is called The Britons house, in memorie of that fantasticall seruice: vpon which exploit he made a glorious Oration to his souldiers, commending and requiting their valours with rewards, and auowing their shell-spoiles worthy offrings to be presented in the Capitoll, writing letters to Rome of this his great Conquest, and demanding Triumph, and diuine honours to be assigned him: which when the Senatours made some question of, hee threatned them with death. But this Sea-seruice (as it seemeth) so ranne euer after in his minde, that one night hee dreampt that the Sea in dreadfull shape came and expostulated with him, which cast him into an incredible horrour and affright.

(4) In his last yeere of life and raigne, Pontius Pilate, vnder whom Christ Iesus suffered, was apprehended and accused at Rome, deposed and banished to the Towne of Lions in France, where, in despaire he slew himselfe in the yeere from Christ his incarnation, forty one, and from his death, the seuenth, as Eusebius hath noted.

(5) And now both the Ambition and crueltie of Caius was growen so intolerably sauage, as that he often lamented that some rare and vnusuall disaster (as either some horrible slaughter of huge Armies, or some vniuersall plague, or famine, or fire, or opening of the earth, or ouer-flowing of the Sea) happened not in his time, whereby his raigne might be made memorable to posteritie. And hee wished that all the people of Rome had but one necke, that he might haue the glorie of giuing the brauest blow that euer was giuen, whereby so infinite multitudes of men might be killed by him at one stroke. But this his wish was preuented by a blow on himselfe, his death and downefall being complotted and executed by certain Tribunes, whereof Chærea was chiefe; who following him from the Theater with resolution for the fact, tooke the time when Caligula turning suddenly aside into a narrow Cloister to see certaine boies sent him out of Asia, lost the defense of his fore-warders, and the straitnesse of the place permitted not his guard to follow, on which aduantage Chærea demanded his watch-word, which he (according to his vsuall manner) gaue in great disdaine and scorne, whereunto Chærea replied, and with his sword wounded him in the necke, and iaw; and then the rest of the Conspirators comming in, with thirty wounds made an end of his life, after hee had most impiously raigned three yeeres and tenne moneths.

His Countenance naturally sterne and grimme, which by composing and gesture he purposely made more vgly and terrible. His apparell alwaies costly, but not alwaies Court-like, neither ciuill: his beard hee wore of gold like Iupiter or Æsculapius. In his hand for a Scepter, a Mace three-tined, as Neptune or God of the Sea, and vpon his body the Curace of Alexander the Great, taken from his Sepulchre and Monument. CHAPTER VI.

Claudius Druſus Emp.

Aulus Plautius Lieut.

Claudius Druſus choſen by the Pretorian Souldiers.

BVt Claudius Druſus a man of better ſpirit and temperature, immediately vpon the death of Caligula, and euen in the height of thoſe diſturbances, by the Pretorian Souldiers (who were encamped nere the walles of Rome) was nominated, and choſen Emperor; whereas the Senate had decreed and determined to reduce the Citie into her ancient libertie, without admiſſion of any Cæſar, or ſubiection to ſuch abſolute and ſole authoritie; notwithſtanding, the power of this Army, and the vote of the Citie ſo preuailed, that the election was confirmed, and the Imperiall dignity by him aſſumed, as the next, and onely man to whom it muſt of right belong: whoſe father Druſus was the ſonne of Liuia, wife to Octauian, to whom the Emperours ſucceeding held it a glorie to be any waies allied.

Ioſeph Antiquit. l. 19. cap. 3.

Claudius his Parentage.

(2) In his firſt proceedings with the Prouinces affaires, hee determined warre againſt the Britaines, whoſe Tribute had beene a long time neglected, and whoſe ſubiection was now to bee feared: all of them being raiſed in a tumultuous vprore. The cauſe pretended was certaine fugitiues, (the betraiers of their State and liberties) lately departed, and by the Romans receiued with protection of the Emperour: a matter that moued them to great diſcontents, and ſerued as a ſhew for their iuſt reuolt.

The Britaines detaine their Tribute.

(3) Claudius, as ready to preuent the worſt, being thereto further incited by Bericus one of thoſe Britiſh fugitiues as Dion reporteth, in the ſecond yeare of his Empire, and from Chriſts Natiuitie forty fiue, ſent Aulus Plautius a Romane Senator, well experienced in the affaires of warre, to take charge of the Army remaining in Gallia, and with thoſe old trained Souldiers to make ouer into Britaine to retaine their obedience. Which ſeruice vpon them thus impoſed, was generally diſtaſted, as apparantly was ſhewed by their vnwillingneſſe thitherward, muttering and complaining, that they muſt now be inforced to make warre out of the world, and protracting time, could hardly bee drawne forward, though the Emperour ſent his ſecond command.

His Souldiers vnwilling. Dio. lib. 60.

(4) But being at laſt embarked and croſſing the Seas, their ſhippes were beaten with contrary winds, which ſtill added diſcouragements vnto their proceedings, and had not an accident the ſame time happened, the edge of their courage had beene more abated: for euen in this diſtraction ſuddenly a fiery leame ſhot it ſelfe from Eaſt to Weſt, the ſame way that their ſhippes made ſaile: which preſently gaue hopes to their deſpairing hearts, being heathenißly interpreted for a ſigne of good lucke, and ſo ſent from their Gods, whereupon without any reſiſtance, they came to ſhoare and tooke land.

Incouraged by a ſigne from heauen.

(5) The Britaines that miſtruſted no ſuch ſudden inuaſion, and now thus ſurpriſed vnawares, diſperſedly ſecured themſelues in woodes and mariſhes, thereby to detract time, and the more to wearie the Enemy by delaies: which thing Plautius well perceiued, and with much labour, and hazard followed ſo extreamly, that many he ſlew, and tooke priſoner Caratacus their Captaine, the ſon of Cunobeline but lately deceaſed, which brought ſuch terrour amongſt the Britains, that thereupon the BODVNI, the inhabitants of Oxford and Glocester-ſhires, yeelded themſelues to Plautius deuotion: for which ſeruice thus effected, the Senate decreed his Triumphs; and it is probable that this defeat of the Britaine forces, and ſurpriſe of their King, fell out in the ſixt yeare of this Emperours raigne, by the reuerſe of his money then minted with with a triumphall arch and inſcription, De Brittan.

(6) But he following ſtill the Enemy, beeing ſeconded by Flauius Veſpaſian (afterward Emperour) the leader of the ſecond legion (the foundation of whoſe ſucceeding fortunes was firſt laid here in Britaine) gaue them againe another ouerthrow. The chiefeſt meanes whereof was a policie they had gotten to gall the Chariot horſes, whereby their riders were maiſtered, and their whole powers diſordered: many Britaines in this battaile were ſlaine, and more in danger, had not the night ended the ſkirmiſh.

Tacitus in vit. Agric.

(7) The next day the battaile was againe begun and maintained on both parts with equall aduantage, till C. Sidius Geta enforced the Britaines to retire, whereby the victory reſted in the Romanes: for which exploit Triumphall honours were aſſigned him, although he had not yet attained to the Conſular degree. In this Conflict, Veſpaſian hardly eſcaped, being ſore oppreſſed by the Enemy, and in ſuch ſort, that had not Titus (his renowmed ſonne) come to reſcue, he had beene ſlaine, whoſe valour afterwards was tried in one and thirtie battailes, and in the Conqueſt of the Ile of Wight.

C. Sidius Geta his valour.

(8) After this conflict, the Britaines withdrew themſelues into places of more aduantage, and in the mouth of Thamiſis neere her fall into the Sea, paſſed the ſhallowes and firme grounds in ſafetie, whereas the Romans ignorant of both, brought many into danger, and in their diſtreſſed paſſage, were ſharpely aſſailed by the Enemie, in which turmoile, a bloody battaile was begunne, wherein Togodumnus a Britiſh Prince, brother to Catacratus, and ſonne to Cunobeline, was ſlaine: Notwithſtanding, the courage of the Britains was nothing abated, but rather exaſperated to a further reuenge: for effecting whereof, new forces were gathered, and confluence of people aſſembled from each part of the Ile. Plautius the Lieutenant ſeing daily the increaſe of their power, Veſpaſian imploied in other parts, and himſelfe ſtreitned in a place of danger, proceeded no further, but ſent word to the Emperour of the doubtfull eſtate of their affaires.

The Britaines retire to places of aduantage.

Togodumnus ſlaine.

(9) At that time (ſaith Suetonius,) the Senate had by decree allowed Claudius his Triumphall ornaments. But he ſuppoſing that ſuch a bare title of honour was inferiour to the Maieſtie of an Emperour, and willing of himſelfe alſo to enterpriſe ſome exploit whereby hee might winne the glory of a compleat Triumph, made choice before all other Prouinces, of Britaine, attempted by none ſince Iulius Caſar of famous Memory. And with great ſtrength entred into the iourney, hauing with him a mightie Armie both of horſe and foote, as alſo Elephants, a beaſt of great bigneſſe and burthen, whoſe ſtrangeneſſe then amazed the Britaines, and whoſe Carcaſes falling in this Land, their late found bones (no doubt) haue bred our errour, beeing ſuppoſed to be of men, and not of beaſts.

Claudius the Emperour commeth into Britain with a great Army.

Dion Caſſius. lib. 60.

Elephants firſt brought into Britaine.

(10) With very great danger he paſſed the Seas, and ioining ſtrength with his Lieutenant and Veſpaſian, they all together croſſed the Riuer Thamiſis, where preſently they were encountred by the Britaines, who a while maintained the battaile very deſperately, but in the end gaue place and fled, whom the Romanes purſued euen to their ſtrong Camulodunum, then the ſeate of Adminius, Cunobelins ſonne, as may aptly be coniectured by the Medul of Britannicus the Emperors darling, figured in the front of this Chapter; which Citie they ſurpriſed and fortified with their owne Garriſons, which the Emperour in the eleuenth of his raigne, as appeareth by the other coine, turned to a Colony of Romane Citizens. Claudius now diſarming the Britaines, remitted further puniſhment either vpon their bodies or confiſcation of their goods: The which his fauourable clemencie moued thoſe diſtreſſed Britaines to ſuch liking and loue, that they erected a Temple and Altar in his name, and gaue him diuine honour, as a God: The reſt as vnable to reſiſt, profered their ſubmiſſions, and promiſed a peaceable ſubiection vnder the Romanes gouernement.

His clemencie maketh him to be honoured for a God.

(11) Theſe things thus atchieued, at the end of ſixe moneths Claudius in his ninth yeare returned and entred Rome in triumph with more then vſuall maner, ſtamping againe vpon his monies his Arch of victory, as appeareth in the face of this Chapter, a perpetuall trophie of his victories and memory of our ſeruitude. After whoſe Triumphant Chariot rode Meſſalina his wife, the Monſter of her ſexe for impudencie and laſciuious life: and vpon the toppe of his Palace he placed a Nauall Coronet in memoriall of the Ocean by him ſailed ouer, and ſubdued: withall aſſuming to himſelfe, and ſonne, the Sirname Britannicus: And honoured Plautius with his preſence in his Triumphs for Britaine, giuing him the right hand, aſcending the Capitoll, and beſides graced diuers Captaines that ſerued vnder him in that warre with Triumphall Ornaments. So great an eſteeme was held of the Conqueſt of ſo ſmall a part of this Iland.

Claudius returneth to Rome, & entreth in Triumph. Sueton. in vita Claud. Sect. 17.

(12) The Britiſh Hiſtorians relate theſe things farre otherwiſe, reporting that their King Aruiragus, the yongeſt ſonne of Kymbeline, withſtood Claudius in his enterpriſe, with whom (ſay they) he came to compoſition by giuing him his daughter Geniſſa in mariage, in memorie whereof, he built the Citie Glaueceſter, according to his name, which now is called Gloceſter: But Suetonius writing the life of Claudius, his wiues and children, nameth his daughters onely to be Claudia, Antonia, and Octauia, without mention of Geniſſa at all, and therefore not likely to haue any ſuch: And Dion Caſſius reporteth that Claudius himſelfe ſtaied not aboue ſixteene daies in Britaine, a time too ſhort for the ſending to Rome, and thence for the returne with his daughter, or for the building of ſo great a Citie as Gloceſter is. Neither indeede was Aruiragus knowne in the daies of Claudius: But rather liued in the time of Domitian the ſeuenth in ſucceſſion after him, as plainely appeareth by Iuuenal the Poet, in thoſe his verſes ſpoken to Domitian, which elſwhere we cited. Whereby appeareth that the ſtirres of this King could not accord with Claudius raigne, and that the trueth of this report is much weakened from more ſufficient authorities. But to proceede, Aulus Plautius (the firſt Lieutenant authoriſed ouer the Britaines, vpon ſome occaſion was thence reuoked, the warres not quieted, and with a ſmall Triumph (as Tacitus ſaith) entred Rome. Vnto him ſucceeded P. Oſtorius Scapula, for reputation in martiall affaires nothing his inferiour, who at his firſt landing found all in an vprore: Of whoſe proceedings let vs heare Tacitus ſpeake: The Britaines (ſaith he) that were yet vnconquered, ranged the Countries of the confederates, preſuming both vpon the approch of the winter, and the Propretors vnacquaintance with his Army: But he knowing that the firſt ſucceſſe breedeth either feare, or confidence, gathered the Cohorts, and made towards the Enemy, ſlaying all that made head againſt him, and diſarming thoſe whom hee moſt ſuſpected. And to retaine Cogidunus the King in ſtricter aſſurance and fidelity to the Emperour, granted diuers Cities and States to him by way of Donation.

The firſt that beganne to ſtirre, were the Icenians, the Inhabitants of Norfolke, Suffolke, Cambridge, and Huntington-ſhires, a ſtrong people vnſhaken with warres: And with them (at their inſtigation) their neighbours adioining. Theſe together choſe a fit place for fight, compaſſed in with a rude, but defenſible trench, which had only one narrow entrance whereby the Horſemen muſt be much impeached. This Rampire notwithſtanding the Romane Captaine, with the onely aide of the * Allies brake downe, and diſordered the Enemy euen in this their owne fortreſſe, who ſeeing all paſſages for eſcape to bee ſtopped vp, (Oſtorius hauing hemmed them in with Garriſons betweene the Riuers * Antonia and Sabrina) ſhewed great valour in defending themſelues, and and by their deaths gaue place to the Romanes. This ouerthrow and ſlaughter of the Iceni wrought a more ſtaied reſolution in thoſe that before were wauering betweene warre and peace. And the Army led againſt the Cangi, with waſte and ſpoile conſumed the Country, the inhabitants not daring to bee ſeene in field. Whereupon the Romanes pierced thorow the Land euen vnto the Sea-coaſt that lookes towards Ireland.

A ſmall reſiſtance was made by the Brigantes, but without much trouble ſoone quieted by the execution of ſome few, and pardoning of the reſt.

(13) But the Silures (that is, thoſe of South-wales) could not be brought to beare the Romiſh yoke of ſubiection, who beſides their owne courage relied much vpon the ſtrength and valour of their Prince Caractacus (whoſe Coine we haue heere expreſſed) a man which had waded thorow many dangers, and in many aduentures both proſperous and luckie had gotten ſuch reputation, that hee was preferred before all the Britiſh Captaines. This Generall knowing his owne ſtrength vnable to match the enemie, by policie thought to ſupplie that want, and hauing aduantage of the Countrey, remooued the warre vnto the Ordouices, which is now North-wales, where all ioined to him that either feared or diſdained to hold peace with the Romans. Heere he choſe a place to encampe his hoſt, euen on the top of a hill naturally defenſed from acceſſe: and where any doubt was, there he ſtopped vp all paſſage with heapes of ſtones in maner of a Rampire; neere the foot whereof ran a Riuer with a foord ſomewhat dangerous, and not eaſily found, where a troope of his beſt ſouldiers were ſet in order to receiue the Enemie.

His manner of encamping.

The more to animate their mindes, the Leaders went about exhorting and encouraging the Souldiers, taking all occaſions of feare from them, and putting them in hope, with all inducements of reſolution: eſpecially Caractacus, who courſing hither and thither, proteſted that day and that battle ſhould bee the beginning either of a recouered libertie, or elſe a perpetuall ſeruitude and bondage: and euer hee called vpon the names of his valiant Anceſtors, who formerly had chaſed Cæſar the Dictator out of the Ile, by whoſe valour they were deliuered from Hatchets and Tributes, and enioied freely their wiues and childrens bodies vndefiled. The Souldiers alſo themſelues ſhewed as great forwardneſſe, and as Echoes redoubled his words, vowing according to the Religion of their Countrie, neuer to yeeld for wounds or life, which they all were ready to ſacrifice in the cauſe of their liberties. This their apparant reſolution much appalled the Romans cheerefulnes, and moſt of all the Captaines and Leaders, who before their faces ſaw the Riuer, on both ſides of them had the hanging hils, and the Fort commodious for the enemie, but deadly vnto them: all which notwithſtanding the common Souldiers deſpiſed, and demanded the battle. Oſtorius, whoſe ſtudie was chiefly to performe the parts of a Generall, paſſed the Riuer with ſome little difficultie, and leading his Armie vp to the Rampire, was met with ſuch a ſhowre of darts, that many therewith were wounded and ſlaine. Yet at length breaking downe thoſe rude compacted ſtones, ioined battle with the enemie, and afront came cloſe to handy ſtrokes; wherein the Britaines hauing better courage then armour (for they had neither headpeece nor coat of defenſe) were ſore galled with their Iauellings and two-handed ſwords, and ſo diſordered, that they betooke themſelues to flight.

(14) This victorie as it was almoſt vnexpected, ſo was it made famous by the taking of Caractacus wife, daughter, and brethren, and himſelfe flying for ſuccor and protection to the Brigantes, was (as we haue before ſhewed) by Cartiſmandua their Queene betraied and deliuered into the hands of the Conquerours after his nine yeeres moſt generous reſiſtance. Whereupon his fame being carried ouer the Ilands, and ſpread abroad thorow the Prouinces, was alſo renowned in Italie, and they deſired to ſee him that ſo many yeeres had contemned their forces. Neither was his name meanly eſteemed of at Rome; for whileſt Cæſars worth and power was there commended, a more glorious conceit was held of the conquered Caractacus: and againſt his comming to the Citie the people from all parts were aſſembled, as to behold ſome notable and moſt rare ſpectacle. The Emperours Guard in armes and good order were placed in the field before the Campe, thorow whom the Captiues and Trophies were carried, and preſented after this manner: firſt the vaſſals of Caractacus going formoſt bowed their bodies to the people as they paſſed, and ſeemed by their ruefull countenances to diſcouer the ſenſe of their calamitie. The capariſons, his chaines, and other ſpoiles gotten in the warres, were carried after them. Then Caractacus his brethren, wife, and daughter followed, and laſt of all himſelfe, whoſe attire and ſtout behauiour filled the peoples eies with wonder and delight. His bodie, for the moſt part, was naked, and painted with figures of diuers beaſts. Hee ware a chaine of iron about his necke, and another about his middle: the haire of his head hanging downe in curled lockes, couered his backe and ſhoulders, and the haire of his vpper lip parted on both ſides, lay vpon his breaſt. Neither was his behauiour leſſe noted then the ſtrangeneſſe of his habit: for he neither hung downe his head, as daunted with baſe feare; nor craued mercie, as the reſt; but with a confident ſpirit, and bold countenance, held on till he came before the Imperiall Seat, where making his ſtand, and a while beholding Cæſars Maieſty, at laſt with great courage ſpake to this purpoſe.

Then were alſo publicke Triumphall honours decreed for Oſtorius; whoſe fortunes vntill then had beene very proſperous, but now began to be doubtfull, or rather to decline, either becauſe Caractacus (the foile of his glory) was remoued, and thereupon (as though all had beene ſubdued) a more careleſſe ſeruice entertained, or elſe the courage of the Britaines was more inflamed to reuenge through the feruent compaſſion of the fall of ſo mightie a King.

Tacit. Annal. li. 12. cap. 8.

Oſtorius and his fortunes decline.

The Britaines take heart again.

(17) For immediately they enuironed the Campmaſter, and the Legionary Cohorts, which were left to build fortreſſes in the Country of the Silures, whom with eight Centurions, and the forwardeſt Souldiers, they ſlew, and had put all the reſt to the ſword, if reſcue had not ſpeedily come from the villages and forts adioining. The Forragers alſo and troope of horſe that were ſent to aid them they put to flight. Theſe affronts touched Oſtorius to the quick, and leſt their aids ſhould grow to a greater head, he ſent forth certaine light-harneſſed companies, which with the Legionary Souldiers vndertooke the battle, and with ſmall oddes was it continued till the night came, and parted them: diuers other Skirmiſhes afterwards were made, though for the moſt part in woods and mariſhes, whence taking their aduantage in ſallying forth, they many times preuailed, ſometimes by ſtrength, ſometimes by meere courage, and ſometimes by chance; neither were they alwaies commanded by their Captaines, but many times fought voluntary and without warrant.

Their victory.

(18) The principal motiue that induced the reſt to take Armes, was the example of the Silure, who were moſt reſolutely bent, as beeing exaſperated by certaine ſpeeches that the Romane Emperour himſelfe had vſed, which was, that as the name of the Sugambri was deſtroied, and the people tranſported into Gallia, ſo the memorie of Silures ſhould vtterly bee extinguiſhed: And in this heate as men deſperate (whoſe deſtinies were read and lots caſt already) they intercepted the ſcattered troopes of the Romanes that vncircumſpectly waſted and ſpoiled the Country, taking of them many priſoners, and recouering rich booties, which they ſent and diſtributed amongſt their neighbours; whereby many other were drawne to reuolt: Theſe proceedings ſate ſo neere Oſtorius his heart, who with long cares and trauels had wearied his ſpirits, ſpent the ſtrength of his bodie, and thereunto had now added the diſcontentment of his minde, that in theſe vexations hee gaue vp the Ghoſt, the Silures reioicing that ſo worthy and victorious a Captaine was fallen in their warres.

Caeſars threats make the Britains more reſolute.

Oſtorius dieth.

(19) But Claudius Caeſar, leſt the Prouince ſhould make head, preſently ſent Aulus Didius for his Lieutenant into Britaine; where, notwithſtanding all his haſte, he found all out of frame. For Manlius Valens with his Legion had encountred the Britaines with ill ſucceſſe, yet not ſo bad as the Ilanders gaue foorth, thinking thereby to terrifie their new-eſtabliſhed Gouernour: which report himſelfe alſo in policie was contented to augment, thereby to purchaſe more praiſe in appeaſing ſo dangerous ſtirres; or if hee could not, to retaine his own credit without his valours impeachment. Theſe reſiſters had made many inroads into the ſubdued Countries, againſt whom vpon his firſt arriuall, Didius entred the field, and for a while kept them in awe.

Aulus Didius ſent Lieutenant into Britaine.

Tacit. Annal. 12. c. 8. Manlius Valens encountred the Britaines with ill ſucceſſe.

Didius for a while keepeth them in awe.

(20) But Venutius a very expert man in Militarie affaires (truſty to the Romaines, and defended by their power ſo long as the mariage betwixt him and Cartiſmandua continued) began a new rebellion: for Cartiſmandua (in ſpeciall fauour with the Romanes for the deliuery of Caractacus) abounding in wealth, peace, & pleaſures (which commonly are the Nurſes of licentious liuing) fell in loue (as before was touched) with Vellocatus her huſbands ſeruant, and harneſſe-bearer, & forgetting her owne honour, preferred him before Venutius, and laboured to make him King. The good-will of the Country notwithſtanding went generally vpon the lawfull husband: who being deepely touched with this open iniurie, raiſed a power againſt her and her Paramour. At the firſt this quarrell was onely betwixt them, vntill that Cartiſmandua by policie had taken her husbāds brother, and ſome of his neereſt kindred, priſoners. Whereupon the next Inhabitants fearing her purpoſes, and diſdaining to be brought vnder the yoake of a woman ſo defamed, declared themſelues for Venutius, & with a choice band of youthfull Soldiers inuaded her Territories: whereof Didius hauing intelligence, ſent certain Cohorts to ſecond her, and encounter them. In which conflict, the Romans for Cartiſmandua did preuaile; yet the kingdome remained to Venutius, and the warres ſtill vnto them.

Tacit. hiſt. li. 3. cap. 9.

(21) For the Silures were not altogether quieted, & a Legion commanded by Caſius Naſica, fought luckily againſt the Britaines. In all which ſtirres Didius in perſon was abſent, as being ſtricken in yeares, and hauing receiued many honours, held it ſufficient to execute his charge by the aſſiſtance of others. The State of Britain thus ſtanding, let vs ſo leaue it, during this Emperours raigne, which now began to draw towards his laſt period, by the working of Agrippina his wife, and by her vpon this occaſion.

Tacit. Annal. 12. 8.

(22) It chanced, Claudius in his wine, to caſt forth a word of great ſuſpition, in ſaying: *That it was fatall vnto him firſt to beare the leaudnes of his * wiues, & then to puniſh them.* She knowing her ſelfe guiltie in diſinheriting of Britannicus, who was Claudius his owne ſonne, for the adoption of Nero who was hers, beſides other inſolencies, wherewith ſhe might bee taxed, ſought therefore to cleare her owne way by taking him out of the way: and with Locuſta a woman skilfull in poiſoning, and Zenophon a Phyſition, as large of conſcience, conferred for the maner of his death: who in fine, concluded that poiſon was the ſureſt and the leaſt in ſuſpect, or at leaſtwiſe the moſt difficult to be proued againſt her.

Claudius his own words the occaſion of his death. * Meſſalina was his firſt wife, a woman of vnſatiable lecherie, who was put to death.

(23) This then reſolued, they temper poiſon in a Muſhrom, whereof he greedily did eate, and ſhortly after ended his life the thirteenth day of October, when hee had raigned thirteene yeares, eight moneths, and twentie daies, the yeare of Chriſt his incarnation fiftie ſixe, and of his owne age ſixtie foure. He was of ſtature tall, and of a pleaſing Countenance, full of Maieſtie and comely gray haires, his Head continually ſhaking, ſomewhat ſtammering in his ſpeech, very learned, but therewithall very forgetfull, and altogether ruled by his wiues, and domeſticall Seruants, the two ordinary banes of moſt men who are aduāced to any eminent place of gouernement & cōmand.

NERO.

CHAPTER VII.

THis violent and vnexpected death of Claudius, gaue breath and life vnto Neroes further hopes: for whileſt the Conſuls were aſſembled to make ſupplications for their Prince, (not knowing him alreadie dead) Nero ſuddenlie ſet open the Palace gates, and accompanied with ſhouts and acclamations, entred the Cohorts that kept the watch, where of them and the reſt of the ſouldiers he was ſaluted Emperour, the Senate as men affrighted with amazement, not once contradicting the ſame.

Nero aſſumeth the Empire.

(2) He was the ſonne of Domitius Nero, and of Iulia Agrippina the daughter of Germanicus brother to Claudius the precedent Emperour, vitious by nature, as ſprung of thoſe parents from whom (as his owne father Domitius ſaid) no goodneſſe could proceede: and the ſame vile diſpoſition was perfected and augmented by his owne affected ſtudy and purſuit of all poſsible leaudneſſe, as one who could well fit his wanton and laſciuious humours to the vnripeneſſe of his yeeres, being not paſsing ſeuenteene when he aſſumed the Empire. All religion he had in contempt, and all lawes violated, letting looſe the reine to all vnnaturall luſts, and licentiouſneſſe of life.

(3) For blood and libidiouſneſſe hee was held a moſt vnſatiate furie, and amongſt men a very monſter of nature. His father he poiſoned: vpon his mother he committed both inceſt and murder: vpon males, pollutions againſt nature: deflowred the Veſtals (a matter ſacrilegious & impious) ſlew his brother Germanicus, and his ſiſter Antonia, his wiues, Poppæa and Octauia, his aunt Domitia, his ſonne in law Rufinus, and his renowned Tutor Seneca; With ſuch ſauage ſlaughter of the Romane Nobilitie, that Tacitus (their beſt Remembrancer) was wearied to record their names, whileſt with a ſeruile patience (as he termeth it) they died honourably.

(4) The City Rome hee ſet on fire, charging the Chriſtians with the fact, and inflicted ſuch torments and death vpon them, that they were pitied of their enemies, and his owne cruelties thereby made more notorious. Whoſe Religion, though Suetonius tearmed new, and a wicked ſuperſtition; and Tacitus (as it were in contempt) nameth the Author thereof to be Chriſt, who in Tiberius raigne (as he with the Euangeliſts agreeth) was put to death vnder Pontius Pilate Procurator of Iudea, where that religion firſt began; yet by him it is confeſſed, that theſe men were innocent of the fact, and their doctrine to burſt forth further into many other parts, inſomuch that Rome it ſelfe did affect the ſame. Yea and in Neroes Court alſo ſome embraced that faith, as by the words of the Apoſtle is manifeſt, who from the Saints in Cæſars houſe ſent ſalutations to the Brethren. Phil. 4. 22.

(5) And laſtly, to fill vp the meaſure of his bloudie crueltie, he crucified Peter vpon the Croſſe, and beheaded Paul with the ſword, two principall Apoſtles of Ieſus Chriſt, and worthy inſtruments of the worlds ſaluation; and forgetting the Maieſtie of his eſtate, fell into the ſinke of contempt and all ſinnes, giuing his minde leaue to digeſt all vncleanneſſe, and his bodie ouer to worke any baſe exerciſes, attending nothing beſides his Harpes and Harlots, whereby a careleſſe (but yet a cruel) gouernment was intertained, and the Senate faſhioning themſelues to feed his looſe humors, ſtroue each to outſtrip other in their baſe flatteries.

(6) In this ſtate the Prouinces ſubiections began to ſtand doubtfull, and the greatneſſe of the Empire to ouercharge the foundation; for the Parthians vnder Vologeſes gaue Patus the Romane a great ouerthrow, and that in ſuch wiſe, that thoſe which eſcaped were tearmed the vnfortunate Armie. And in Britaine their affaires proceeded with no good ſucceſſe; for aged Didius could doe no more then keepe that which he had already gotten: and Verannius his ſucceſſor, only with ſmall inroades aſſailing the Silures, was in his firſt yeere cut off by death, inſomuch that Nero hauing neither will, motion, nor hope to propagate and enlarge the Empire, minded once to haue with-drawen the forces out of Britaine, had it not beene for very ſhame.

(7) But Paulinus Suetonius attaining the gouernment of that Prouince, in skill for ſeruice, and opinion of people comparable to any, ſought to match his concurrent Corbulo, who with daily victories proſpered in Armenia, himſelfe wanting neither courage nor diſcretion to atchieue the like, only matter and occaſion the Iland affoorded none. Therefore determining an expedition into further parts, he made preparation to inuade the Ile of Mona, ſeparated from the Continent by the Riuer Menai, and fronted vpon the midſt of Ireland, both ſtrong with inhabitants, and a receptacle of Fugitiues.

(8) Againſt his approch the Ilanders had gathered their powers, which ſtood thicke vpon the ſhoare ready readie armed to make reſiſtance, their women running among in mourning weedes, their haire looſe, and firebrands in their hands, like furies of hell, together with their Druides (men of religion) who with hands and eies lifted vp towards heauen, cried for vengeance, and powred out curſes as thicke, as haile. With the ſtrangeneſſe of which ſight, the Romans ſtood amazed, not offering one ſtroke; ſeeming rather to preſent themſelues for a pray vpon their enemies weapons, then for the Conqueſt of their land or liues: which ſudden and vnexpected diſcouragement, their Captaine ſoone redreſſed, by putting them in remembrance of their wonted valours, which now was farre ouermatchable vnto a fearefull flocke of weake women, or a company of rude and franticke men: wherupon their Enſignes were diſplaied, and the Enemy preſently diſperſed and ſlaine, themſelues becomming maſters both of the field, and whole Ile: which no ſooner was thus obtained, but ſudden newes came to recall their powers, the Prouinces being raiſed to a preſent reuolt.

Romanes amazed at ſight of the Britiſh.

(9) For the Britaines in abſence of the Generall, laid open their publique greeuances growne now both common and intollerable by the oppreſſions of the Romanes, who from the diſeaſes of their Head, had ſucked and diſperſed their corruptions throughout the Prouinces of the Empire: and Catus Decianus the Procurator here in Britaine, renewed the confiſcation of their goods, which Claudius had formerly remitted. The Romane Colonie at Camulodunum, thruſt out the ancient Inhabitants, ſeating them-ſelues in their poſſeſſions without any other recompence, ſauing reproachfull termes, calling them their drudges, ſlaues and vaſſalls: beſides, the Temple there erected in honour of Claudius, was now become an eie-ſore vnto them, as an Altar of their perpetuall ſubiection, while the Auguſtall Prieſts there attending, waſted all their wealth vnder pretext of Religion. But the very ſpring or head, from whence the cauſe of this ſudden Rebellion iſſued, was the preſent abuſe offered to * Boduo, Queene of the Icenians, late wife to Praſutagus, deceaſed vpon the inſuing occaſion.

(10) This Praſutagus King of the Icenians famous for his riches, which a long time hee had beene gathering, made Cæſar with his two daughters his heire, by Will, thinking by that flatterie, his kingdome, and houſe had beene ſufficiently warranted from future iniuries: which fell out cleane otherwiſe, for his kingdome of the Centurions, and his houſe by ſlaues were ſpoiled as lawfull booties: his wife whipped, and his daughters deflowred, and the chiefeſt in that Prouince diſpoſſeſſed of their rightfull inheritance, and the Kings kindred reputed and vſed as Slaues.

Praſutagus his Teſtament.

(11) Whereupon the Icenians began ſeriouſly to diſcourſe of their preſent miſeries and bondage, made ſubiect not onely to a Lieutenant that ſucked their blood, but likewiſe to a Procurator, that ſought their ſubſtance, while with a ſeruile feare they yeelded to pleaſe the meaneſt Souldier; As though the Heauens had framed them onely for ſeruitude, and the Earth appointed to beare their iniuries vnreuenged, whereas contrariwiſe, they ſaw both heauen & earth flexible to their deliuerance: For (whether by policie or chance) the Image of victorie at Camulodunum fell downe reuerſed without any apparant cauſe knowne: the women diſtempered with furie, ranne in the ſtreetes, ſinging, and prophecying deſtructions: ſtrange noiſes were heard in the Court, and howlings in the Theater, and ſtrange apparitions, and Edifices ſeene in the Riuer Thamiſis: the Ocean it ſelfe betweene Gallia and them, ſeemed all bloodie, and the prints of dead bodies left in the ſands at the Ebbe. Againe, waighing the preſent eſtate, they ſaw Suetonius abſent, and buſied to enlarge the Confines, the midſt but ſlenderly guarded, and by thoſe who were readier for priuate gaine, then diligent to diſcharge the offices of warre. The examples of other Prouinces alſo whetted the edge of their encouragements: for Germany (they ſaw) had well ſhaken off the yoke of ſubiection: The Parthians had reuolted, and Armenia held play with Corbulo, as famous as Paulinus: Their cauſe was as iuſt, their land as well defenſed; their anceſtors as valiant in reſiſting the firſt Ring-leader Cæſar; and themſelues better experienced of their aduerſaries powers, and their owne abilliments. So now hauing attained the hardeſt point, which was their aſſembled Conſultations (a matter of as great danger to be taken with, as in acting their intendments) in fine this was reſolued, that libertie was to be preferred, though bought with their liues; and bondage to bee auoided, if not otherwiſe then by their deaths.

Their Reſolution.

(12) Theſe their often and noted aſſemblies brought ſuſpitions of ſome deſignements, and the prodigies daily happening as they were motiues of encouragements vnto the Britaines: So were they ominous ſignes to the Romanes, of either part framed in their owne imaginations, and conſtrued according to their hoped or feared euents.

(13) The Confederates in this buſineſſe were not to ſeeke their Leader: their Queenes diſhonours ſo apparantly knowne, (and for matter of gouernement they made no difference of Sexe) her birth extracted from their Roiall blood, her hearts affection approued to her Countrie, her indignities receiued of the proud oppreſſors, and her haughtie ſpirit threatning reuenge, aſſured them of her vttermoſt endeuours: which accordingly ſhe effected to her dying day, and to her neuer dying fame.

Queene Boudict choſen Leader.

(14) The Romanes likewiſe prouided themſelues, and in the abſence of Suetonius, craued aide of Catus Dicianus the Procurator; who ſent them not aboue two hundred men, and thoſe but badly armed. Theſe ioining with the reſt made no great power, al of them relying more to the franchiſe of the place, then ſecuring themſelues with Trench or Bulwarke: And giuen ouer to pleaſure, and play, as in the time of a publike peace. Which aduantages by the Enemy were wiſely eſpied, and by Boduo comming on as nobly purſued, when with ſword and fire ſhe waſted all in her way, the Temple onely excepted, whereinto part of the Souldiers were fled, but after two daies ſiege it was battered and taken.

She ſurpriſeth the Romanes.

(15) In this heate of furie, the Britaines proceede, and meeting Petilius Cerealis Lieutenant of the ninth Legion, on a haſty March to reſcue that which was already loſt, they encounter his forces, and ſlew all his footemen, himſelfe with his troope of Horſe hardly eſcaping to his Campe, where in great feare he entrenched, not daring to attempt any further matter. At notice of theſe miſhaps, Catus like a tall man, tooke to his heeles, and ſailed into Gallia: by whoſe crueltie and couetouſnes the Britaines were thus enraged to take Armes and reuolt, and their entrance thus fortunately proceeding, gaue heart and hope to further ſucceſſe.

She putteth Petilius Cerealis to flight.

She forceth Catus to flie into Gallia.

(16) For in this heat of blood and furie they ſet vpon, and ſacked the free-towne Verolanium, both ſtrong for garriſon, and rich in Inhabitants: which Citie (as alſo Camulodunum had) felt the rage of their mercileſſe hands, from whence great booties were carried, and no leſſe then ſeuentie thouſand Citizens and Confederates ſlaine. This commotion in Britaine by Suetonius Tranquillus is accounted one of the moſt infortunate loſſes to the Empire happening vnder Nero, and the more ignominious to the Romanes (as Dion obſerueth) in that is was performed vnder the command of a woman, neither experienced in the feates of warre, nor vſing the victory according to the Law of Armes: for not any priſoner taken in regard of ranſome was ſaued, nor intercourſe of exchange admitted, but kill, hang, burne, and crucifie, as though the meaſure of their reuenge could neuer be ſufficiently heaped, or the wrath of their Gods ſatisfied with the blood of their Enemies.

But better aduising, dislodged his Host, and with the fourteenth Legion, the Standard-bearers of the twelfth, and other aids from places adioining, incamped vpon a plaine, enclosed with woods, hauing a narrow entrance, and free from Ambush or enemie at his backe.

(18) The Britaines likewise, inferiour neither in number nor courage, triumphed abroad by such troupes and multitudes, as the like had not beene seene, yea and so fierce of courage, and with such assurance of hope, that they brought their wiues to the place to be witnesses of their valours. Boduo in her Chariot doing the parts of a most noble Generall, droue from troope to troope to see and commend their forwardnesse; and dismounting attended with her two daughters, and two hundred and thirty thousand resolute Britaines, gat her to a seat made of marish turfes, after the manner of the Romans, apparelled in a loose gowne of changeable colours, wearing a kirtle thereunder very thicke pleited, the tresses of her yellow haire hanging downe to the skirts. About her necke shee had a chaine of gold, and in her hand held a light speare, being of personage tall, and of a comely, cheerefull, and modest countenance, and so a while shee stood pawsing, in viewing her Armie, and being regarded with a reuerend silence, at length to this effect she spake vnto them.

" (19) My Friends and Companions of equall fortunes, there needeth no excuse for this my present " authoritie or place, in regard of my Sex, seeing it is " not vnknowen vnto you all, that the wonted manner of our Nation hath beene to warre vnder the " conduct of a woman; and not only ours, but also of " the greatest Monarchies swaied vpon this vniuersall " Globe: for the Empire of the Assyrians (the first and " most famous that euer was) vnder the command " of Semiramis triumphed ouer the fierce Aethiopians; " and the gold-veined India; Babylon for strength and " beauty was both defensed and enriched by Nitocris " her sole Empresse. But you will say they are " our Conquerours. Indeed ouercome we are, but by " our selues, our owne factions still giuing way to their " intrusions: for had not the Dictator a Mandubrace? " Caligula an Adminius? Claudius a Bericus, and Co- " gidunus? Nero (that strumpet, and our still-liuing " shame) Cartismandua? Romes instruments, and Bri- " taines vipers? without which, you shall see Caesar in " single fight, lose his sword, and after flie the Coun- " try (a dishonor indelible) Tiberius forgoe his Tribute, " though extremely couetous, Claudius glad to make " peace, and be quiet: and Nero might still haue fol- " lowed his fiddling trade at home, if our discords had " not made vp his Musicke heere abroad. Our dissen- " sions therefore haue beene their only rising, and our " designes still weakened by home-bred conspirators. We haue seene their propitious beginnings, in " making vs instruments ouer seuenty thousand of " our enemies; and yet in this reuenge our forces not " diminished, but much increased in number and pow- " er: which thing, as it serues to our encouragements; " so is it to their feare. For Catus hath set the Seas (a " sure defense) betwixt him and vs; yet not a Britaine " pursuing: for surely if any had, he would haue hid " himselfe in the waues. Petilius the field-mouse doth " keepe his hole, and with the Moale works the earth " for his safest refuge: And Posthumus their Campe- " master is too wise to venture all at a cast. Only Plau- " tius fleshed by his late victorie ouer a company of " vnarmed Priests, whose resistance consisted only in " praiers, and a few weake women, whose weapons " were only fire-brands, builds the hopes of his aspi- " ring minde, as Caligula did his Trophey of Cockle- " shels. For see we not him encamped rather to de- " fend his owne, then to offend others? His Armie " crouched together, as fowles flocked against a " storme, or rather like to fearfull Hares squatted in " their bushes, who no sooner shall heare the crie of " their pursuit, but their Muise or Fortresse will bee " left: and for their last refuge, as Hares, trust to the " swiftnesse of their speedy feet. Suddenly, as shee was thus speaking, shee let slip a Hare which shee had secretly couched in her lappe, which with a great shout escaped thorow the Campe, and gaue occasion to the Armie (who little suspected it was done by her of purpose) to construe it as an ominous and luckie signe of victorie.

(21) Boduo seeing the ouerthrow of her Army, was notwithstanding vnuanquished in her owne Noble spirit, and scorning to be a spectacle in their Triumphs, or a vassall to their willes, after the example of Cleopatra, shee made an end of her miseries and life, by poison. And Pœnius Posthumus, Camp-master of the second Legion, seeing the good successe of the fourteenth and twentith: for that disobaying the Generall (contrary to the discipline of warre) he had defrauded himselfe and followers of their parts of glorie in that seruice, for verie griefe slew himselfe: and for their good seruice there performed, Nero greatly honoured the eleuenth, thirteenth and foureteenth Legions, reposing a most sure trust in their valour and fidelitie, euer afterward.

Pœnius slew himselfe. Tacitus hist. lib. 2. cap. 4.

(22) Suetonius animated with this victorie, gathered his Army, & encamped again, purposing to end the residue of the warre, if any resisters should remaine: And at that present were sent him out of Germanie two thousand Legionarie Souldiers, eight Cohorts of Auxiliaries, and a thousand Horse, wherby his strength was augmented, and the ninth Legion which had beene much weakened by the rashnes of Petilius, fully supplied: So that booteles se it was for the poore Britains to make any further resistance, and such as did, or stood doubtfully affected, were daily put to the sword. But nothing distressed them so much, as did famine, and want of Corne, being a people in all ages more giuen to warre then good husbandry, and rather relying vpon the prouisions of others, than by the plough to prouide for themselues, fierce of nature, and slowlie lending eare to peace, or their minde to such Arts as either nourish, or are nourished by peace.

The Britaines miseries.

Julius Classicianus a receiuer.

(23) In these stirres Julius Classicianus, sent from Nero to succeede Catus in his office of receipts, an enemie, & at variance with Suetonius, the more to cloud his renowne, gaue it forth for certaine, that a new Lieutenant was to be expected, who without either hostile rancour, or pride of a Conquerour, would intreat the yeelders with all Clemencie: And likewise by letters sent to Rome, he signified that no end of warre was to be expected, so long as Suetonius remained Generall, attributing euerie aduerse lucke to his intollerable pride, and euery prosperous successe onely to the good fortunes of Cæsar and State of Rome. These Great mens dissensions awaked Nero, fearing lest the Britaines, thereby would be more forward to aduantage, with whom experience had shewed there was no dallying, and his former losses among them being againe recouered, he thought himselfe discharged and quit from all fatall Calamities, as Tranquillus doth affirme. Therefore he sent Polycletus, one of his freed seruitors, with Commission to examine the differences, and to interpose his authoritie to worke a reconciliation: at whose greatnes it was also thought that the Britaines would haue quaked, and come in vnder feare. Which thing fell out otherwise: for howsoeuer the Captaine and Souldiers regarded him for his place, vnto whom he shewed himselfe both arrogant and terrible, yet the Britaines made him but their laughing stocke, as being themselues borne free, and knew not what the power of freed-men was, much admired that such Commanders and Armies which had atchieued so great exploites, could be brought to obay, and yeeld account of their actions to so base a bond-slaue, as they termed him.

Polycletus sent to reconcile Classicianus and Suetonius.

(24) But Suetonius growne great by his fortunes in these warres, and as it should seeme both suspected and feared of Nero, was by him commanded (the warres yet continuing) to deliuer vp his Armie to Petronius Turpilianus, who had lately giuen ouer his Consulship in Rome, a man of a softer, and more intreatable condition; and as a stranger to the faults committed before, readier to receiue to fauour and forgiue: who hauing composed the former troubles, not daring any further, neither egged, nor prouoked the Enemie, but gaue himselfe to a quiet, or rather idle life, which hee thought might passe vnder the title of an honourable peace. In which estate he gaue vp his charge to Trebellius Maximus, and was after slaine by Galba, nothing obiected against him, but his faithfulnesse to Nero, in that he would not betray him, as the rest had done. For Nero now growne Odious to God and Man, Conspiracies were continually attempted, though not in act effected, vntill that Iulius Vindex Lieutenant of Gallia opposed his proceeding, being the first stirrer, and the rowling stone that (as Tacitus tearmes it) tumbled Nero out of his Seate.

(25) For hauing proclaimed Galba Emperour, an old and weake man, at that time Gouernor of Arragon, neither priuie to the conspiracie, nor assenting to the title, he set vp daily many bitter and biting Edicts against Nero, wherby he was rowsed from his lasciuious rest, and began to feare the fatall end, whereunto his impious life and bloody raigne had now lastly brought him; who destitute of all power of resistance, did now set his whole hope and refuge, vpon that meanes, to which the compasse of his time had euer pointed; for relying onely vpon his skill in Musique, hee intended his flight into Ægypt, there to teach the instructions of that Art: into such sudden basenes was his minde deiected, that formerly had lashed out beyond all measure in luxurie, pride, and prodigalitie. Vnto this conspiracie ioined Virginius Rufus Lieutenant of high Germanie, with Nymphidius, Sabinus, and Sophonius Tigellinus, Captaine of the Guard, who after Vindex his death, (which happened vpon an accident euen in his entrance to Armes) maintained the election of Galba: and the Senate as forward to Neroes destruction, proclaimed him Enemie to the State, and pronounced his punishment more maiorum, sending out each way to apprehend him aliue.

So prodigall in apparell, that he neuer wore one Garment twice, & so sumptuous in buildings, as is vncredible. Nero the last of the Cæsars.

Suet. in vit. Galb. Stil. 1.

WIth the death of this Tyrant, ended the progeny of the Cæsars, and the Emperours succeeding were afterwards elected, either for the opinion of their owne worths, or els, (and that oftner) by the faction and voice of the Souldiers, whose violence the Senate euer feared to contradict, and whose Colonies in euerie Prouince sought to raise their owne Generall to that high estate. In which time of Combustion, though little be recorded of the British affaires, yet because the Monarchy of this Iland was then and long after inuested in the Imperiall dignitie, we may not omit to speake somewhat of the ensuing Emperours, as the chiefe Gouernours of this kingdome. Vpon Neroes declining, diuers there were (as Vindex and Virginius, Nymphidius and Sophonius) ~~set vp~~ against him, but Galba for his reputed integritie got the Garland from them all: who little dreaming of the Imperiall Diademe, fortune set it vpon his head before his hand had toucht the same: for Vindex in Gallia hauing proclamed him Emperour, and himselfe in Arragon not free from Neroes hatred, hee sought rather to hazard his life with the Glorie of a Crowne, then depend vpon his mercie, who had sent secretly the sentence of his death. And therefore mounting the Tribunall, the more to impresse a fresh remembrance of former cruelties, he placed before his throne, the Images of certaine Nobles executed by Nero, with some personages sent for out of exile, whose presence might prouoke a deeper edge of hatred; and his Army about him readie for mutation, these, or the like words he spake.

Galba got the Empire ere hee looked for it.

Galba his policie to make Nero odious.

His Oration to his souldiers.

" (2) My fellow Souldiers and friends, wee at this " time are assembled, to bestow that vpon others, " which wee our selues haue smally enioied, I meane, " libertie from bondage, and freedome from feares of " a Tyrant. The life that I haue hitherto lead, will " sufficiently discharge me from any aspiring con- " ceit, and my owne Conscience doth witnesse that " I speake not vpon malice or priuate respects: It " greeueth me to say, but it bootes not to hide, that, " which euerie man seeth. Hath euer Bond-man vn- " der a cruell master passed a yeere of harder seruice, " then we haue done fourteene vnder Nero? what " kind of exaction hath he not proued to supply with " extortion, that which with shame hee hath spent? " what kinde of crueltie hath he not practised? If we " would conceale or seeke to suppresse it, these dumb " stones would declare them: For behold, he poi- " soned his Father and brother, abused and slew his " owne mother, murdered his wife, his Tutor, and " what els so euer valiant or vertuous in Senate, in Ci- " tie, in Prouince, without any difference of Sexe or " Age. I neede not to speake of the sorrowful sighes, " and bitter teares of so many yong gentlemen bereft " of their fathers, so many wiues robbed of their hus- " bands, so many great men depriued of their Coun- " try, all which cry vengeance vpon such a Prince: a " Prince? nay an Incendiarie, a Singer, a Fidler, a " Stage-plaier, a Cart-driuer, a Cryer; no Prince, nay " no man; that hath a man to his husband, and a man " to his wife, but a monster of mankinde: And in trueth " a subiect, vpon whom, vice hath made her full ex- " perience, and raised her triumphs from the base of " Cæsars throne. Against whom, what Vindex in France " hath alreadie intended, I am sure you doe know, " and I, for my part, am most sorrie to heare. The " whole course of my former life hath beene hitherto " remoued from Ambition in Court, or from aiming " too high abroad, and this little that remaines of " my daies, I could hartily wish were to be spent in " more ease: But sith I know not by what my mis- " fortune, some haue imposed vpon me a Part which " I neuer meant to sustaine, and least of all at this age, " I will not refuse, if you will also approue it, to sa- " crifice this old Carcase of mine for the wealth of " my Country, not as Emperour or Augustus (which " sacred names I adore afarre off, not daring to " approch them) but as —— —— —— And no further heard, was with great acclamations saluted Emperour.

Nero described.

Nero solemnely maried one of his youths called Doripborus, and kept him as his wife: so likewise did he with Sporus, whom he endeauoured to transforme into a woman.

(3) But such is the height of glory, which is raised by the blasts of the multitude, that it fals againe as the bubble burst in the swelling, which leaues neither circle nor signe of his former pride. And so is the state of Galba with one breath applauded, and placed vpon the Imperiall Throne; and that scarce cold, ere they dislike of their owne hastie election: for newes being brought that the State stood firme for Nero, and for certaine that Vindex in his quarrell was slaine, euen in his first enterprise of reuolt; that Virginius was sided by his Germane Legions, and his name inscribed in their banners; that Nymphidius was the man whose deserts could not be sufficiently honoured with lesse recompence then the princely Diademe: These distractions so much ouer-swaied his aged and passionate heart, that he retired to Clunia in great deiection, repenting himselfe of that which hee had done, and wished againe his priuate estate.

Glorie like a Bubble.

(4) But the death of Nero commonly diuulged, and Virginius his refusals of the Imperiall Title, gaue strength and life to his former election, now further ratified by the full resolutions of the Armie: who the more to seeme both strong and valorous, though indeed a weake, sickly, and silly old man, Souldier-like in his coat of Armes shewed himselfe, and in that array passed the vast mountains for Rome. With whose entrance, entred the dislike of his person, as one vnfit to ſupport the ſtate of others, that by age and imbecillitie was not able to ſuſtaine his owne: to which were added the imperfections of his gouernment, carried euery way farre vnder expectation. And long hee ſate not before hee ſaw his owne defects: to redreſſe which hee elected Piſo Licinianus, Cæſar, ioining him in power with himſelfe, and declaring him his Succeſſor, in a ſhort and blunt Oration, in preſence both of the Senate and Souldiers.

Galba chuſeth Piſo Licinianus for his Cæſar.

(5) Whereat howſoeuer others ſtood affected, yet Martus * Saluius Otho (one, who for commerce in leaudnes was very deare to Nero, and whoſe hope depended vpon the common diſturbance, for that his exceſſe in riot had now brought him to the brinke of beggery) much enuied therat; the rather becauſe himſelfe had entertained a hope that Galba would haue adopted him, and therefore as his concurrent ſet his own aſpiring mind for the Crown. And euen now this time beſt fitted his attempts, as being the wane of Galbaes authority, and before the full of Piſoes power; his Aſtrologers and ſtarre-gazers forwarding him with their vaine predictions, a kinde of people euer to

The ſouldiers likewiſe euer diſliking the preſent, and affecting the new, fell without reſpect to Othoes ſide: amongſt whom Sulpitius Florus, one of the Britiſh Cohorts, ſlew Piſo the elected Cæſar; Galba himſelfe being murdered and mangled by the Souldiers and band of Horſemen.

(6) He was of a good ſtature; his head bald, his eies gray, and his noſe hooked, his hands and feet crooked by reaſon of the gout, and a bunch of fleſh or wen vpon his right ſide. A great feeder and Sodomite hee was, ſeuere in iuſtice, and ouer-ruled by his ſeruants. Hee died aged ſeuenty three yeeres, hauing out-liued fiue Princes. In his flouriſhing age with great renowne he had ſerued in Germany: Africke he ruled as Proconſul, and the neerer Spaine vprightly and well; ſeeming more then a priuate man whileſt he was priuate, and held capable of the Empire, had he neuer beene Emperour.

THE FIRST PLANTING OF RELIGION IN BRITAINE.

CHAPTER IX.

THis ſhort time of Galbaes gouernement, with the conſpiracies againſt his Predeceſſour, admitteth ſmall remembrances of our Britiſh affaires: which Prouince (ſaith Tacitus) among all other ſtirres againſt both Nero and Galba, held amity, and ſtood in quiet; whether it was the farre diſtance of place, ſeuered by Sea from the ſeditions of the Reuolters; or that by continuall ſeruice againſt the Enemie the malice of their humours were ſpent, it is vncertaine. Therefore a while to digreſſe from the Succeſſion of our Britiſh Monarkes, and to fill vp the emptineſſe of thoſe Times with matters incident to our ſelues, let it not ſeeme either tedious or ſuperfluous, to ſpeake of the planting of his Kingdome in this Iland, whoſe Rule in ſhort time extended to the Ends of the Earth; and whoſe Ambaſſadours (as ſome haue written) about the midſt of Neroes Raigne, and in the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation ſixty three approched for the Inhabitants ſaluation, Aruiragus then ſwaying the Scepter of this Kingdome.

Chriſtianity ſuppoſed to bee brought into Britaine in Neroes time. Ex Antiq. Manuſcript. Freculphus Lexouienſis, Tom. 2. lib. 2. cap. 4. William of Malmesburie.

(2) At which time (ſay they) were ſent certaine Diſciples out of France into Britaine by Philip the Apoſtle, whereof Ioſeph of Arimathea, that buried the body of Chriſt, was chiefe; who firſt laid the foundation of our faith in the Weſt parts of this Iland, at the place then called Aualon, (afterwards Inis Witrin, now Glaſtenburie) where he with twelue Diſciples his Aſſiſtants preached the Goſpell of life vnto the Ilanders, and there left their bodies to remaine for a ioifull Reſurrection. This doth Gildas affirme, and Malmesburie in his Booke of the Antiquitie of Glaſtenburie written to Henry de Bloys, brother to King Stephen, and Abbat of the ſame place, report, and is conſented vnto (for the matter, though all agree not touching the time) by the learned Antiquaries of later times, grounded on the Teſtimonies of the beſt approued Ancient writers: who account the moſt happy influence of Chriſtianitie, to haue beene by thoſe glorious conduits conuayed into theſe remote parts of the world: that ſo (according to the promiſe of God by Eſaiah) The Iles afarre off which had not heard of his fame, ſhould be conuerted, and haue his glorie to them declared among the Gentiles.

(3) And if the credit of Dorotheus Biſhop of Tyre, (who liued to ſee the Apoſtacie of Iulian) weigh any thing with vs, in his tract of the Liues and Deaths of the Prophets, Apoſtles, and Diſciples, he bringeth Simon Zelotes (an Apoſtle of Ieſus Chriſt) to preach the word, and to ſuffer Martyrdome on the Croſſe here in Britaine: with whom Nicephorus, and after him Iohn Capgraue (in his Catalogue of Engliſh Saints) agree, ſaying that the ſame Simon ſpread the Goſpell to the weſt Ocean, and brought the word of life into the Iles of Britaine: and, in the conuerſion of Countries wrought by the Apoſtles, the ſame Nicephorus, with Egypt and Lybia aſsigneth Britaine alſo to be one. And the foreſaid Dorotheus, as alſo Mirmanus, nameth Ariſtobulus one of the ſeuenty Diſciples (the ſame whom Saint Paul in his Epiſtle to the Romans among others

(5) But yet there are others, who vpon a very good ground from the words of Gildas (the most ancient of our British Historians) will haue the Sunne of the Gospell long before to haue risen in this our West, and this Iland of Britaine to haue enioied the very morning of his Ascent, the brightnesse thereof piercing thorow the mistie clouds of errour, and shining heere in Britaine euen in the daies of Tiberius, towards whose end Christ suffered his death, and by whose indulgence towards Christians, their profession was propagated farre and neere. Which assertion the said Gildas doth not deliuer coldly or doubtingly, but with great confidence, & relying vpon good grounds, as it appeareth when he saith, Scimus, &c. Wee know for certainty, that this was in the latter times of Tiberius. Which was immediately after our blessed Sauiours Passion.

Gildas de Conquest. Brit.

To which vncontroleable testimonie some others haue added (though not perhaps on so vndoubted warrant) that S. Peter the Apostle preached the word of life in this Iland, as to other Gentiles he did, for whom God had chosen him, that from his mouth they might heare the Gospell and beleeue, (as himselfe allegeth) and that hee heere founded Churches, and ordained Priests and Deacons, which is reported by Simon Metaphrastes out of the Greeke Antiquities, and Guilielmus Eisingrenius in the first of his Centurie, who saith that Peter was here in Neroes time; whereas Baronius thinketh it was in the raigne of Claudius, when the Iewes were banished Rome, and that therefore Paul in his Epistle to the Romans mentioneth him not. Indeed Baronius and some others plead very hotly for S. Peters preaching heere: but I see not well how it can stand either with Eusebius his account, which keepes him so long at Rome after he was Bishop there, or with Onuphrius, who denieth that he went west-ward (being expulsed by Claudius) but to Ierusalem, and thence to Antioch, where he liued till the death of Claudius: whence it must follow, that if Peter were heere at all, it was before euer he went to Rome, and that the Gospell was preached heere before it was in Rome, if Peter were the first (as some hold) that preached there: both which may be the more propable, if wee consider the huge multitudes of Christians (fifteene thousand, saith Baronius) which dispersed themselues into all parts of the world vpon the martyring of S. Steuen at Ierusalem, (which was presently vpon the death of Christ) and that Ioseph of Arimathea was one of that number, Baronius doth confesse. I am heere contented to step ouer that Monkish tale reported by Aluredus Riuallensis (the writer of King Edward the Confessors life) that a holy man (forsooth) studious and carefull for a Gouernour to succeed, was in his sleepe told by S. Peter that the Kingdome of England was his, wherein himselfe had first preached, and would also prouide him Successours. For seeing it was a dreame, for a dreame wee leaue it, and Peter among the other Elders to attend his Throne, that now sitteth in glorious Maiestie, and who in this life minded no such earthly preheminence, no not to diuide betwixt brethren, though the Kingdome and rule of all things was his alone.

(6) Certes Peter was principally the Apostle of the Circumcision, and therefore more likely to haue spent his endeuours on them: but for Paul (the Doctor of the Gentiles) his arriuall heere may seeme more warrantable, who doubtlesse (after his first releasement from Rome) confirmed the doctrine of Christ to these Westerne parts of the world, and among them, as may appeare, to this Iland of Britaine, as both Sophronius Patriarke of Ierusalem, and Theodoret an ancient Doctor of the Church, doe affirme and approoue, saying that Fishers, Publicans, and the Tent-maker (meaning S. Paul) which brought the Euangelicall light vnto all Nations, reuealed the same vnto the Britaines. That Paul came into Illyricum, Gallia, and Spaine, and filled all those parts with his doctrine, both Eusebius, Dorotheus, and Epiphanius doe testifie: and of this generall Ambassage the Apostle himselfe saith, that the sound of the Gospell went thorow the earth, and was heard vnto the ends of the world: which his sayings cannot more fitly bee applied to any other Nation then vnto vs of Britaine, whose Land by the Almightie is so placed in the terrestriall globe, that thereby it is termed of the ancient, The Ends of the Earth, and deemed to be situated in another world; for so in an Oration that Agrippa made to the Iewes, and Agricola to his Romans, it is called: which made Solinus write, that the coast of France had beene the End of the Earth, had it not beene for Britaine, which was as another world. And in Dion we read, that the old Souldiers of Gallia, whom Claudius commanded for Britaine, complained that they must bee inforced to make warre out of the world. And of this Land and latter Apostle (if credit may be giuen to a Poet) Venantius Fortunatus thus recordeth:

(7) Thus for Paul: well knowen in Rome by his long imprisonments, and (at that time) in reuerend regard for his doctrine with many there: among whom also there were some Britaines that embraced the faith, whereof Claudia Rufina (remembred by Martial another Poet) was one, whom he thus extols:

Martial. lib. 3. Epig. 34.

Claudia cæruleis cùm sit Rufina Britannis
Edita, cur Latiæ pectora plebis habet?
Quale decus formæ? Romanam credere matres
Italides possunt, Atthides esse suam.

How hath Dame Claudia, borne of Britaines blew,
Won fame for wisdome with our sages graue?
Her comely forme and learning, as their due,
Rome claimes for hers, and hers would Athens haue.

This Claudia is by the learned commended to haue beene most skilfull in the Greeke and Latine tongues; of whom heare them (not me) speake. At the commandement of the Tyrant Nero (say they from Tacitus) many Noble Britaines were brought to Rome, who remaining there their Confederates, they held it an honour to haue their children named after the nobilitie of the Romanes: and from Claudius Cæsar was this Ladie Claudia named, who according to her worth was matched in mariage to Rufus a gentleman of Rome, then a Coronell, after a Senator, a man of a milde disposition, naturally modest, a great Philosopher in the Sect of the Stoickes, for his sweetenesse of behauiour called Pudens, who by his graue perswasions caused Martial (the wittie but wanton Poet) to reforme many things in his writings, and by him is cõmended for his humanitie, pietie, learning, and eloquence: as also his wife Claudia the Britaine, for her beautie, faith, fruitfulnesse, learning, and languages. In proofe whereof, Bale hath mentioned three seuerall treatises, besides others by her compiled, both in the Greeke and Latine tongues. Dorotheus nameth Pudens to be one of the seuentie two, and Volateranus affirmeth them both Pauls disciples, from whom he sendeth greeting to Timotheus in these words: Eubulus and Pudens, and Linus, and Claudia, and all the brethren ſalute thee. But ſome may obiect, that Martials Claudia could not be that Ladie, who liuing in Neroes time gaue hoſpitalitie vnto Peter and Paul at their being in Rome, for that ſhe could not retaine ſuch beautie and perfection as the Poet to her doth aſcribe in the raigne of Domitian, the ſeuenth in ſucceſsion from Nero, the time being too long (ſaith Ado, Biſhop of Treuers, Vſuardus and others) for beautie to be ſo freſhly preſerued. Now theſe account her age then to be ſixtie; but if we reckon according to Euſebius, wee ſhall ſee that hee ſets the laſt of Claudius in the yeare of grace fiftie ſixe, and the firſt of Domitian in eightie three, betwixt which, are but twentie ſeuen yeares, and yet Paul came not to Rome till the tenth of Nero, and in his thirteenth yeare, from the priſon wrote his Epiſtle to Timothie, as the ſame Euſebius declareth: ſo that from hence vnto Domitian, is left but foureteene yeeres, a time no whit vnpoſſible to retaine Beautie, though twentie yeares and many moe of her age had beene formerly ſpent; ſeeing that in thoſe times Plutarch praiſeth Alcibiades to be paſsingly faire when he was threeſcore yeares of age.

The ſame Claudia that Paul and Martial ſpeaketh of.

This Claudia then with Pauls ſpirituall Manna, is ſaid to ſend likewiſe the choiſeſt and chaſteſt of the Poeſies of Martial (whoſe verſes generally are no leſſons befitting Ladies) for new-yeares gifts vnto her friends in Britaine, both for to feede their Soules with the bread of life, and to inſtruct their mindes with leſſons beſt fitting vnto ciuill behauiour; which thing moued the Poet himſelfe with no ſmall ſelfe-glorie in his verſe thus to write:

Dicitur & noſtros cantare Britannia verſus.
And Britaine now (they ſay) our verſes learns to ſing.

Martial. lib. 7. Epig. 10.

(8) It hath alſo paſſed with allowance among the learned Senate of our Antiquaries, that when Claudius & Nero began to baniſh and perſecute the Chriſtians in Rome, (whoſe ſuperſtitions, as Tacitus pleaſeth to tearme them, from Iudea had infected the Citie it ſelfe) many Romanes and Britaines being conuerted to the Faith, fled thence vnto theſe remote parts of the earth, where they might and did more freely enioy the libertie of their Profeſsions, vntill the ſearch of Tyrants by the flame-light of Perſecutions, had found out all ſecret places for the ſafeties and aſſemblies of Gods Saints: as after in the daies of Diocleſian we ſhall finde. And from this Sanctuarie of Saluation the ſad lamenting Lady * Pomponia Græcina, the wife of Aulus Plautius (the firſt Lord Lieutenant of Britaine) brought that Religion, whereof ſhe was accuſed and ſtood indited vpon life and death, which was none other, then the Chriſtian Profeſsion, ſeeing the ſame both by Tacitus and Suetonius, is euerie where termed the ſtrange ſuperſtitions and new kinde of Sect that the Chriſtians imbraced, and for which they were accounted vnworthy to liue.

Aulus Plautius his wife became a Chriſtian in Britaine.

(9) And much about theſe times (as Beatus Rhenanus in his Hiſtorie of Germanie, Pantaleon and others doe report) one Suetonius a Noble mans ſonne in Britaine conuerted to the Faith by the firſt Planters of the Goſpell in this Iland, and after his Baptiſme called Beatus, was ſent by the Brethren from hence vnto Rome, to be better inſtructed, and further directed by Saint Peter himſelfe; and returning thorow Switzerland, found ſuch willingneſſe and flocking of the people to heare and receiue the Doctrine of Chriſt, that he there ſtaied and built an Oratorie not farre from the lake Thun, and neare the Towne called Vnderſewen, where in preaching and praiers he imploied his time to the day of his death, which happened in the yeare of grace 110.

And that there were Chriſtians in Britain at theſe times I make no queſtiō, though ſome exceptions may be taken againſt the Monk of Burton the reporter thereof, who ſaith in the 141 yeare and raigne of Hadrian, nine maſters of Grantceſter were baptized themſelues & preached to others the Goſpell in Britain; howſoeuer he faileth in the Emperours name, which yeare was the

It is reported alſo that Patricke the Iriſh Apoſtle, and Canonized Saint, long before the Raigne of King Lucius preached the Goſpell in many places of Wales; As alſo that Ninianus Bernicius of the race of the Britiſh Princes conuerted the Picts to the Religion of Chriſt. Vnto theſe aforeſaid authorities and teſtimonies howſoeuer we ſtand affected: yet it is certaine by Chemnitius citing Sabellicus, that the Britaines were with the firſt Conuerts: And Tertullian, who liued within two hundred yeares of Chriſts Natiuitie, ſheweth no leſſe: Who the more to prouoke the Iewes againſt whom he wrote, calleth to witneſſe the fruitfull increaſe of the Goſpell of Saluation, through many Countries and Nations, and among them nameth the Britaines to haue receiued the Word of life, the power whereof (ſaith he) hath pierced into thoſe parts whither the Romanes could not come. Whence Petrus Cluniacenſis ſuppoſeth the Scotiſh men the more ancient Chriſtians, as not being in the like ſubiection to the Romanes, as other then were.

(10) Origen, who flouriſhed not much aboue two hundred yeares after Chriſt, in his Homilies vpon Ezechiel ſheweth, that the firſt fruits of Gods haruеſt was gathered in the Iland of Britaine: who conſented to the Chriſtian faith by the doctrine of their Druides: that taught one onely God: with whom Hector Boetius agreeth, ſaying, that ſome of theſe Druides condemned the worſhip of God in Images, and allowed not the applicatiō of the God-head vnto any viſible forme: which might be the cauſe why Claudius the Emperour forbad their Religion, as ſauouring in theſe things too much of Chriſtianitie, whom likewiſe he baniſhed Rome, as ſome from Suetonius coniecture. Of theſe Druides wee ſhewed before, that their offices were moſt imploied about holy things, and that their doctrine chiefly conſiſted in teaching the immortalitie of the ſoule, the motions of the heauens, the nature of things, and the power of the Gods: yea and Poſtellus from others will inforce, that they prophecied likewiſe of a virgins conception. (11) Whereby wee ſee the waters of life, flowing from Ieruſalems Temple, into theſe farre ſet Countries and vttermoſt Seas, to be made both fruitfull & wholeſome, according to the ſayings of the Prophet, that in that day the waters of life ſhould iſſue from Ieruſalem, halfe of them toward the Eaſt Sea, and halfe of them towards the vttermoſt Sea, and ſhall remaine fruitfull both in Sommer and winter: and euen in the infancie of Chriſtianitie, both the Apoſtles themſelues, and alſo the Proſelytes their Diſciples to become fiſhers therein for the Soules of Men, as Chriſt in chuſing of them ſaid they ſhould bee; whereby his Kingdome was ſoone enlarged vnto theſe Ends of the Earth, and his Throne eſtabliſhed among thoſe Heathen, whom God his Father had giuen to be his. So fruitfull and famous was this ſpreading of the Goſpell, that Baptiſta Mantuan, a Chriſtian Poet, compares the increaſe thereof with that of Noah, thus alluding vnto it:

In Engliſh thus:

As Noah ſent from the Arke his ſonnes, to teach

The

The Lawes of God vnto the World aright;
So Christ his Seruants sent abroad to preach
The Word of Life, and Gospell to each Wight:
No place lay shadowed from that glorious Light:
The farthest Iles, and Earths remotest bounds,
Embrac'd their Faith, and ioi'd at their sweet sounds.

(12) To which effect also the sayings of S. Iohn Chrysostome, Bishop of Constantinople, enforce, who shewing the increase of Christianitie, and the successe of the Gospell preached, sheweth the power thereof to haue extended, not only to the Countries farre iacent in the Continent, but also to the Ilands situated in the Ocean it selfe, and amongst them expresly nameth this our Britaine; whose Inhabitants (saith hee) haue also consented to the word which is planted in euery heart, in honour whereof they haue erected their Temples and Altars. And againe: Those Britaines (saith hee) which had formerly fed vpon humane flesh, making no difference betwixt the blood of man and beast, now through the power of the word by them embraced, haue learned the law of true pietie, and giue themselues to a religious abstinence, and holy fasts. Of which Barbarisme S. Ierome also complained, that some of those Nations vsed to eat the buttocks of boies, and Paps of Virgins, which in their Feasts were serued for the daintiest dishes. But elsewhere speaking of the Britaines conuersion, he saith, that they had turned themselues from their westerne Paganisme, and now had directed their faces towards Ierusalem in the East, whose beautie shined in the word of God.

(13) And thus wee see by the planting of the Gospell in this Iland, the saying of the Psalmist accomplished, that God would giue his sonne Christ the Heathen for his inheritance, and the Ends of the Earth (the proper attribute of this our Britaine) to be his possession. And the successe in Historie most apparantly sheweth these parts (by an especiall prerogatiue) to bee Christs Kingdome. For albeit that Ierusalem and Antioch may rightlie claime the precedencie of all other places, the one being as it were the chamber where Christians were first borne, and the other the font where they were first Christened with that most sacred name: yet Britaine in some other graces hath outstript them all, hauing the glory to be graced with the first Christian King that euer raigned in the world, which was our renowned Lucius, the first fruits of all the Kings that euer laid their Crowne at the foot of our Sauiours Crosse: as also for producing the first Christian Emperour that euer by publike authoritie established the Gospell thorow the world, which was Constantine the Great, borne and brought vp heere in Britaine by Queene Helena, a most vertuous and religious British Lady: vnto whose daies the succession of Christianitie did heere continue, as by the martyrdomes of many Saints vnder Diocliſian is apparant. Heerein also raigned the King that first vncrowned the head of the vsurping Beast, and triple-headed Cerberus, and freed the Land from his deuouring Locusts: putting downe Idolatrie with Hezekiah that brake the Brasen Serpent: and with Isaack new digged the Wels that those Philistines had stopped. And lastly hath this Iland produced that most royall and Christian Monarke, whose learned pen hath first depainted Antichrist, and pierced the heart of all Papall Supremacie, as the sword of Gedeon did Zalmunna (* the Image of trouble). King of Madian. And as a Lion hath he met that crooked * Serpent in the way of his vsurped authoritie; whereby in short time vndoubtedly the ᵇ Kall of his heart will be broken, if other Potentates likewise by his most godly example, cast off the yoke of vassallage, and in their seuerall Dominions gouerne (as free Princes ought) the people that GOD hath committed to their charge. So that in those and many other the like Princes of this happy Iland, most properly is performed that prophetical promise made vnto the Church of Christ: that Kings should become her nursing Fathers, and Queenes should be her nursing Mothers: Of both which may be truly said to Britaine, in imitation of that of Salomon, Many kingdomes haue done gloriously, but thou hast surmounted them all.

(14) And of such power hath Christ beene in these His Possessions, that euen the Hostile Kings and Conquerours thereof, were they neuer so sauage and Idolatrous at their first entrance, yet when they here had seated for a time they became milde and religious, and gladly submitted their hearts to the Religion of those, whose necks themselues held vnder the yoke of subiection.

(15) Such were the Romans in this Iland, whose Deputies at the day-spring almost of Christianitie were conuerted; as Trebellius, Pertinax, and others, which submitted themselues to that profession, and were motiues to King Lucius more publikely to maintaine the same: as also Constantius the father of great Constantine, that here in Britaine permitted the profession of the Gospell, with the erections of Churches for the true seruice of God, and prohibited the superstitious worships of the Gentiles.

(16) The Saxons after them (in time, but not in Idolatrie) had neuer tasted the liuing waters of Siloh, till they were here seated in Christs Possession, where they changed their affections as farre from their wonted manners, as did the Messengers to Iehu, which turned after his Chariot to destroy the Altars of Baal: or as Saul and his seruants, who no sooner had entred Naioth in Ramah, but that their spirits were ioined to the Prophets, and the heat of their furie, with their garments, cast downe at Samuels feet.

(17) The Danes likewise, their Conquerours, and Successors in this Royall Throne, euer vntill then were both bloudy and barbarous, and therefore of all our Writers commonly called the Pagan Danes; whose many desolations and ruines remaine as records of their cruelties in many places euen vnto this day: yet being a while in this Land, King Guthurn, with thirtie of his chiefe Princes and people, were drawen by the valour and vertue of King Alured to receiue the Christian Faith, by whose bounty thereupon they enioied the possession of a faire portion of this Kingdome. And afterward Canutus, their greatest King, no sooner almost had this Imperiall Diademe set vpon his head, but that hee held it his chiefe Maiestie to be the vassall of Christ, confessing him only to be King of Kings: and with such religious deuotion as then was taught, crowned the Crucifix at Winchester with the Crowne he wore: and neuer after, thorow all his raigne, by any meanes would weare the same: and the Danes his Souldiers remaining in England, began by little and little to embrace Christianity, and in short time were al conuerted to the Faith. Thus then we see the happie increase of these holy seeds springing from the furrowes of this blessed ground: and the Tents of Sem to be spread vpon the Mountaines of Britaine, wherein God (according to his promise) perswaded vs who are of Iapheth, to dwell.

(18) As hitherto we haue searched the first foundation of our Faith, so neither want wee testimonies concerning the continuance of the same in this Land vnto following Posterities; although the iniurie of Time and Warre haue consumed many Records. For the Britaines that were daily strengthned in their receiued faith, by the Doctrine of many learned and godly men, left not their first loue with the Church of Ephesus, but rather tooke hold of their skirts, as the Prophet speaketh, vntill the tortures of Martyrdome cut them off by death: And those Fathers euen from the Disciples themselues, held a succession in Doctrine, (notwithstanding some repugnancie was made by the Pagans) and preached the Gospell with good successe, euen till the same at length went forth with a bolder countenance, by the fauourable Edicts of Adrian, Antonius Pius, and Marcus Aurelius Emperors of Rome (as Eusebius hath noted:) and in Britaine was established by the authoritie of Lucius their King: whereby this was the first of all the Prouinces (saith Marcus Sabellicus) that receiued the Faith by publike ordinance: Of the teachers of those times Bale from 19 For, all this time (saith the said Dicetus) Christian Religiō flourished quietly in Britanny, til in Diocle-sians time, their Churches were demolished, their holy Bibles cast into Bone-fires, the Priests with their faithfull flocke bloodily murdered. In which number, about the yeare two hundred ninetie three, as we read (in Beda, Malmesburie, Randulphus, and others) Albane with his teacher Amphibalus were both of them martyred for the profession of the Gospell at the old Towne Verolanium: as also in Leicester, those two Noble Citizens, Aaron, and Iulius, with multitudes both of men and women in sundrie places (saith Beda) as shortly after no lesse then a Thousand Saints suffered death at Liechfield, wherupon the place was called another Golgotha, or field of blood: In memorie whereof, the Citie beareth for Armes to this day, in an Escheucheon of Landskip, sundry persons diuersly Martyred. And yet after these times also the Britaines continued constant in Christianity, and the censures of their Bishops (for the great estimation of their Constancie, pietie, and learning) required, and approued in great points of Doctrine among the assemblies of some Generall Councels; as that of Sardis and Nice, in the time of great Constantine (the first Christian Emperour, and this our Country man, whose blessed daies gaue free way to that Profession, to the Councels Authoritie, and to the whole world Peace) had wee our Bishops present; whose forwardnes against the Arrian Heresie, afterwards Athanasius aduanceth in his Apology vnto Iouinian the Emperor, among three hundred Bishops assembled at the Councell of Sardice, in Anno three hundred and fiftie: whose words (as Nicephorus reports them) are these. Know most Christian Emperour (saith he) that this faith hath beene alwaies preached and professed, and that all Churches of Spaine, Britain, France and Germany at this day with one voice doe approoue the same. As also at that of Ariminum, in the yeare three hundred fiftie nine, and in the raigne of Constantius, who caused foure hundred westerne Bishops to be there sommoned in fauour of the Arrians, whereof three were out of Britaine, (as Sulpitius Seuerus the good Bishop of Burges hath reported) that gaue their suffrages against that Heresie. These doth Hilarie tearme the Bishops of the Prouinces of Britaine, by whom they were somewhat derided, because beeing farre from their owne Countrie they liued vpon the Emperours charge. And Beda testifieth, that from Diocliſians time they both reedified their former Temples, and founded new also in memorie of their then fresh-bleeding Martyrs, and enioyed a generall and ioifull peace in their religious profession, till that Arrian Heresie hauing first filled the Continent, sought and found passage ouer the Seas into our Iland.

This is that Bishop of whom we read, that of all his Ecclesiasticall reuenewes he reserued only for himselfe two loaues of bread vpon the Lords day. And in the first Tome of Councels is mention of Restitutus Bishop of London, whom (because that, as is most probable, Christian Religion had in those primitiue times taken more firme footing in Britaine then in France) the French Bishops called to their Nationall Councell, the second at Arles, in Anno three hundred thirty fiue, that he might with his Suffrage approoue their Decrees. About the yeere foure hundred seuenty, was a Prouinciall Councell held in Britaine for the reforming of Religion, and repairing of the ruined Churches, which the Pagan mariage of Vortiger had decaied, to the great griefe and discontent of the people, a pregnant signe of the continuing zeale, which vnto those daies had left a glorious memorie.

(21) Laſtly, (for the cloſe of all) that theſe teſtimonies are ſincerely by vs produced, for the firſt preaching and planting of the Goſpell, and by ſuch meanes and men as we haue declared, and particularlie by Ioſeph of Arimathea and his aſſociates, the conſent of all Writers, both forraine and home-bred, doth ſufficiently approoue: and the reuerend regard had of the place, with the many Charters thereof to this day remaining, are ſtrong inducements for thoſe our firſt Apoſtles Reſidencies and Burials: whereof one, exemplified vnder the Seale of King Edward the third, is to be ſeene at this day, reciting that the Abbey of Glaſtenburie being burned in the time of King Henrie the ſecond while it was in his hands, at the requeſt of the Patriarke of Ieruſalem (then preſent in England) inſtigated further both by the Biſhops and Nobilitie, hee did reedifie the ſame, cauſing diligent ſearch to bee made for the ancient Charters of that foundation, and among many recited in that exemplification, in one of them it is called, Origo Religionis in Anglia: in another, Tumulum Sanctorum, ab ipſis diſcipulis Domini adificatum, fuiſſe venerabilem. Alſo in the ſame Charter amongſt many other Kings, there is mention made of King Arthur, to be a great Benefactor vnto that Abbey; whoſe Armes vpon the ſtone walles, both in the Chapell (called *S. Many Kings benefactors to Glaſtenburie Abbey.

(22) To conclude this digreſsion, growen much greater then was intended, we ſee it is moſt apparant, that the Britaines had a ſettled opinion in Chriſtianitie, before the ſound thereof was heard from Rome; and that the Lord had heere ſet vp his Standard, whereunto theſe Ilanders reſorted as to the Tower of their ſtrength, and was the firſt Kingdome of the Gentiles, that are ſaid to bring their ſonnes thus in their armes, and their daughters thus vpon their ſhoulders, vnto the Lords Sanctuarie: whoſe knowledge continually increaſing, hath hitherto, to Englands great ioy and fame, beene ſtill continued, though the ſpirituall ſparkes thereof for a ſeaſon haue ſometimes beene couered in the cinders of the Pagans deſolations, or with the ſuperſtitious worſhips of mans inuentions; both which now diſperſed as clouds before the Sunne, the light appeareth in his full ſtrength, and the moſt pure waters of the word run vntroubled. This Iland then, in this thing made happy before the moſt, the Inhabitants became Inſtructers of others, and in their earthly veſſels bare this heauenly liquor, which thorow their golden Conduits ran into many other Countries, and filled their Ceſternes with this water of life. For from hence was Netherland conuerted to Chriſtianitie, as teſtifieth the ſtory of Swithbertus: Burgundie by our Columbanus, ſaith Sigebert: Scotland by Brandanus, as Bernard the French Monke affirmeth: Swedia by Gallus, as ſaith Petrus de Natalibus: and Friſia by Wilfred, as is recorded by Beda and Matthew of Weſtminſter: the Franconians, Heſſians, and Thuringians, by Winifred our Deuonſhire man: the Norwegians by Nicolas Brekſpere of Middleſex: and the Lithuanians by Thomas Walden of Eſſex. Againe, if we ſhall caſt our eie on all the Reformed Churches in Chriſtendome, and with them on Luther, Huſſe, and Prage, they will all confeſſe, they firſt deriued their light from the learned Wickleffe of Oxford; the Lampe of whoſe ſacred knowledge hath illumined not onely all the corners of this Kingdome, but alſo all thoſe forraine States, whom it hath pleaſed God to deliuer from the thraldome and vengeance of Babylon: ſo that with the German Poet, to Gods glorie, and Britaines praiſe, the Engliſh thus may ſing:

OTHO.

CHAPTER X.

Ann.Do.70.

BVt leauing Chriſts proceedings to the diſpoſe of himſelfe, let vs returne to the ſubiect from whence wee haue wandered, and continue the ſucceſsions of Great Britaines Monarchs, vnto them that haue held it, whether by chance of warre, or voice of Election: In which ſort (as is ſaid) Galba got it, and but ſhort time kept it: And from him Otho tooke it, and a ſhorter time enioied it.

Otho his original. Tacit. Hiſt. 2. cap. 17.

(2) Whoſe Originall (ſaith Tacitus) was from Ferrentium, his Father a Conſull, his mothers blood ſomewhat diſparaged, but yet not baſe; his youth run ouer with voluptuous wantonneſſe and prodigall expences, more ready for diſturbances, then depending vpon preferment or dignitie of State; and hauing gone thorough all his wealth, retained onely the heartie affections of the Souldiers, which Galba had vtterly alienated. Neither did Otho himſelfe bandy againſt Galba, but Vitellius in Germanie was fauoured againſt both; Two perſons ſo vile and ambitious, as was much feared, would proue the ſcourge of the Empire, and the ruine of Rome.

Vitellius much fauoured.

(3) Vnto Vitellius ſided the Britaines, vnder the Conduct of Tribellius Maximus, (remembred before) a man vnfit for warre, and vnexperienced of ſeruice, compounded altogether of couetouſneſſe, and for his niggardly ſparings, and vnmercifull pollings, exceedingly hated of his Armie: which was further aggrauated by Roſcius Cælius, Lieutenant of the twentieth Legion, his ancient Enemie, betwixt whom the ſparks of enuie ſhortly burſt forth into flames of reciprocall accuſations. Trebellius being charged of inſufficiencie for command, with the beggering of the Prouince, and Legions; and he againe accuſing Cælius of factious behauiours, & diſſoluing of diſcipline: through which diſſenſions a negligent regard was held of the Souldiers, who carried themſelues arrogantly, euen againſt both; and as men that had rather be doing ill, then doing nothing, grew daily into mutinies. In theſe ſtirres Maximus finding himſelf vnable to withſtand Roſcius, (the common affection ſwaying on his ſide) with his friends and followers entred Germanie in the quarrell of Vitellius, and ioined thoſe Britiſh forces to maintaine his cauſe, who now preſuming vpon his owne ſtrength, and others his Confederates, ambitiouſly plaied the Prince, growne to that height euen of nothing.

In chap. 7. ſect. 24.

Roſcius Cælius & Trebellius accuſe each other.

The Souldiers thereby diſordered.

(4) Otho his Concurrent (in this thing only commendable) ſought by all meanes to ſtay the effuſion of more ciuill blood, and that alreadie ſpent, ſo poſſeſt his thoughts, that his minde was ſtill diſtracted and nightly affrighted with the ſeeming appearance of Galbaes ghoſt: for which cauſes hee ſent conditions of peace to Vitellius, offering him an equall part in the Empire, and to giue him alſo his daughter in mariage. But Vitellius diſdaining any competition, refuſeth all Capitulations, and prepares himſelfe for the warre. Otho thus conſtrained, ſets forth his forces, and in three ſeuerall skirmiſhes had the victorie, but in the fourth at Brixellum loſt the daie; yet not ſo much weakned or vnrecouerable, (his Armie in number and courage ſurmounting the other) as himſelfe was vnwilling to trie the chance of warre any more; for beeing importuned by his Captaines and Leaders, to reenforce the Battaile, with many reaſons, and probabilities of an aſſured victorie, in a thankfull and ſhort Oration, anſwered thus their Petitions.

Otho affrighted in the night.

Suetonius vita Othonis. ſect. 7.

His offer to Vitellius.

Hath the victory in three skirmiſhes.

Loſt the day in the fourth.

" (5) To hazard your vertues and valours for one " Mans eſtate, I hold dangerous, and needleſſe it is, " that my life ſhould be prized at ſo deere a rate; alrea- " dy fortune and I haue had ſufficient experience each " of others, and not the leaſt in this my ſhort time of " glorie, wherein I haue learned, it is harder to mo- " derate affections in the exceſſe of felicitie, then ei- " ther induſtrie or hazard for attaining the ſame. " Theſe ciuill warres Vitellius beganne; which I for " my part purpoſe not to continue; and hereby let " Poſteritie eſteeme of Otho, that others haue kept the " Empire longer, but neuer any that left it more vali- " antly. Let this minde therefore accompany me to " the Graue, that you for your parts would haue died " for my ſake, and I to ſaue your liues die voluntarie " and vnuanquiſhed. I blame not the Gods, nor enuie " your Emperors riſing glorie: It is ſufficient that my " houſe hath touched the higheſt ſtraine of Honour, " and my ſelfe to be left in records, The ſoueraign Mo- " narch of the World.

Importuned by his Souldiers to renew the battell, is vnwilling.

His Oration to his Souldiers.

(6) And thereupon ſolemnely taking his leaue of the whole Army, went to his Tent, and with his dagger wounded himſelfe vnder the left pappe, whereof immediately he died, in the yeare of his age thirty ſeuen, and daies of his raigne ninetie fiue. He was of ſtature but lowe, feeble in his feete, and vnto ſo great a minde, his bodie not any waies proportionable; his face without haire and woman-like, his attire nice and delicate, and his life and death nothing at all conſonant or agreeable.

He killeth himſelfe.

VITELLIVS.

CHAPTER XI.

Ann. Do. 70.

WHen certaine newes of Othoes death was brought Vitellius, he presently assumed the name of Cæsar, and administred the affairs of the Empire, with no lesse authoritie then the absolute Commander of the World. And of such acceptance was the accident, that he dedicated the dagger wherewith it was done, vnto Mars in his Temple at Colleyn, as the luckie instrument of his aduanced Estate.

Vitellius glad of Othoes death.

(2) Naturally ambitious hee was, and now the same the more inhaunced by his strengths of the German Souldiers, and the flatteries of the Senate, which euer bare saile with the faireſt winde. His entrance into Rome was aboue measure magnificall, hauing the naked sword of Iulius Cæsar borne before him, with sound of Trumpets, Ensignes, Standards, Banners, and Flags, accompanied with an Armie worthie of a better Prince then Vitellius was.

Suetan. in vit. Vitell. cap. 10. Ioseph. bell. Iud. lib. 5. cap. 8.

Otho magnificall aboue measure.

(3) His originall is diuersly reported: either framed according to the affections of his flatterers, or blasted with the tongues of deprauing backe-biters; & both in extremes, extremely disagreeing. For Q. Eulogius, as Suetonius writeth, deduceth his descent from Faunus King of Aborigines, and Lady Vitellia his wife, worshipped in many places for a Goddesse. But Cassius Seuerus affirmeth him to bee sprung from no better roote then a Cobler, and a common naughty-packe the daughter of a Baker. Howsoeuer, true it is, that Lucius his father bare thrice the Consulship in Rome, was Prouost of Syria, and in such credit with the Emperour Claudius, that in his absence and expedition into Britaine, he had the whole charge of the Empire committed vnto him: himselfe in speciall fauour with Tiberius, and in vse for his strumpets: with Caius, for his Chariot-running: with Claudius, for his dice-plaiing: and with Nero, for his flatterie: vnto whose Ghost in publike shew hee sacrificed, and disposed the Emperiall affaires at the discretion of base Stage-Plaiers.

His diuersly reported.

Vitellius in fauor with diuers former Emperours.

(4) His vnmeasurable gluttony was such, that the whole imploiments of his Captaines were to prouide him Cates, and that in such excesse, that two thousand dishes of fish, and seuen thousand of fowle, were serued to his Table at one supper; and yet was he not ashamed to commend his owne Temperance, in a set Oration before the Senate and People, who well knew him to be guiltlesse of that vertue: insomuch that Tacitus reporteth, in those few moneths wherein hee raigned, he had wasted nine hundred millions of sesterces, which amounteth to seuen millions, thirty one thousand, two hundred fiftie pounds sterling. And Iosephus thinketh if he had liued longer, the whole reuenues of the Empire had not beene sufficient to maintaine his Gluttonie. A Prince otherwise no way memorable, as being indeed without skill in profession of Armes, without counsell in matters of the greatest importance, commonly drowned in surfet, and farre vnmeet to weld weighty affaires.

(2) These defects found ready vent to his Opposites, and gaue libertie of speech in the Assemblies of their Estates: amongst whom Vespasian was held the only Morning-Starre, worthy to ascend on the setting of this darkend Sunne; vnto whom Licinius Mutianus, Gouernour of Syria, was no aduerse, Marcus Clunius Rufus of Spaine stood very well affected, and Tiberius Alexander of Aegypt for him the formost. Also with him sided the Kings Sohemus, Antiochus, and Agrippa, with the beautifull Queene Berenice: vnto whom Vespasian and his sonne Titus were well knowen, Gouernours together in the Prouinces of Syria and Iudea.

(6) The first that did reuolt were the Illyrian Bands: to suppresse which, Vitellius sent vnto Vectius Bolanus Lieutenant of Britain, for aid of that Prouince, hauing had good experience of their seruice in his warres before. As when Hordeonius Flaccus brought eight thousand Britaines to his quarrell against Otho. As also when Trebellius Maximus (formerly mentioned) ioined them to the German forces. Which last man had now againe resumed his former place in Britannie, without either Maiestie or Authoritie; but rather ruled by way of intreatie, and at the discretion of the Souldiers.

(7) Vnto whom, this Vectius Bolanus succeeded for Deputie: a man of no great parts in warre, but more temperate, and not odious for any crime. His answer vnto Vitellius was, that the Countrey of Britaine stood not so quiet, that he might spare any number thence, the Souldiers and Confederates hauing their hands full, to hold all vpright. Neither (in truth) were they fast to his side, but rather affected Vespasian, whose reputation in warlike affaires was first gotten amongst them in Britaine, in the raigne of Claudius: though we find in Tacitus, that the Vexillaries of three British Legions followed Vitellius in his expedition against the Illyrian Armie, wherein the flower and strength of all the Britaines are reported to haue been, and that their fourteenth Legion came to his aide, in whom notwithstanding he had no good confidence: but hearing the daily reuolts of the Prouinces, and the approch of Vespasian, was minded to resigne his dignitie vnto him, had not the out-cries of the people beene against it.

(8) Finally, when he had raigned only eight moneths, and fiue daies, as Iosephus accounteth, he was slaine in most ignominious maner: for his hands were bound behinde his backe, a halter fast about his necke, his clothes rent and torne, a sword point set vnder his chinne, and head held backward by a bush bush of haire, as condemned malefactors were vsed, to the end, that he might see and bee seene of all, to satisfie their malice and augment his miseries. Hee died aged fiftie seuen; and as hee is set in the Table after Malmesburie, Huntington, and others our English writers, the ninth Calends of Ianuarie: But yet it should seeme by his edicts set out against Astrologers, that commanded all of that profession to depart out of Rome and Italie before the first day of October, that much about that time he should die: for Suetonius recordeth, that the said Astrologers set another against him in the words as follow. WEE GIVE WARNING BY THESE PRESENTS VNTO VITELLIVS GERMANICVS, THAT BY THE CALENDS OF THE SAID OCTOBER HEE BEE NOT SEENE IN ANY PLACE WHERESOEVER.

(9) Of stature he was exceedingly tall, his face red, and a fat paunch, and somewhat limping vpon one legge, by a hurt formerly receiued.

FLAVIVS VESPASIAN.

CHAPTER XII.

Vespasian.

Petilius.

Ann.Do.72.

SO acceptable was the fall of this Prince, and such hopes reuiued at the entrance of his Successour, as that all mens mindes were raised to an expectation, that the glorie of the Empire, so much Eclipsed through the ciuill broiles of Galba, Otho, and this last Vitellius, should now shine againe in the beautie of her former libertie, by the desired gouernement of aged Vespasian; whose integritie, valour, and seruice, had beene sufficiently approued by his many Expeditions in all the Prouinces wherein he had to doe.

Vespasians worth and estimation.

His originall. Sueton. in vit. Vespas. sect. 1.

(2) His descent was from the Flauian family, and that but base and obscure: his Father called Titus Flauius, his Mother Polla Vespasia, his Wife Domilia, and his Sonnes Titus, and Domitian, both Emperours succeeding after him.

His imployments in former times. Tacit in vita Agric. fo. 189.

(3) In his yong yeares, hee serued as a Militarie Tribune in the Countrey of Thracia, and as Questor in the Prouinces of Crete, and Cyrene: Vnder Claudius the Emperour, he went forth into Germanie, as Lieutenant of a Band, and from thence was sent into Britannie, to be Leader of the second Legion, where the foundation of that greatnes whereunto after hee attained, was first laid: for as Suetonius hath written, therein with victorie hee fought thirty set Battailes, and was also Conquerour of the Ile of Wight: whereby two mightie Nations were subdued to the Romanes, and twentie Townes wonne from the Britaines: for which exploits he had Triumphall ornaments, worthily assigned him by Claudius, whose owne Triumph, (as Iosephus saith) was gotten without his paines, but by the only prowesse of Vespasian. After this, he gouerned Africke with singular integritie and much honour, and was lastly sent by Nero for his Vice-roy into Syria vpon this occasion.

Iosephus Bel. Jud. lib. 3. cap. 1.

Sueton. in vit. Vespas. Sect. 4.

(4) There had beene spread thorow all the East-parts, an old Prophecie and setled opinion constantly beleeued, that it was appointed by the Destinies, there should come out of Iurie him that should be Lord of the whole world: which how it serued for the Iewes to reuolt, or for the Romanes to apply onely vnto Vespasian, the euent sheweth, which cannot agree to any other, then to the person and power of Christ Iesus, there borne, and throughout the whole world still raigning: Yet vpon the confidence of such an accomplishment, the Iewes reuolted from the Romanes obedience, and slew their President Sabinus by name, putting to flight Gallus, Lieutenant Generall of Syria, that came to his aide, and got from him the maine Standard, or Ensigne of the Eagle. This Nation was so populous and strong, that none was thought fitter to stay their attempts, then was Vespasian, who with great honour and approbation, reduced that Prouince vnto their former subiection, and there remained the short time of Galba, Otho, and Vitellius their Raignes; of whose proceedings there Iosephus writeth at large, vnto whom I must referre the vnsatisfied Reader.

An ancient prophecie in all the East parts.

The cause of the Iewes reuolt.

Iosephus de Bello Iud.

(5) All which times, the ciuill stirres amongst the Romanes, gaue the Prouinces occasion to attempt their former liberties; as did the Batauians, Germanes and French, with whom the Britaines also tooke hart to reuolt: But the first that sided with Vespasian, were two thousand expert Souldiers, drawne out of the Mesian Legions, and sent to aide Otho against Vitellius; who marching as farre as Aquileia, they heard there of the certaine death of Otho, and thereupon taking the aduantage of the offred opportunitie, with an vncontrolled libertie, committed many robberies and outragious villanies: In so much, that fearing condigne punishment, they held it their best policie, to combine some speciall man by their fauours vnto them, whereby their facts might bee either quite smoothered, or lightly reprehended; neither in their opinions was any so gracious for desert or power, as was Vespasian, and therefore with one assent they proclaimed him Emperour, and wrote his name in their Banners, thinking themselues as worthy to make an Emperour, as were the Legions either of Spaine, or Germany.

Tacit. Hist. 3. cap. 9.

Vespasian chosen Emperour by the Mesian Souldiers.

(6) Of the like minde were his owne Legions in Syria and Iurie, growne now so famous by the prosecution of those warres, that they highly conceited his his valour, and their owne ſufficiencie to bee inferiour to none: And therefore all on the ſudden at Cæſarea, both Captaine and Souldier ſalute him Emperour; which title when he reſolutely gainſaid and refuſed, with drawne ſwords they threatned his death. Thus then being brought into danger euery way, he ſent his letters vnto Tiberius Alexander, Lieutenant of Aegypt, who likewiſe at Alexandria, preſently proclaimed him Emperour.

By his owne. Ioſeph. bell. Iud. lib. 5. cap. 10.

(7) At this time Vellius Bolanus ſent by Vitellius, was Lieutenant of Britaine, there ruling in a gentler and milder manner then was fit for ſo fierce a Nation: for the Souldiers hauing gotten head, by the remiſſe Gouernment of Trebellius Maximus, continued the ſame looſeneſſe in diſcipline ſtill: and Bolanus in ſtead of awe and Obedience, retained onely their affections and good wils. But moſt eſpecially the ſhort Raignes of theſe laſt Emperours (whoſe beginnings were altogether imploied to ſatisfie their licentious pleaſures, and latter times ſpent for the defenſe of their Liues from violent Deaths) gaue way to many imperfections of the Gouernors, and miſdemeanours of the common Souldiers.

Tacit. in vit. Agric. fol. 287.

(8) But when Veſpaſian had aſſumed the Empire, great Captaines and good Souldiers were ſent into the Prouinces, and into Britaine, Petilius Cerealis, that had formerly there made proofe of his ſeruice vnder Nero, in the warres againſt Boduo, and afterwards in other parts, as againſt the Gaules and Batauians, with proſperous victories. The fame of this man ſtrooke great terrour into the hearts of the wauering Britains, and amongſt them of the * Brigantes, the moſt populous State of the whole Prouince: againſt whom at his firſt approch he warred, and in many battles, and ſome of them bloudy, the greateſt part of theſe people were waſted, and their Countrey came into the Romiſh ſubiection.

Petilius Cerealis Deputy in Britaine.

(9) Whereby the glory of Cerealis might well haue dimmed the fame of his Succeſſour, had not Iulius Frontinus a great Souldier alſo, ſuſtained the charge with reputation and credit, in ſubduing the ſtrong and Warlike nation the Silures:* where he had, beſide the force of the enemie to ſtruggle with, the ſtraits, and difficult places of rockes and mountaines, for acceſſe.

Iulius Frontinus ſubdueth the Britaines.

(10) After whoſe gouernment (no further Acts being mentioned) Iulius Agricola, who in Rome had beene Queſtor, Tribune, and Pretor, and Lieutenant in Aquitania, was ſent Generall into Britaine by Veſpaſian the Emperour, the yeere before his death. This man formerly had there ſerued vnder the command of Petilius Cerealis, whereby hee had gained experience both of the People and Prouince; and at his firſt approch gathered the Enſignes of the Legions, and other aids of the Auxiliaries, (who for that yeere attended an end of their trauels, becauſe the Summer was almoſt ſpent) left by protracting time, the violence of the Ordouices ſhould further burſt foorth, who a little before his entrance, had vtterly almoſt cut off a wing which lay on their Borders, the reſt of the Countrey, as men deſirous of Warre, allowing their example.

Iulius Agricola Lieutenant in Britaine.

Againſt theſe Agricola addreſſed, who kept themſelues in places of aduantage, and durſt not deſcend into indifferent ground. Hee therefore being himſelfe formoſt, lead vp his Armie to their encounter, and ſeconded with the courage of his trained Souldiers, put them all to ſword and flight, whereby the whole Nation was almoſt quite deſtroied.

Hee ouercõmeth the Ordouices.

(11) And now that his fame began to aſcend, he knew well that with inſtance it muſt be followed, and as the firſt affaires had iſſue, the reſt would ſucceede; he therefore deliberated to conquer the Iland Mona, from the poſſeſsion whereof Paulinus Suetonius was reuoked, by the generall Rebellion vnder Boduo. But in a purpoſe not purpoſed before, and ſhips wanting, the policie of the Captaine deuiſed a paſſage; for hee commanded the moſt choice of the Aids, to whom the ſhallowes were well knowen (and without whom the Romans did almoſt attempt nothing) to put ouer at once, and ſuddenly to inuade them. Theſe Britaines, after the vſe of their Countrey manner, were moſt skilfull ſwimmers, and in ſwimming armed, able to gouerne themſelues and horſes. The Monaans thinking themſelues ſecure, for that no Ships were ſeene in their Riuer, now thus ſuddenly ſurprized, as men amazed, firmly thought that nothing could bee inuincible to them, who came with ſuch reſolutions to Warre, and therefore they humbly deſired Peace, and yeelded the Iland vnto Agricolaes deuotion.

He winneth the Iland of Mona.

(12) Who now in theſe proſperous proceedings of his fortunes, ſought not with any glorious relations or letters of aduertiſements, to improoue and augment the greatneſſe of his honour; but rather in ſeeking to ſuppreſſe his fame, made it ſhine more bright; and addreſsing himſelfe for ciuill gouernment, reformed many abuſes in his Houſe, his Campe, and in the whole Prouince, and thoſe eſpecially that moſt touched the poorer ſort, as by moderating the increaſe of Tribute and Corne, wherewith the Britains were daily burdened: by the ſuppreſsing of which enormities (and the like) an honourable opinion of him was euery where entertained, and a generall inclination vnto Peace, which partly by the negligence, partly by the auarice of former Gouernours, had beene no leſſe feared then Warre it ſelfe.

Agricola good to the poore.

(13) And whereas the Britaines hitherto ſtill harried with Oppreſsions and Warres, had little leiſure or will to apply themſelues to things which accompany Peace, and are the ornaments of Ciuil and ſettled Societies, and therefore were prone vpon euery occaſion to reuolt and ſtirre: to induce them by pleaſures to quietneſſe and reſt, he exhorted them in priuate, and helpt them in publike, to build Temples, Houſes, and Places of Aſſemblies, and common reſorts, and likewiſe prouided that the ſonnes of their Nobles ſhould be inſtructed in the liberall Arts and Sciences, commending the induſtrie, and preferring the wits of the Britaines before the Students of France, as being now growen curious to attaine the Eloquence of the Roman Gentrie, (yea euen the Gowne, the habit of peace and peaceable Arts) and to delight in gorgeous Buildings, Banquets, and Baths.

His good courſe in winning the people from wildneſſe.

The Britaines ciuilized.

(14) And thus farre had Agricola proceeded before the death of Veſpaſian, whoſe managing of the Imperiall dignitie was euery way anſwerable to ſo high a place, and whoſe death was as much lamented, as his Vertues did ſurmount his Predeceſſours. But as touching his miraculous cures of the Blind and the Lame, as they ſerue not either to bee vrged or inſerted in this our preſent Hiſtorie; ſo yet may they conuince the indurate Atheiſt, whoſe conſcience is ſeared with the ſinne of incredulitie of the Miracles wrought by our bleſſed Sauiour Ieſus Chriſt. For if the wiſeſt Hiſtorians of thoſe times haue beleeued themſelues, and left Records vpon their credit to following poſterities, that by his touch onely hee cured a Lame-man, and with his ſpittle opened the eies of the Blinde, being a mortall and ſinfull man; ſhall it then bee doubted, that hee which knew no ſinne, neither receiued the gift by meaſure, either in power could not, or in act did not worke ſuch Miracles as were the witneſſes of his Godhead, and for ſuch are recorded to confirme our faith? But to our purpoſe.

(15) When Veſpaſian had liued threeſcore and nine yeeres, ſeuen moneths, and ſeuen daies, and had raigned ten yeeres, as Euſebius ſaith, he died peaceably in his Bed; which no Emperour ſince Auguſtus euer did, hauing beene a great Scourge and Inſtrument of God againſt the miſerable Iewes; whoſe kingly race from Dauids line he ſought by all meanes to extirpate, that ſo all their hopes and expectations might for euer be cut off.

CHAPTER XIII.

Titus Emp. — Agricola Lieut.

Ann.Do.81. PResently vpon the death of this Emperour, Titus his eldeſt ſonne, ſirnamed Flauius Veſpaſian, without al contradiction was receiued and obeyed for his rightfull ſucceſſor: aſwell for that his Father in his life-time had made him his Partner in the Empire, and at his death by Teſtament declared him his Heire; as alſo for the generall opinion conceiued of him, for his inbred goodnes and noble conditions; called & eſteemed the louely darling and delight of mankinde. Indeed of a moſt comely preſence he was, & fitted thereunto with all heroicall vertues, a great Souldier, learned in the Arts, a good Oratour, a skilfull Muſitian, and could by artificiall characters write both very faſt and very faire.

Titus made Emperour without all contradiction.

Called the delight of mankind.

Sueton in vit. Tit. Sect. 1. Fitted with all heroicall vertues.

(2) His youth he ſpent in Militarie qualities, and ſerued in Germanie and Britaine with exceeding commendations, and in Iurie warred with the like glorie; which is nothing impaired by the learned ſtile of his Recorder Ioſephus, vnto whom againe for theſe affaires I muſt referre the curious Reader.

His imployment in former times.

Joſeph. bell. Jud. lib. 6. & 7. He wonne Ieruſalem in the life-time of his father.

(3) Ieruſalem, with the ſlaughter of eleuen thouſand Iewes, euen on the birth day of his daughter, with ſuch honour he wonne, that thereupon preſently he was ſaluted Emperour, euen in the life time of Veſpaſian his Father: and from that day carried himſelfe as his Aſſociate in the Empire; for with him hee Triumphed, and with him he iointly adminiſtred the Cenſorſhip, his Colleague he was in the Tribunes authoritie; and his Companion alſo in ſeuen Conſulſhips: In all which, though the Edicts went forth in his fathers name, yet were they penned by himſelfe. Of this his victorie ouer the Iewes, hee left the remembrance to poſteritie by ſtamping vpon the reuerſe of his coines IVD. CAP. with pictures expreſsing his Triumph and the Iewes ouerthrow, which in the front of this Chapter we haue alſo placed.

His faults.

(4) Somewhat he was blemiſhed with the loue of Berenice, the beautifull Queene of Iewrie, and much more with the murther of Aulus Cinna, only through iealouſie conceiued of her: and whether that was the ſinne whereof at his death he repented, is vncertain, when lifting vp his eies to Heauen, hee complained why his Life ſhould be taken from him, that excepting one offence deſerued not to die. As himſelfe in glorie wielded the Emperiall Scepter, ſo did his Subſtitutes gouerne the Prouinces; at which time in Britaine, Agricola was Preſident, and therein had ſpent almoſt two yeares vnder the raigne of Veſpaſian, in ſuch maner as wee haue declared.

His repentance at his death.

(5) In his third yeare, he diſcouered new Countries, and parts of this Iland, yet vntouched, or at leaſtwiſe not thoroughly ſubdued, as altogether vnſatiate of that which was gotten, & ſought to draw the confines of the Empire with a larger compaſſe: therefore marching Northward to the Frith of * Taus, waſted all as he went, and without any reſiſtance fortified the places with Caſtles and Bulwarkes, which hee ſtored with ſufficient prouiſion, where euerie Garriſon wintring, garded it ſelfe, and with the Summers ſeruice, euer repaired the Winters euents, whereby euermore the Enemie went to the worſe, and his deſignes proſpered as himſelfe wiſhed.

Tacit. in vit. Agric. Agricola enlargeth the Empire.

TVVEEDE, as is thought.

(6) The fourth Summer was ſpent in peruſing and ordering that which he had ouer-runne. And if the glory of the Romane name could haue permitted, or ſo beene ſatisfied, it needed not to haue ſought other limits of Britaine: for [a] Glota and [b] Bodotria, two armes of two oppoſite Seas, ſhooting farre into the Land, and onely diuided aſunder by a narrow partition of ground, the ſame was both garded and fortified with Caſtles and Garriſons: ſo that the Romanes were abſolute Lords of all the South-ſide, and had caſt the Enemie as it were into another Iland.

[a] The frith of Dunbretton. [b] Edenborough frith.

(7) In this ſtate ſtood this Prouince of Britaine at the death of Titus, whoſe ſhort raign hath left no long matters of diſcourſe, and his Acts greater vnder other Emperours, then when he was Emperour himſelfe; yet that little time wherein he gouerned, was with Iuſtice, Liberalitie and Loue of all. A great Enemie he was to Promoters, Pettifoggers, and Extortours of penall lawes, which Cancker-wormes of Common-wealths, and Caterpillers to Courts of Iuſtice, he cauſed to bee whipped and baniſhed out of Rome. Louing and familiar hee was to all his Subiects, and ſo deſirous to giue them ſatisfaction, that his vſuall ſaying was, No man ought to goe ſad from the ſpeech of a Prince. Mercifull he was to the poore, and ſo readie to do them good, that one day being ſpent by him without any notable action, in ſorrow he ſaid: I haue quite loſt a day. He died the thirteenth of September, the yeare from Chriſts Natiuitie eightie three, when he had raigned two yeares and two moneths, and in the two and fortieth yeare of his age, beeing poiſoned by Domitian his Brother and Succeſſour.

Titus gouerned with loue of all.

FLAVIVS DOMITIAN.

CHAPTER XIV.

Domitian Emp.

Agricola Lieut.

Ann. Do. 83. DOmitian attaining the Empire by the death of Titus, (wrought by himselfe) as farre differed from him in vertuous conditions, as he was linked neere him in consanguinitie of blood: His youth not spent in Armes, with his Father and Brother, but inertiously consumed in lasciuiousnesse and penurie.

Suetan. in vit. Domit. sect. 1.

(2) At Rome hee was in the Vitellian troubles, where, with Sabinus his Vncle, he had beene murdered, had not the Sexton of the Capitoll hid him in his house, and in the habit of a Minister vnknowen, thence escaped: which place afterwards, when hee came to be Emperour, he gorgeously built for a Temple to Iupiter his supposed Preseruer, and consecrated himselfe in the lap of that heathenish Idoll. Hee very speedily apprehended the hope of an Empire, for no sooner was his Father made Emperour, but that hee assumed the name of Cæsar, and in Rome caried himselfe with such prodigalitie, and so liberally made promises of the Imperiall Offices, that his father hearing thereof, said, he maruelled why his sonne sent not one to succeed him in his place. But to dissemble and cloake his idle conceits, he gaue himselfe to the study of Poesie, (although with little affection, as the end prooued) for which notwithstanding both Pliny and Martial doe highly commend him, as it is the manner of men to admire the very shadow of a good quality in Princes and great ones: and so doth Iuuenal and Suetonius praise his braue minde, for his shewes in the Amphitheater, wherein not only men, but women also were brought, and forced to fight for their liues with wilde beasts: a cruell spectacle neuertheless, and vnbeseeming to humanity.

His escaping killing.

(3) His first entrance into state and dignitie was neither greatly applauded nor gainsaid, hee seeming to carrie an equall mixture, and his vertues to hold leuell with his vice. But Ambition now supported with Soueraignty, did quickly set the scale onely for the worse side. The affaires of the Empire hee altogether neglected; and impatient of labour, or affection to Armes, daily retired into a priuate chamber or Gallery, wherein hee vsually applied himselfe onely to catch Flies, and with the point of a bodkin to pricke them thorow: whereupon one being asked what company was with the Emperour, replied, Not so much as a flie. In which princely exercise let vs a while leaue him, and returne to his better emploied Lieutenant Agricola.

His vaine misspending the time.

Tacit. in vit. Agr.

(4) Who now in the fifth yeere of his gouernment tooke the seas, and with many prosperous conflicts subdued some adiacent places and people, before that time vnknowen, and furnished with forces those parts of Britaine, which lay coasted against Ireland: to which Countrey also hee had a minde, and would often say, that if the Romans were therin planted, the Libertie of the Britaines would soone be banished quite out of sight, and out of hope.

Agricola his opinion of Ireland.

(5) Now in the sixth yeere of his Prefecture, because a general rising of al the farther Nations beyond Bodotria was feared, and passages were all beset with power of the Enemies, he manned a Fleet to search the creekes and harboroughs of the ample Region beyond it, and with his Armie marched further North. The Britaincs heereat, especially at sight of their ships, much amazed and troubled, knowing now that the secrets of their Seas were all discouered, and no refuge left if they were ouercome, armed themselues with great preparation; and the Caledonians (a most puissant and strong Nation in those parts) the formost; who, as challengers, braued the Romans so boldly, and in such manner, that some counselled the Generall to retire his forces on this side Bodotria, and rather of his owne accord to depart, then to bee repelled with shame.

He searcheth the creekes and harboroughs.

Caledonians most puissant.

(6) Agricola, whose courage could not be clouded with any dastardly feare, held on his intents; and hearing by prisoners taken, the manner of his Enemies proceedings, ordereth his host accordingly, diuiding his armie into three battles, and so lay entrenched; the weakest whereof, containing the Ninth Legion, the Britaines by Night assailed, and hauing slaine the Watch, brake into their Campe with a furious noise: to whose rescue, Agricola sent his Light horsemen, and a Band of foot, whose Ensignes and Armour glittering in the appearance of day, so rebated the edge and further purposes of the Britaines, that they gaue backe to the gates of the Trench, where, in the straits the conflict was sharpe and cruell, till in the end they were forced to quit the field. Vpon this battle so manfully fought, and so famously won, the Romans presuming that to their prowesse all things were now easie and open, cried to lead into Caledonia, and to finde out the limits of Britaine, with a course of continued Conquests: and those which erewhile were so wary and wise, waxt forward and bold after the euent, and grew to speake bigly: such being the hard condition of Warres, that if ought fall out well, all challenge a part, misfortunes are onely imputed to one. Contrariwise, the Britaines presupposing that not valour, but skill in the Generall by vsing the occasion, had carried it away, abated no whit their wonted courage, but armed their youth, transported their Children and Wiues into places of safety, and sought by Assemblies & Religious rites to establish an Association of the Cities together. And so for that yeere both parties did depart, incensed to further preparations.

Agricola searcheth out the limits of Britaine.

(7) In the beginning of the next, Agricola sending his Nauie before, which by vnexpected spoiling in in ſeuerall places, ſhould induce a greater and more vncertain terrour, followed himſelfe with his Armie by Land: hauing drawne to his partie ſome of the valianteſt Britaines, whom by long experience in Peace, he had found moſt faithfull for his Warres: and ſo arriued at the Mount Grampius, where the Britaines had lodged themſelues before, and as men nothing deiected by the vnfortunate chance of the former battaile, had now prepared themſelues attending only for Reuenge or Seruitude. And being taught, that common danger muſt be repelled with mutuall Concord, by Leagues and Embaſſages they aſſembled the power of all their Cities together, aboue thirtie thouſand armed men, as by view was taken, beſides an endleſſe number of youth which daily flocked vnto them, and many luſtie Old men renowmed in the former warres, and bearing the Badges due to their honour: at what time, Galgacus, for vertue and birth, of all the Leaders the Principall man, ſeeing the multitude hotly demaund the Battell, is ſaid to haue vſed this, or the like ſpeech.

" (8) When I behold this preſent Aſſemblie, and
" conſider the cauſe of this inſtant neceſsitie, I haue
" reaſon to preſume, that this day, and this our agree" ment in conſent, will giue a happie beginning to
" our freedome, and an end of troubles vnto our I-
" land. For, wee which inhabite theſe furtheſt Pro-
" montories, know no Land beyond vs whereunto
" wee may flie, nor no Seas left vs now for ſafetie, the " Romane Nauie thus (as you ſee) ſurueying our " Coaſts: So that combat and armes, which men of " valour deſire for honour, the very daſtard of force
" muſt now vſe for his ſecuritie. Wee that are the " flower of the Britiſh Nobilitie, and are ſeated here
" in the vttermoſt part of the Ile, ſaw neuer yet the " borders of thoſe Countries which ſerued in ſlaue-
" rie, our eies being vnpolluted and free from all con-
" tagion of Tyrannie. Our former Battailes fought
" with the Romanes had their euents, yet ſo, that re-
" fuge and hope reſted ſtill in our hands; wee haue
" hitherto liued in libertie, whereas none beſide vs
" are free; vs hitherto this Corner and ſecret receſſe
" hath defended, now the Vttermoſt point of our " Land is laid open: and things the leſſe they haue
" beene within knowledge, the greater the glorie is " to atchieue them. But what Nation is there now
" beyond vs? what elſe ſee we but Water and Rocks,
" and the Romanes within, Land-lords of all, nay ra" ther Robbers of all, both in Land and Sea? whoſe
" intollerable pride by humble ſubiection in vaine
" ſhall wee ſeeke to auoid. If the Country bee rich,
" they ſeeke to winne wealth; if poore, to gaine glo-
" rie: but neither Eaſt nor weſt, can ſatisfie their gree-
" die affection, much leſſe this cold North can ſet an " end to their deſires. To kill, to ſpoile, and take a" way by force, that falſely they terme Empire and
" Gouernement: and when all is made a waſte wilder-
" neſſe, that they call Peace. Moſt deare vnto man
" are his Children and blood; but thoſe are preſſed
" for their warres, and ſerue as their ſlaues, we know
" not where; our Goods are their tributes, our Corne
" their prouiſion; our Wiues, Siſters and Daughters,
" in Warre violently forced, in Peace vnder title of " friends and gueſts, ſhamefully abuſed, and our " own Bodies worne & conſumed in pauing of Bogs
" and other ſeruile drudgeries, with thouſands of " ſtripes, and many indignities more. Slaues which " are borne to bondage are ſold but once, and after
" are fed at their Owners expences; but Britanie dai" ly buyeth, daily feedeth, and is at charges with her
" owne Bondage. We are the laſt to be conquered,
" and therefore is our deſtruction moſt ſought, as be" ing the moſt vile in account: No Fields we haue to " manure, no Mines to be digged, no Ports to trade
" in, and to what purpoſe then ſhould they reſerue
" vs aliue? Beſides, the Manhood and fierce cou" rage of the ſubiect, pleaſeth not much the iealous
" Soueraigne: and this Corner being ſo ſecret, and out " of the way, the more ſecuritie it yeeldeth vs, in them
" it workes the greater ſuſpition. Then, ſeeing all " hope of fauour is paſt, let vs take courage to de" fend and maintaine our owne ſafetie as well as our " honour. The Icenians led by a Woman, fired the " Colonie, forced the Caſtles; and if that luckie be" ginning had not beene ended in a careleſſe ſecurity,
" the Southerne Britaines might with eaſe haue ſhaken
" off the yoake. We as yet neuer touched, neuer ſub-
" dued, and borne to bee free, not ſlaues to the Ro-
" mans; wee (I ſay) now are to make proofe of our
" valour, and to ſhew in this encounter, what men
" Caledonia hath reſerued for her ſelfe. And do you
" thinke, that the Romanes are as valiant in Warre as " they are wanton in Peace? I aſſure you, nothing
" leſſe: for not by their Vertues, but by our Iarrings,
" they are growne into fame: and of the enemies
" faults they make vſe to the glory of their owne Ar-
" mie, compoſed (we know) moſt of diuers Nations;
" and therefore as in proſperitie they hold not al-
" alwaies together, ſo doubtleſſe, if fortune turne a-
" ſide, their ſeruices will appeare: vnleſſe you ſup-
" poſe the Gauls and Germanes, and (to our ſhame be
" it ſpoken) many of our owne Nation, (which now
" lend their liues to eſtabliſh a forraine Vſurper) bee
" lead with hearts affection; whereas contrariwiſe it
" is apparant, that Terrour and Diſtruſt, (weake work" ers to conſerue loue) are the onely cauſe; which
" once remoued, then thoſe that haue made an end
" to feare, will ſoone begin to hate. All things that " may incite vnto victorie are for vs: the Romanes
" haue no Wiues to harten them on, if they faint; no
" Parents to vpbraid them, if they flie; moſt of them
" haue no Countrie at all, or if they haue, it is by in-
" truſion taken from others: A few fearefull perſons
" ſtand here before vs, trembling and gazing at the " ſtrangeneſſe of the heauen it ſelfe, at the Sea, and at the Britaines, employing both art and valour, with their great ſwords and little Targets, auoided the volue of the Romans, ſhowring down withall great ſtore of theirs vpon them, wherewith they were both galled and ſore wounded. Agricola ſeeing his men thus ſtoutly reſiſted, tooke another courſe: for, ſpying the aduantage, he commanded three [a] Batauian Cohorts, and two of the [b] Tungrians, to preſſe forward, and bring the matter to handy ſtrokes and dint of ſword, a thing which (in reſpect of their long ſeruice) they were very expert in, but contrariwiſe to the Britaines very preiudiciall, by reaſon of their little Bucklers, and huge ſwords, being blunt pointed, and no waies fit for the cloſe in fight. This command aduantaged the Romans much; for theſe with the pikes of their Bucklers, when they came to deale blowes, ſo mangled the faces of the Britaines, that they were not able to ſtand before them; and the reſt, gathering courage vpon emulation of theſe, aſcended the hill, bearing downe all that was in their way, ſo that many halfe dead, and ſome wholly vntouched, were ouer-paſſed, and left for haſte of winning the field. In the meane while the Chariots mingled themſelues with the battle of footmen, and the troopes of horſemen began for to flie: who albeit they had lately terrified others, were now diſtreſſed themſelues, by the vneuenneſſe of the ground, and thicke rankes of the enemy, and were forced to fight ſtanding ſtill, and by the maine weight of horſes to beare downe one another. The wandring Wagons alſo, and maſterleſſe horſes, as chance or feare did guide them, ouer-bare many times their friends, and thwarted their way that met them.

(10) The Britaines were marſhelled in the higher ground, fitly both to the ſhew, and to terrifie: the firſt Battalion ſtanding on the plaine, the reſt on the aſcent of the hill, knit and riſing as it were one ouer another; the middle of the field was filled with clattering and running of Chariots and horſemen. Agricola ſeeing their number to exceede his, drew his battaile in length, and leauing his horſe, aduanced himſelfe before the Enſignes on foote.

Theſe ſo fiercely aſſailed them, that a moſt ſharpe and bloody battle enſued, wherein the Brutaines on each ſide were beaten downe and ſlaine, notwithſtanding many of them ſhewed both valour and reuenge euen to the end: the reſt disbanded, turned their backes, and fled towards the deſert; whoſe purſuit was followed vntill Night, and fulneſſe of blood made an end of the chaſe.

The fight fierce on both ſides.

(13) Of the Romans ſide were ſlaine (if wee muſt credit their owne friends) onely three hundred and fortie perſons, and of them, one of extraordinary note and account, Aulus [a] Articus, Captaine of a Cohort, who vpon a youthfull heat, and fierceneſſe of his horſe, was carried amidſt his enemies. Of the Britains fell ten thouſand, and their deſignes ſo defeated and broken, that as deſperate men, they forſake their houſes, and in deſpight ſet fire on them themſelues: the hurt perſons they carrie and draw with them, and call them that are vnhurt, hoping to be releeued by them. One while they chuſe out holes to lurke in, for their liues ſafetie; eftſoones in great haſte forſake them, as doubting therein their owne ſecuritie. Diſperſed aſunder, they lament, and attend death: aſſembled together, expoſtulate of their meanes and life: one while conceiuing a glimmering of ſome ſmall hope, another while deiected with vtter deſpaire: Sometimes at the ſight of their deareſt beloued, mooued to pitie; but much oftner ſtirred to rage, for reuenge; and many of them, euen by way of compaſsion, ſlew their deareſt Wiues and Children, to rid them from their future miſeries.

(14) Agricola hauing made euery where a deſolation and ſilence, withdrew his Armie towards the [a] Horreſtians, where taking hoſtages for their fidelitie, ſent the Admirall of his Nauy to ſaile about the North Coaſts of Britaine, who with ſtrength and ſtore tooke the Seas, their terrour gone already before, himſelfe with eaſie and gentle iournies diſpoſed his foot and horſemen in their Wintring places, and planted Garriſons vpon the Borders betweene Glota and Bodotria. (15) Thus, after many conflicts, about the ſpace of one hundred thirty ſix yeeres from Iulius Cæſars firſt entrance, the vtmoſt limits of Britannie, and the Iles of the Orcades lying on the North ſide of it, were by the valour and induſtrie of Iulius Agricola firſt diſcouered, and made knowen vnto the Romans: and the South part of the Ile, in the fourth yeere of the raigne of Domitian, (being the yeere of our Sauiour eightie ſix) reduced into a full Prouince, the gouernment whereof was euer annexed and appropriate to the Roman Emperours themſelues, and not at the diſpoſition of the Senate, as other Prouinces were.

Ann. Dom. 86.

(16) This ſtate of affaires in Britannie, Agricola ſignified by letter, without any amplifying termes to Domitian the Emperour, who (after his manner) with a cheerefull countenance and greened heart, receiued the Newes, being inwardly pricked with feare and diſdaine, that his late counterfet Triumph of Germanie (wherein certaine ſlaues bought for money, were attired, and their haire dreſſed as Captiues of that Countrey) was had in deriſion, and iuſtly skorned abroad; whereas now a true and imperiall victorie of ſo many thouſand enemies ſubdued and ſlaine, was currant and famous in euery mans mouth: as being indeed a thing dangerous, that a priuate mans name ſhould be exalted aboue his Prince. In vaine then had hee ſuppreſſed the ſtudie of Oratorie, and other worthy politicke Arts, thereby to keepe downe other mens reputation, if he ſhould in Military glory be diſſeiſed by another. And to be a good Commander of an Army, was to be aboue priuate eſtate, that being a Vertue peculiar for a Prince, and therefore not lightly to be paſſed ouer. With theſe and the like incentiues his minde was tormented; yet thought he it beſt to diſſemble his malice, vntill the heat of his glory, and loue of his ſouldiers were ſomewhat abated. And foorthwith he commanded for Agricola, Triumphall ornaments, ſtatue, honours, and what elſe vſually conferred in lieu of Triumph; hee yet remaining in charge, from whence, with the like policie alſo, hee was ſhortly diſplaced. For Syria, by the death of Atilius Rufus, lay deſtitute of a Lieutenant; and that place reſerued for Men of great qualitie, Domitian gaue foorth was purpoſed for Agricola, and ſent him both his Patent and Succeſſor into Britaine; who thereupon deliuered vp the Prouince in a peaceable eſtate vnto Saluſtius Lucullus, and returned to Rome.

Agricola writeth to Domitian.

Agricola receiueth Triumphall ornaments.

(17) Where the life of Domitian was now grown vnmeaſurable vaine. The ſurname Germanicus he aſſumed to himſelfe, for ſome ſmall ſeruice therein done. The Moneths September and October he changed into the names of Germanicus and Domitianus, becauſe that in the one hee entred his Empire, and in the other was borne. He cauſed his Statue to be made in gold, and commanded, himſelfe to be called GOD. His cruelty euery way matchable to his pride. The Senatours and Nobles vpon ſmall ſurmiſes hee murdered: many new tortures hee inuented: Confiſcations and Baniſhments, were fauours, not puniſhments. Amongſt all which, the Chriſtians bare a part, whoſe Second Perſecution this Tyrant raiſed and began. The great Euangeliſt Iohn hee baniſhed into the Ile of Patmos, where hee receiued his Reuelations from Ieſus Chriſt, appearing vnto him in no leſſe Maieſtie then Daniel before time had ſeene him in his Viſions, and both (after a ſort) in one and the ſame manner: their Viſions alike, and almoſt to the like end: For as Daniel ſaw a Lion, Beare, Leopard, and Monſter with Ten horns, perſecute the Iewes Gods people, and to fall before the Stone cut without hands, which brake into powder the Image of their Tyrannicall Gouernment, to giue place to the peaceable Birth and Kingdome of Chriſt; ſo Iohn ſaw one Beaſt compacted of theſe foure, mouthed like a Lion, footed like a Beare, ſpotted as the Leopard, and horned for number and power with the Monſter, retaining their Tyrannie in raiſing Perſecutions in the Church of Chriſt, and clouding with Idolatry

(18) Among many others ſlaine by Domitian, Saluſtius Lucullus whom he had made Lieutenant Generall of Britanie was one, and the onely cauſe is reported to bee, that hee had deuiſed and madé certaine Speares or Launces for ſeruice, which hee cauſed to be called Lucullians after his owne name; which was a matter held very ſuſpitious by Domitian, who thought euerie memorable act done by another, did plucke a feather from his plume. And in theſe courſes continued ſo long, that laſtly hee grew odious to all, euen to his neareſt friends and followers which himſelfe had raiſed, who, together with his Wife, conſpired his death.

His offence.

(19) The chiefeſt in the Action was Stephen, a Procurator and Steward to Domicilla his Empreſſe, who faining himſelfe lame of the left arme, in deliuering him a ſcroll containing the names of the conſpirators, ſtroke him into the bellie with his ſword, & the reſt comming in, with ſeuen wounds made an end of his life; whoſe death was ſo acceptable to the Senate, that they diſgracefully abuſed his carcaſe, caſt downe his ſcutcheons and Images, and forbad all maner remembrance of him; albeit ſome of the Souldiers aſmuch ſtormed, ſeeking to reuenge his death, and canonized him for a God.

CHAPTER XV.

Nerua Emp.

Ann. Do. 98.

Itherto haue wee purſued the ſucceſsions in the Britiſh monarchie, together with the Inuaſions, attempts, and ſucceſſe of affaires, for the Conqueſt of this Iland, vnder the firſt twelue Emperours of Rome: And that from ſuch writers, who though they were the moſt fauourable Regiſters of things done by the Romanes, yet had they beſt meanes to know, and publiſh their Hiſtories with warrantize of truth. But after the death of Domitian died many Records, and the Prouinces proceedings (eſpecially thoſe that moſt concerne Britaine) left vncertaine; and therefore are neither with the like largeneſſe proſecuted, nor with the like authoritie auouched. And were it not that theſe Romane Emperours ſucceeding, did onely continue the ſucceſsion of our Britiſh Monarchs, many of them might be quite omitted, as neither themſelues, nor deputies, allies, or enemies once ſpoken of concerning our affaires, and the Gouernement of this Prouince, during thoſe times ſo maimed and defectiue (in reſpect of any warrantable relations) that hardly a method can bee obſerued to the fitting of a continuall Hiſtorie. Yet as we finde it, let vs haue libertie to deliuer it, and rather to expoſe Truth in the meane attire that Time hath left her, then by diſguiſing her in richer roabes to abuſe the World, and make her ſeeme nought elſe but a counterfeit, as Plutarch in the life of Pericles hath complained.

(3) What Lieutenants vnder him were in Britain or vnder his Succeſſor Traian, I find not in Record: but our Engliſh Writers from the Arch-Deacon of Monmouth, bring a ſucceſsion of Britiſh Kings, and amongſt them Marius, who conquered Rodorick, King of the Picts accompanied with the Scots, whoſe Trophie erected neere vnto Carleill, remained a long time after, bearing the inſcription of his victorie: and after him his ſonne Coilus brought vp in Rome all the time of his youth, retained their fauours, and paid them tribute without conſtraint. Albeit by Iuuenal, it ſeemeth that Aruiragus the father of Marius, a great reſiſter of the Romanes, liued in the raigne of Domitian, as hath beene touched, vnleſſe you will ſay; that Meurigus and Aruiragus was the ſame Marius, as a worthy Antiquarie affirmeth. TRAIAN.

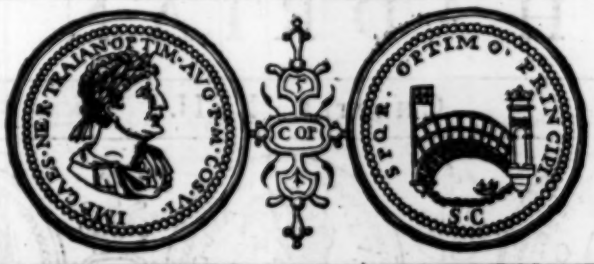
CHAPTER XVI.



Traian Emp.

Ann. Do. 99.

NTo Nerua ſucceeded Vulpius Traian in the Roman Empire; borne neere vnto Seuill in the Territories of Spaine: of a noble familie, but was much more ennobled in himſelfe for his princely endowments, which moued Nerua in his life time to adopt him into ſo high a calling, and the whole Senate after his death ioifullie to confirme his Election, and ſo often to honour him with the title of the Moſt Excellent Prince, in publike dedications, as on the Coine aboue.

Sextus Aurelius.

Traian raiſed the Romans to the higheſt glory.

(2) Hee raiſed the Romane Empire vnto the very higheſt pitch of glory, and ſpread the power of their Command into the largeſt circuit that euer before or ſince hath beene poſſeſſed. For the Kingdome of Dacia hee ſubdued; Armenia, Parthia, and Meſopotamia made ſubiect; Aſſyria, Perſia, and Babylon conquered; paſſed Tigris, and ſtretched the confines of the Roman Empire vnto the remoteſt dominions of the Indies, which neuer before that time had heard of the Roman Name. And indeed, if wee looke vpon his politicke managing of the gouernment, he may ſeeme (in compariſon of others) a right worthy, memorable and louely Prince, of much affabilitie, and familiaritie euen with his inferiours, and of ſuch cariage towards his Subiects, as he himſelfe would wiſh his Prince (he ſaid) to vſe towards him, if he were a Subiect. A great obſeruer alſo of Iuſtice, inſomuch that when he inueſted any Pretor, in giuing him the Sword, he commanded him to vſe the ſame euen againſt his owne perſon, if he violated Law or Equitie. But yet againſt the good Chriſtians he vſed neither of both: nay hee ſtirred vp their Third Perſecution, wherein Ignatius and many other worthy Saints of God, receiued the Crowne of Martyrdome, in ſuch cruell manner, as that his other vertues are much clouded by that taxation: for mollification whereof, he was compaſsionately intreated by Plinius Secundus his Tutor; whoſe Epiſtles to that purpoſe are yet extant.

(3) The Iewes in his time roſe vp in armes againſt the Gentiles, and in Cyrene, Aegypt, and Cyprus, ſlew a great number: againſt whom Traian ſent his Captaines with forces ſufficient, and in diuers parts of the Empire put the Iewes to death, in ſuch infinite numbers, as that Maſſacre is accounted the greateſt Execution that euer had beene in the world, God ſuffring this their puniſhment to light vpon them for their infidelitie and obſtinacie againſt his Chriſt.

Iewes made war againſt the Gentiles.

Traian his ſlaughter vpon the Iewes the greateſt that euer was.

(4) Finally, after his Conqueſts in the Eaſt, returning towards Rome, at Selencia in Aſia the leſſe himſelfe was conquered by the ſtroke of death, by a fluxe the ſeuenth day of Auguſt, after he had raigned nineteene yeeres, ſix moneths, and fifteene daies, the yeere of our Redemption one hundred and eighteene, and of his age ſixtie foure: whoſe aſhes brought to Rome, were incloſed within the Crowne of a goodly Pillar, wrought of one intire ſtone, containing one hundred forty foot in height.

Dion Caſſius. Polybr. lib. 4. cap. 13.

(5) Of ſtature he was bigge, of complexion ſwarthie, thinne of haire both head and beard, a hooked noſe, brode ſhoulders, long hands, and a pleaſant eie; whoſe liuely Image was borne in Triumph after his death, and that in moſt glorious and pompous manner, in celebration of his great renowne and fame attained in his life.

(6) How

Rewardes in Pretribunal.

(6) How ſilent ſoeuer writers haue beene for this Emperours affaires in this our Iland, yet it is to be thought that vnto this, as wel as vnto other Prouinces, both Propretors, Lieutenants, Preſidents, Pretors, and Proconſuls were ſent, and euery Citie to haue their municipall Magiſtrates. The Pretor that yearely proclaimed ſolemne Seſsions, wherin himſelf ſate aloft vpon a high tribunall ſeate, and guarded with his lictors about him in great eſtate, did execute his authoritie throughout his owne iuriſdiction, and determined all cauſes brought before him, where rods and axes were prepared for the common people, that were enforced to receiue a new Ruler euerie yeare. And ſurely as this yoke of bondage was grieuouſly borne of euery Prouince, vpon whoſe necke, it was impoſed & laid: So the Britaines vnderwent the weight of that ſubiection with ſuch vnwillingnes, that in the time of this Traian, they reuolted and rebelled, though preſently ſuppreſſed, as it is euident out of Spartianus.

(7) The care that this good Emperour had for the weale of his Subiects is proiected by his prouidence in making waies paſſageable from place to place, whereof remaine many teſtimonies by thoſe his Cauſeies drawne with wonderfull diligence, euen thorow the whole Iland, which now, though diſmembred and cut in peeces by the Countrie people, where-thorow they paſſed, yet doe many remnants thereof remaine, eſpecially in paſtures, or by-grounds out of the rode way, with bankes ſo high, that euidently they ſhew themſelues. Of theſe Cauſeies Gallen writeth as followeth: The waies (ſaith he) Traian repaired, by pauing with ſtone, or raiſing with bankes caſt vp ſuch peeces of them as were moiſt and miry: by ſtocking vp and ridding ſuch as were rough and ouergrowne with buſhes and briers: by making bridges ouer Riuers that could not bee waded thorow: where the way ſeemed longer then needed, by cutting out another ſhorter: if any where by reaſon of ſome ſteepe hill, the paſſage were hard and vneaſie, by turning it aſide thorow eaſier places: now in caſe it was haunted with wilde beaſts, or lie waſte and deſert, by drawing it thence thorow places inhabited, and withall laying leuell all vneuen and rugged grounds. Galen lib. 9. aq. 8. Metho.

Along theſe Cauſeies the Emperour cauſed to bee ſet little pillars or Columnes, with numerall Characters cut in thē, to ſignifie how many miles was from place to place. Of theſe Sidonius Apollinaris writeth thus:

Antiquus tibi nec teratur agger;
Cuius per ſpatium ſatis vetuſtis
Nomen Caſareum viret columnis.

Breake not the ancient Cauſeies ſtrong,

Nor names of Caſars doe not wrong.

HADRIAN.

CHAPTER XVII.

Hadrian Emp.

Cneus Trebel. Lieut.

An. Do. 119.

AFter the deceaſe of Traiane, his Nephew Ælius Hadrianus, by the conſent of the Armie, who ſwore to him obedience, was proclaimed Emperour, the Senate likewiſe confirming their choice, as beeing a man indued with gifts both of Art and Nature, anſwerable to the fortunes of his Eſtate.

Polyeb. lib. 4. c. 14.

His birth was of Spaine, in the Citie Italica, neere vnto Cicill, where Traian was born, his Father Noble, and his Mother in Cales deſcended of an honourable ſtocke.

(2) A great Mathematician he was, skilfull in Arithmeticke, Geometrie, Aſtronomie, and Iudicious Aſtrologie; learned in the Greeke, and Latine Tongues; in which languages he wrote both Poeſie and Proſe: well ſeene in Phyſicke, and knew the Vertues of Hearbes, Rootes, and Stones: A ſingular Muſitian both for Theorie and Practiſe; and could both limme & carue with approbation of the skilfull: but aboue all, is the admirable report of his Memorie, who neuer forgot any thing that he either read or heard.

Spartianus. Hadrianus of an admirable memorie.

(3) His firſt buſineſſe for the Empire, was rather a care to hold ſecurely what was gotten, then by enlarging the bounds to endanger the Beſt: and therefore leſſening the Compaſſe, and bettering the ſtrength, he planted his forces along the Riuer Euphrates, and aſsigned that for the Eaſterne limits, leauing out India, Armenia, Media, Aſſyria, Perſia, and Meſopotamia, as Countries too remote for the Romans to hold to their profit. By which his doings other Prouinces tooke occaſion to reuolt, thirſting after Libertie, and among others the Britaines (as euer moſt impatient of Seruitude) attempted alterations, whoſe Lieutenant Cneus Tribellius (Succeſſour to Iulius Agricola) could not ſo gouerne his Souldiers which were growne out of diſcipline, and by long reſt farre out of Order, but that they fell at variance among themſelues, and diſquieted the moſt peaceable of the Britaines by their licentious maners.

(4) The Northerne Inhabitants, that were more at libertie, and imboldened by their Bogs and Rocks vnacceſſable, ſet themſelues to withſtand their wrōgs, to whom alſo many others ioined their affections and forces, whereupon ſome bickering inſued with loſſe and blood; to repreſſe which Iulius Seuerus was ſent by Hadrian: but ere hee could ſettle the Commotion, was againe recalled and imploied in Syria, to ſuppreſſe the Iewiſh rebellion.

Iulius Seuerus ſent to ſuppreſſe the Commotions of the Britaines.

(5) Theſe ſtirres here ſtill continuing, the Emperour tooke it to be of ſuch importance, that he reſolued in Perſon to addreſſe for Britannie, which he performed in his third Conſulſhip, the yeare of Chriſt one

Hadrian himſelfe came into Britaine to ſuppreſſe rebellion.

XUM

One hundred twentie foure, attended on by three Legions: of which, his Army for this exploit was then compoſed, as appeareth by his money in the entrance of his life, fixed in memorie of this vndertaking: With theſe hee encountred the Northerne Riders, recouered ſuch holds as they had taken, and forced them into the Woodes and Mountaines, whither the Romane Horſemen without danger could not purſue them. But perceiuing the Aire too ſharpe for the Romanes conſtitution, and the Soile rough and of leſſe profit then the reſt, hee made a Fortification or ſtrong Wall of Earth, which (as Lampridius ſaith) did continue on the Weſt from Ituna, (that is, the Riuer Eden in Cumberland neere Carleil) vnto the Riuer Tina, or Tine at Newcaſtle in Northumberland in the Eaſt, and was no leſſe then Eightie miles in length. This Wall (ſaith he) was made of ſtakes driuen deepe into the ground, and bound together in the maner of an hedge; and with Turfe and Earth intermured as a Rampire or Bulwarke to defend the Incurſions of the wilder Britaines and ill Neighbours that daily moleſted the peace of the Romanes. Hadrian his worke finiſhed, and the Prouince reduced to the obedience of the fatal Gouerneſſe Rome, at whoſe feet he had laid againe the name of Britaine, as appeareth in the firſt Reuerſe of his Coine, placed in the fronture of this Chapter) triumphantly returned to Rome, and for his honourable aduenture and Expedition had his name inſcribed vpon his Coine with this addition: THE RESTORER OF BRITANNIE.

(6) Neither after this ſeemed the Southerne Britaines greatly to contend, but patiently bore the yoke of ſubiection, which Time and Cuſtome had made leſſe painfull, the rather, for that they ſaw themſelues to ſtand in neede of the Romanes helpe againſt the inroades of their owne Countrimen, whoſe crueltie was now as much feared, as in former times the Inuaſion of Strangers: whereupon they conformed themſelues more willingly to the Romane Lawes, both in Martiall and Ciuill affaires: which were then principallie directed by Licinius Priſcus, who had beene not long before imploied by Hadrian in the ſeruice of Iewrie, and was at this preſent Lieutenant of Britannie.

Licius Priſcus Lieutenant of Britaine. Hiſt. magn. Brit. lib. 3. cap. 1.

(7) This Iewiſh warre happened in the eighteenth yeere of the Raigne of Hadrian, who ſuddenly aſſailed and ſlew where they came, both Romanes & Chriſtians: for reuenge whereof, beſides an infinite number of them ſlaine and tortured, their Citie Ieruſalem was alſo raced euen to the ground, and another built, but not altogether in the ſame place; and the name therof changed to AELIA: the Iewes vtterly baniſhed thence, and (as Ariſtion Pellaus writeth) not lawfull for them to looke towards that Citie nor Soile, no not through the Chinke or Creuice of a dore. And vpon the Gate that leadeth towards Beth-lehem, hee cauſed a Swine to be engrauen, a Beaſt by the Law accounted moſt vncleane, and by them abhominable.

(8) But as this Emperour was exaſperated againſt the Iewes, ſo was hee gratious and fauourable to the Chriſtians, and the rather at the requeſt of Quatratus, a Diſciple (as is ſuppoſed) of the Apoſtles, who wrote vnto him concerning them; and of Ariſtides a learned Philoſopher of Athens, who made an Apologie for their defence; ſo that the Perſecution then in practiſe was forbidden by Hadrian in a publicke Edict; who (as Lampridius writeth) was minded to haue built a Temple to the ſeruice of Chriſt, had not ſome diſſwaded him therefrom. In extremitie of ſickneſs he deſigned Caeſar, Lucius Aelius, whoſe Coyne wee haue hereunder expreſſed. A man deare to this Emperour, if we conſider at how great a rate hee bought for him the acceptation of the Commons and Militarie men: And how ſhort a time the blaze of that Honour continued: for hee died ſo ſoone, that Hadrian himſelfe had wont to ſay,

(9) When hee had raigned in great honour and loue the ſpace of one and twenty yeeres, fiue moneths, and fifteene daies, hee died, the eighth or tenth of Iulie, of a dropſie: which maladie ſo tormented him, that willingly he refuſed all ſuſtenance, and languiſhed away through faintneſſe. Hee was of perſonage tall, and very ſtrong, of a good complexion and amiable countenance, wearing the haire of his head and beard long, and died aged ſixty two, the yeere of our Lord God, One hundred thirtie nine.

ANTONINVS PIVS.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Antonin. Pius Emp.

Lollius Vrbicus Lieut.

An.Do.139. NExt vnto whom ſucceeded Antoninus, (for his many vertues) ſurnamed the Pious: and by the Senate, Father of his Countrey. This man did not onely equall his Adopter and Predeceſſours, in wiſdome and other princely qualities, but was alſo compared, for his peace and policie, vnto Numa Pompilius the ſecond King of Rome, who for his renowned gouernment, is ſo famouſly in their Hiſtories recorded. His birth was in Lombardy, the ſon of Aurelius Fuluius, and Nephew to Titus Aurelius Fuluius, that had beene Conſul, and held other Offices of dignity and State. The whole time of whoſe Raigne was ſo ſpent in peace, that ſmall remembrances remaine of any martiall affaires: yet ſuch as we finde in Britannie we will deliuer.

Antoninus raigned in peace.

(2) At his firſt entrance into the Empire, about the yeere of Chriſt, One hundred thirtie nine (as appeareth by the money minted in memorie of the reduction of Britaine) the Northerne Britaines in that part of this Ile began to ſtirre, and made inroads into the Prouince, notwithſtanding the Rampire or Wall that Adrian had made. Againſt whom Lollius Vrbicus Lieutenant heere vnder Antoninus, brought his power, and with ſome skirmiſhes put them backe: taking from the Brigantes part of their Land, as a Mulct, for the waſte they had done to the Genounians, a Prouince adioining vnto the Brigantes, whoſe people had put themſelues vnder the Emperours protection. Which done, he repaired the Wall with ſtronger Fortifications; or (which is more probable) raiſed vp another not farre from the ſame, to double the defenſe: for (ſaith Iulius Capitolinus) Lollius the Legate to Antoninus ouercomming the Britaines, built another turfe Wall to diuide the Prouince, and to impeach the incurſions of the barbarous. Notwithſtanding the honour of this ſeruice (as is teſtified by the ancient Panegyricke) was (by one Fronto) attributed wholly to Antoninus the Emperour himſelfe: who, although abſent and in his Palace at Rome, yet ſitting as it were at the Helme of a Ship, did command and direct the enterpriſe, and therefore had right to the glory thereof. This Wall alſo (as M. Clarenceaux coniectureth, hauing ſeene it ſo tracted in an ancient Chorographicall Chart) was drawen from the Riuer Tine vnto Carleill: but Time and Warre haue worne it now away.

Adriens Wall fortified.

Iulius Capitolinus.

(3) In the meane while a new inſurrection was kindled among the * Brigantes, that annoied ſome of the Romane Confederats. But by the diſcretion of the Generall, it was quenched before it came to flame: for vpon the firſt rumour of the Reuolt, Lollius marched thither with part of his Armie, commanding Seius Saturnius, Admirall of the Britiſh Fleet, to waffe vpon the North of the Iland, both to defend the Coaſt from danger, and alſo vpon occaſions to further the Land-ſeruice, if need were: by which meanes, the Brigantes were eaſily reduced to obedience, euen by the preſence onely of the Lieutenant, who for his good ſeruice done in Britaine, during the ſhort time of his imploiment there, obtained the ſurname Britannicus. This may by the firſt figure in the face of this Chapter (being in the third Conſulſhip of this Emperour) be coniectured to haue hapned in the yeere of Chriſt one hundred forty one; and by inſcription of the laſt Coine in that ranke it is manifeſt that there was ſome other expedition againſt Britaine the yeere following.

(4) I cannot omit, though not directly pertinent to our purpoſe, the care that this good Emperour generally had for the diſtreſſed and perſecuted Chriſtians (who no doubt by his bounty enioied much tranquillitie heere in Britaine alſo) in whoſe defenſe hee wrote to his Deputies in Aſia, and publiſhed an Edict againſt their Accuſers, the effect whereof (from Euſebius) is this:

Antoninus Pius great defender of the Chriſtian.

Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. lib. 4. cap. 13.

The Edict of Antoninus for protection of the Chriſtians.

" (5) The Emperor Caeſar Marcus Aurelius Antoninus Auguſtus, Armenicus, Pontifex Maximus, " fifteene times Tribune, thrice Conſul, vnto the Commons of Aſia ſendeth greeting. I doubt not but the " Gods themſelues haue a care that wicked perſons " ſhall bee brought to light: for it much more doth " appertaine vnto them, then it doth vnto you, to " puniſh ſuch as refuſe to yeeld them worſhip. But " this courſe which you take doth confirme them " whom you perſecute, in this their opinion of you, " that you are impious men, and meere Atheiſts; " whereby it commeth to paſſe, that they deſire in " the quarrell of their God rather to die, then to yeeld " to the wils of ſuch as you are, and to embrace your " forme of Religion. Let it not ſeeme vnſeaſonable to " call to your remembrance the Earth-quakes, which " lately happened, and which yet are to your great " terrour and griefe; becauſe I vnderſtand that in " ſuch like accidents you caſt the enuy of ſuch com- " mon misfortunes vpon their ſhoulders, whereby " their confidence and truſt in their God is much the " more increaſed: whereas you being ſtill ignorant of " the true cauſes of ſuch things, doe both neglect the " worſhip of the other Gods, and alſo baniſh and per- " ſecute the ſeruice of the Immortall God, whom the " Chriſtians doe worſhip, and you perſecute to the " death all the embracers of that Profeſſion. In the " behalfe of theſe men many of the Prouinciall Preſi- " dents haue written before vnto our Father of famous " memory: to whom he anſwered, that they ſhould not " bee moleſted, vnleſſe they were proued to haue " practiſed Treaſon againſt the Emperiall State: and " touching the ſame matter ſome haue giuen notice " vnto

" vnto me; to whom I haue answered with like moderation as my Father did before me. And by this our Edict doe we ordaine, that if any hereafter bee found thus busie in molesting these kinde of men without any their offence, we command that hee that is accused vpon this point, be absolued, albeit he be proued to be such a man as he is charged to bee, that is, a Christian: and he that is his Accuser shall suffer the same punishment, which he sought to procure vpon the other.

Iulius Capitol.

Antonius person and vertues.

This Edict was promulged at Ephesus in the Generall Councell of all Asia: so fauourable was this good Emperour to the true Professours, and (indeed) to all sorts of men, hauing that Apothegme of Scipio Africanus rife in his mouth: That he had rather saue one Subiects life, then kill a thousand Enemies.

(6) He was of Stature tall, of a seemely presence, in countenance Maiesticall, in maners milde, of a singular wit, verie learned and eloquent, a great louer of Husbandrie, peaceable, mercifull and bounteous; in the last of which vertues, he so much exceeded, that thereby he set going whollie his owne priuate estate & demaines, whereat when his Empresse much repined, he told her, that when hee vndertooke the Title and State of an Emperour, he then did forgoe the interest and proprieties of a priuate Person: meaning that a Prince is not much to respect his priuate wealth, so as the publike wealth and welfare of the State may bee aduanced. In fine, this large Euloge and praise is fastened on him, that neither in his youth he did anie thing rashly, nor in his age any thing negligently: In which honourable course, hauing raigned twentie and two yeares, (some say twentie three) seuen moneths, and twentie sixe daies, he died of a feuer at Lorium the seuenth of March, the yeare of his life seuentie fiue, and of Christ one hundred sixtie two.

MARCVS AVRELIVS.

Chapter XIX.

Marcus Aurelius Emp.

Calphurnius Agric. Lieut.

An. Do. 162.

FRom the vertuous examples of the good Emperour Pius, proceeded a branch of no lesse towardlinesse and fruitfulnesse, Marcus Aurelius, Antoninus, Verus, Philosophus (for by so many honourable names is he remembred:) and although hee sprung not from Pius, as from his natiue roote, yet was he his adopted Sonne, and graffed into his Stocke and alliance by the Marriage of his daughter Faustina: Hee was the Sonne of Elius Verus who died Prator, and whose Pedigree is brought from Numa Pompilius, the second King of Rome; and his Mother was Domitia Camilla, daughter of Claudius Tullus.

Iulius Capitol. Lucius Verus chosen Caesar.

(2) This man chose to him for his Associate in the Empire, Lucius Verus, the sonne of Luctus Ceionius Commodus, whom Pius had adopted (but died before him) and therefore this Verus was respectiuely commended vnto Aurelius; betwixt whose natures and conditions was as much oddes, as betwixt Day and Night; The one very moderate, louing, and industrious, the other proud, careless and cruell: the fruits whereof, the poore Christians felt, whose chiefest pillers, Polycarpus, Bishop of Smyrna, and Iustinus Martyr, an excellent Philosopher, with infinite more, were put to most cruell deaths; and by him the fourth persecution of Gods Saints was begun: whose licentious and bloodie life, lasting in Authoritie the space of nine yeares, was cut off by an Apoplexie in the presence of Aurelius beeing then in expidition towards Germanie, whose Coine wee haue here expressed as wee finde it minted with his face and reuerse.

(3) Aurelius the Emperour following the warres against those, who there reuolted, was inclosed about with his Enemies, called the Quadi, and suffered great mortalitie both by Pestilence, and much more by want of Water, whereby himselfe and Host were almost consumed: At which time many Christian Souldiers being in his Campe, and commanded (as Ionas was) to call vpon their God, they fell prostrate on the ground in praiers, and obtained of him so plenteous a shower of raine, as therewith after fiue daies extreamest drouth and thirst, the whole Army was refreshed, and the Quadi contrariwise by Thunder & Lightning were quite dispersed and ouerthrowne.

Aurelius obtaineth raine by the Christians praier. Eutropius. Euseb. lib. 5 cap. 5. Acts and Monuments.

(4) This wonder (saith Eusebius) is reported euen by those Historians, who fauoured not Christianitie: and the prudent Epistle of the Emperour himselfe, (which hee wrote to the Senate for confirmation of this miracle, yet extant) doth warrant the same: whereupon he both mitigated the rage against Christs Professours, and (by testimonie of Apollinaris) named that Legion of the Christians, for an euerlasting remembrance, The lightning Legion.

Capitolinus. P. Orosius. Tertullian.

(5) In his Raigne Calphurnius Agricola was sent Lieutenant into Britannie, where the inhabitants sought some alterations of the State, sore repining at the oppressions of the Romanes. But the Surname Agricola reuiuing the remembrances of their former ouerthrowes, so daunted their Courages, that at the presence of the Generall, who came amongst them to preuent all occasions, they gaue ouer their intended enterprise: for which, and for many other his policies there vsed, he worthily deserued great commendations, but (for the most part) the glorie of all such seruices ſeruices was attributed to the Emperours themſelues, and the paines in attempting, and perrils in obtaining did commonly breed nothing but diſgrace and enuy after victorie, to thoſe by whom it was atchieued. Yet beſides the ſtories, the memorie of his being heere Lieutenant, is deliuered to poſteritie, by this Inſcription, once erected in the Picts Wall, an Altar to the Goddeſſe Surta, and now preſerued by S^r. Robert Cotton of Connington, amongſt other Monuments of like qualitie.

So alſo Lucius Verus, (whom this excellent Emperour had in the yeere 162. as appeareth by his Coine of Concord, ſet in the entrance of his life, elected his College in the Empire) to ſupply the defect of merit in himſelfe, tooke from the Conqueſt of Auidius Caſsius, and other his Captaines in Armenia, Parthia and Media, the Trophies of their victories, with which he filled vp his Title, and adorned his Money, expreſſed in the beginning of this Chapter.

(6) About theſe times, albeit other things went not ſo happily with Britaine as might haue beene wiſhed, yet one felicitie then befell her, which did both counteruaile her owne calamities, and ouerpoize the good fortunes of all other Nations: and that was the bleſſed reſt of the Goſpell of peace in this warring and vnpeaceable Kingdome, a great part thereof being gouerned at that time by King Lucius, ſurnamed Leuer-Maur. For that was the policie and ancient cuſtome of the Romans (as Tacitus ſaith) to vſe euen Kings themſelues for their inſtruments, to bring the people into bondage. And Antoninus Pius ending warre, permitted Kingdomes to be gouerned by their owne Kings, and Prouinces by their owne Comites (as ſaith Capitolinus.) This King diſliking the Paganiſme and Idolatry of his people, (though, as wee haue ſhewed, among many of them the truth of Chriſts Doctrine was both taught and embraced, euen from the firſt planting thereof) and being incited both by the exemplary life and piety of the Chriſtians, and alſo by the manifeſt miracles wrought amongſt them, and encouraged moreouer by the fauourable Edicts of the Emperours in their behalfe, and by the good affections and forwardneſſe of their Deputies heere, Trebellius and Pertinax; he gaue leaue to their Religion by publike warrant, and was the firſt Chriſtian King in the world, and Britaine the firſt Prouince that embraced the Goſpell by publike authority, as Sabellicus ſaith.

(7) This Lucius (as before wee haue touched) to be better furniſhed with Chriſtian Lawes for himſelfe and Subiects, miſſa legatione ab Imperatore Romanorum, & à Papa Romano Eleutherio, (as Nennius ſaith) for in this purerage the Church was ſo humble, to vaile (as farre as might be) her actions in the Imperiall licence, ſent two learned Clerkes, whoſe names were Eluanus and Meduuinus, skilfull in the Scriptures, to Eleutherius Biſhop of Rome: whoſe Reply to his moſt godly Demand (becauſe the fauourers of the Papall Authoritie either doe doubt it, or altogether deny it) I haue thought good heere verbatim to inſert, as I my ſelfe haue found it, in a moſt ancient Manuſcript, amongſt the authenticke Records and Conſtitutions of the Citie of LONDON.

The ſame in Engliſh:

POpe Eleutherius thus wrote to Lucius King of Britannie, for the reformation of the King and the Nobilitie of the Kingdome of Britaine: You deſired vs to ſend vnto you the Romane and Imperiall Lawes, which you would vſe in your Kingdome of Britannie. The Roman Lawes and the Emperours wee may at all times miſlike, but the Law of God by no meanes. By the Diuine Clemencie you haue of late receiued in your Kingdome of Britannie the Law and Faith of Chriſt: You haue with you in your Kingdome

Kingdome both the Old and New Teſtament: out of them (in Gods name) by the Counſell of your State, take you a Law, and therewith by Gods permiſſion, gouerne your kingdome of Britannie: For you are Gods Vicar in your Kingdome, as the kingly Prophet ſaith, The earth is the Lords and the plenty thereof, the whole world and they that dwell therein. And againe in the ſame Propheticall King; Thou haſt loued righteouſneſſe and hated iniquity, wherefore, God, euen thy God, hath anointed thee with the oyle of gladneſſe aboue thy fellowes. And againe: Lord giue thy iudgements vnto the king, and thy iuſtice vnto the Kings ſonne. He ſaith not, The iudgement or iuſtice of the Emperor. And the Kings ſonnes are the Chriſtian Nations, and People of the kingdome, ſuch as line and abide together in your Kingdome, vnder your Protection and peace; according to that in the Goſpell: As the Hen gathereth her Chickens vnder her wings. The Nations of the Kingdome of Britanny are your People, who being now ſeuered, you ought to gather them vnto Vnity, Concord and Peace, and reclaime them to the Faith and Law of Chriſt, and to the holy Church, to foſter them, cheriſh them, protect, and rule them, and alwaies to defend them from all iniurious, malicious, and hoſtile attempts. For, Woe be to the kingdome, whoſe King is a child, and whoſe Princes riſe early to banquetting: Neither doe I call a King a child, for the tenderneſſe of his Age, but for the folly and wickedneſſe and madneſſe of his diſpoſition: As that roiall Prophet ſaith: Wicked and bloud-thirſty attaine not to halfe their Age. And by banqueting I meane gluttony; by gluttony, luxury; by luxury all filthineſſe, peruerſity, and lewdneſſe: according to that of King Salomon: Wiſedome ſhall not enter into the wicked ſoule, nor ſhall it dwell in a Body enthrald to Sinne. A King hath his name from Ruling, and not from his Kingdome: and ſo long ſhall you be indeed a King, while you rule well; which if you doe not, the name of a King will not continue with you, but you ſhall loſe that roiall title; which God forbid. Almighty God grant you ſo to rule your Kingdome of Britanny, that with him, whoſe Vicar you are in your ſaid Kingdome, you may raigne eternally. To whom with the Father, &c.

(9.) The date of this Epiſtle (as by ſome other Copies it appeareth) being the yeare of the ſecond Conſulſhip of Commodus and Veſpronius, may giue great light and ſatisfaction to ſuch as are curious to know the truth, and to reconcile the differences of our Hiſtorians, touching the time: That Conſulſhip being about the yeare of Chriſt one hundred and eighty: which was at the beginning (if not a little before) of Commodus his raigne; and therefore whereas ſome refer it to the one hundred ſixty ninth yeer after Chriſts Paſſion, it is apparant to be the only error of tranſcribers, who ſo writ in ſtead of one hundred ſeuenty nine after his birth; which was, anno currente, the very time of Commodus being Conſul the ſecond time: and on this yeere agree, both forrain and domeſtick writers of this matter. And albeit the very texture of this Epiſtle, carieth with it the true Character of Antiquity, yet becauſe our worthy writers, mentioning this Epiſtle, are charged of flat forgery (by ſuch who challenge to be Maſters in all ancient knowledge) we will adde ſomewhat, to waſh off thoſe falſe aſperſions, both from the Record, and from the mentioners thereof.

Parſons 3. Conuerſions. Part. 1. c. 4.

Their firſt exception is, that the Latin Copy would doubtleſſe haue been produced by them, if it had not beene counterfeit. Whereto what need we anſwer, ſith now we haue produced it, and can produce as many, as there are Copies of King William the Conquerors Lawes, wherein it is expreſly repeated? The next is, that the Engliſh tranſlations of it differ each from other. A reaſon more childiſh then the former, ſith euery man hath a ſeuerall conceit of that he tranſlateth, and ſometimes the very Originalls, (by tranſcribers ignorance or omiſſion) cauſe variety of tranſlation, as may appeare in the varia lectiones of this Copy prefixed. The laſt, but moſt ſaucy and ignorant exception is, that the places of Scriptures mentioned in the letter, are ſo ſottiſhly and ſenſeleſly applied, as is vnworthy to be fathered on the learned Eleutherius. Let vs therefore in a word, bring the diuinity of this Grand-cenſurer to the touchſtone: For Eleutherius proueth, firſt, that Kings are Gods Vicars in their kingdome, becauſe the whole Earth is properly Gods, and therefore Kings haue it not as their owne, but as his Lieutenants: Next, that as Dauid typically, and Chriſt impliedly, was by God anointed King, for the execution of Righteouſneſſe and Iuſtice, ſo euery godly King ought to make that the only end of his high honor, that being by God aduanced, he might likewiſe aduance Righteouſneſſe, Iuſtice, and the ſeruice of God, whoſe vaſſall he is: and that therefore Gods iudgements and Lawes, are to be preferred by them, before all humane Lawes: with which they ſhould rule and cheriſh their godly ſubiects as their children: and protect them and gather them vnder one faith as Chriſt (their maſter) doth, who therefore compareth himſelfe, to a Hen gathering her Chickens vnder her wings.

Parſons ibid.

The defects of which Princely duties, Eleutherius moſt liuely expreſſeth afterward; in ſo proper applications, as if the learneſt fathers on theſe places be duly examined, they will be found no whit to exceed the apprehenſions of this Godly Biſhop. But if Robert Cowback, would haue caſt his eie on the moderne Popes, and their Cardinals applications of Scriptures, what would he then ſay? God made a greater light and a leſſe: therefore the Pope is as much greater then the Emperor, as the Sunne is bigger then the Moone. Chriſt ſaid to Peter, Kill and eat: therefore the Pope may excommunicate and depoſe Kings (yea and kill them too for a need.) Peter ſaid, Behold two ſwords; therefore the Pope hath both Temporall and Spirituall Iuriſdiction ouer the world. So God ſaid to Ieremy, he ſhould plant and tranſplant: therefore the Pope may diſpoſe and tranſpoſe all Kingdomes at his pleaſure. Chriſt to Peter, thou art Cephas, and Cephas is a head; therefore the Pope is head of the Church. Domini ſunt Cardines Terræ. The earth is the Lords: therefore the Cardinals are the Lords of the Earth. On ſuch pillers and applications of Scriptures, is the whole Papall greatneſſe founded, and yet theſe late Scribes can ſcoffingly cauill at the godly applications of ancient Eleutherius. But to our purpoſe.

Cephas is a ſtone but all ſerues their turne.

(10.) This Epiſtle with two other Preachers, Faganus and Damianus, ſent vnto King Lucius, did not a little encourage him in his godly purpoſe, in ſomuch that receiuing Baptiſme, the Temples of the Heatheniſh Flamines and Arch-Flamines euen thirtie one in number, were conuerted into ſo many Chriſtian Biſhops Sees, whereof London, Yorke and Carlain, now Saint Dauids, were made the Metropolitants of the Prouince.

(11.) A table remaining in the Pariſh Church of Saint Peter in Cornhill London, recordeth that the foundation thereof was by this King Lucius, and that Church to haue been the Cathedrall to that Archbiſhops See. There be that aſcribe the foundation of Saint Peters Church at Weſtminſter vnto him; vnleſſe the places are miſtaken. Others affirme that this King Lucius likewiſe built a Church within Douer-caſtle, to the ſeruice of Chriſt, endowing it with the Toll or cuſtomes of that Hauen. Differences there are about the time of his Raigne, but none at all for his conuerſion and eſtabliſhing of the Chriſtian Faith. As for thoſe who would haue this Lucius after his Baptiſme to ſaile into Gallia and other forrein parts, where ſubduing many Pagans, he became the Apoſtle to the Bauarians, and that his ſiſter Emerita fifteene yeeres after was martyred in the City Auguſta: I find thereof no warrant in any ſufficient writer; but in this all others agree, that he raigned twelue yeeres, and lieth buried in Glouceſter.

CHAPTER XX.

Ann. Dom. 181.

Eutropius.

THE prudent life, and loue conceiued of so good a Father, gaue hopefull signes and ioifull entrance vnto the Raigne of yong Commodus, his soone degenerating Sonne; who had nothing from him but Nature, and that also much suspected: The knowne Adulteries of Faustina, his Mother strongly confirming the opinion of Bastardie.

Commodus his qualities.

(2) At nineteen yeeres of age, he was inuested Emperor, his raigne not long, but life as loose and impious as the worst: in sottish pride equalizing Caligula, for intemperancie another Vitellius, and in cruelties a second Domitian. Three hundred Concubines continually he kept, and vpon one of them, named Martia, so doted, that he wore her painted Picture vpon the outside of his Garment; and instiling his money Herculi Commodiano or Romano, which was stamped about the yeere 193. Sometimes (Hercules-like) would shew himselfe roabed in a Lions skinne, bearing a Club in his hand in stead of a Scepter. Other whiles wantonly clad in the habit of an Amazon woman; alwaies costly, but seldome ciuill. Cassiodor.

Commodus altered the Months.

(3) The Month August, he named Commodus, September, Herculeus, and December, Amazonius, according to his owne or his Concubines names. Commendable in nothing but for his skill in darting, and for some small breathing of the persecuted Christians; which came not of himselfe, but (as Xiphilinus writeth) by the mediation of Martia his beloued Concubine, who was found very fauourable to their doctrine: But the outragious wickednesse of his life made him so hatefull to all, as that his death was often plotted; and once by some of the Noblest, with whom Lucilla his owne Sister conspired; for which fact he put her, with the rest of the conspirators, to death. The Empire and all things els he wielded at the discretion of others, attending only his voluptuous pleasures, howsoeuer the State or Prouinces fared vnder him. Euseb. lib. 5. cap. 19. Acts and Monuments.

(4) In Britanny the Northren Borderers brake thorow the Wall, and finding the Frontiers but weakly guarded entred the Prouince, where suddenly they surprized the Roman Generall; and killing many of the Souldiers, ranged the Country, wasting (without resistance) all where they went. Commodus at Rome, hearing these stirres in Britaine rouzed vp his spirits, and sent one Vlpius Marcellus to stay their fury; who with great difficulty forced them back beyond the Wall: and seeing the careless seruice of the Souldiers, reuiued againe the ancient discipline of Warre, that by long ease had been left off by the Romans. The repressing of this incursion, as it seemeth by some reuolt of the prouince, was about the yeere of Christ one hundred eighty six, as appeareth by the monies of this Emperor set in the entrance of his life, at which time in memory of some worthy expedition and victory against the Britains he stamped them. Vlpius Marcellus sent Lieutenant into Britaine.

(5) This Lieutenant Marcellus is reported to be of a maruellous great temperance and strange diet; for all the time of his abode here hee would eat no Bread, but such as was baked in Rome, neither slept he more then would maintaine nature, whereby both his priuate businesses and proiects for publike seruices were commonly dispatched by night. Seuere he was in the execution of his place, not led by fauour of the person, nor staid from iustice by corrupted Bribes; esteeming Money only for necessity, and riches no further then made for publike good: But those his vertues though now with vs they get him honour, yet then did purchase him Enuie with the Emperor. Who liued (saith Lampridius) for his Subiects mischiefe and his owne shame: For Commodus hearing Marcellus daily commended, construed his Praise to be his owne Reproch; and doubting least he should grow too high, thought good to crop him off betimes, and so sent him Letters of discharge. Dion. Cas. lib. 72. Vlpius Marcellus a man of great vertues. Lampred.

(6) The Armie then feeling the raines loose that ere-whiles had beene borne with a stiffer hand, fell straight to a disordered mutinie, and therein proceeded with such boldnesse as they openly refused any longer to acknowledge Commodus for their Soueraigne: At which time Perennius was a chiefe Agent and so ruled all in Rome for the Emperor, as that he entertained a hope to be himselfe (in time) an absolute and sole-ruling Emperour, and hauing now fit occasion offred to spread his power further; he tooke vpon him to redresse these disorders (whilst Commodus wallowed in his lasciuious idlenesse) and displacing some worthie Captaines at his owne pleasure, sent other persons of meane respect or parts, to command those Legions in Britaine, that formerly had been led by Noble Senators and men of Consular dignity, whereby greater mischiefe began to accrew and ciuill dissensions daily to burst forth, the Armie scorning their vpstart Perennius the greatest substitute vnder Commodus.

vpstarst Commanders, and the Captaines insulting ouer the Souldiers, (of all sides) the Aides so disquieted, that had the Britaines followed the aduantage, the whole Prouince at that time had been in hazard to be lost: vpon which distractions no lesse then fifteene hundred Souldiers at once went out of the Land to Rome to complaine their wrongs vnto Commodus: where charging Perennius to bee the stirrer of these troubles, with an intent thereby to raise himsefe or his sonne to the Emperiall Maiesty (a string that cannot be touched without sound in a Soueraignes eare) they were so farre heard and beleeued that Perennius was to them deliuered to be put to death, which accordingly they accomplished with all extremity.

Perennius deliuered to the British Souldiers to be put to death.

(7) Then was sent for Lieutenant into Britaine Heluius Pertinax, a man of low birth, but high Fortunes, being risen from the state of a common Souldier, to the dignity of a Consull, and had been Commander before that time ouer many Prouinces. Him had Perennius discharged from Britaine, and with disgrace sent and confined into Liguria where hee was borne, whose credit Commodus again with such fauors repaired, that he gaue him the Sirname Britannicus, which glorious title also himselfe had taken about the yeere 184. At his first entrance and ariuage, he assaied by rough hand to suppresse the rebellions of the Army, and aduentured his person so farre in some tumults that he was stricken downe and left for dead: but afterwards proceeding with better aduice he composed those troubles with most seuere punishments of the principall offenders: whereby notwithstanding he presently grew odious to all, and thereupon so far feared his own safety, that he made suit to the Emperor to be discharged of his Lieutenantship.

Lamprid. Heluius Pertinax sent Lieutenant into Britaine.

Out of a coine of this Emperors instiling him Brit. in the 8. yeere of his Tribunesship and 4. of his Consulship.

Heluius Pertinax made suit to be discharged of his office.

(8) Vnto him succeeded Clodius Albinus in the Gouernment of Britaine, a man of great birth, forward enough, and fortunate, for which the Emperor Commodus either vpon fauor or feare, did honour him with the title of Cæsar, though Albinus seemed vnwilling to accept of the same, and afterwards discouered his disposition more openly in approuing the Ancient and free state of the Romans. For vpon a false report of the death of Commodus, he made an Oration to the Legions in Britanny in fauour of the Senate, whose kind of Gouernment he much commended and preferred before the rule of the Emperors: Of which his affection when Commodus vnderstood, he sent Iulius Seuerus in all haste, to take charge of the Armie: and Albinus retired himselfe from all publike affaires, vntill the death of Commodus, which not long after followed, and was wrought vpon this occasion: He hauing assigned many to die, and to that end had inrolled their names in a scroll, it chanced Martia his Concubine to light on the same, wherein she saw her selfe allotted for one: And reuealing this his purpose to others, that stood in the same list, and in the like danger; they together thought best to secure their owne liues by his death: and with poison, stabs and strangling made him away, when he had liued one and thirty yeeres, foure moneths, and viciously raigned thirteen yeeres eight moneths and fifteen daies, the yeere of Christs natiuity one hundred ninety and three: the night before the Kalends of Ianuarie.

(9) Of stature he was indifferently tall, of a fine constitution of Body, very faire of complexion, with cleere eies and golden locks, neither in person nor in Princely parts resembling his Father: How ioifull the death of this Tyrant was both to People and Senate, their execrations pronounced against him, and their assemblies in the Temples to giue thanks for their deliuerance, do manifest, as is at large reported by Lampridius, who wrote his life, and stiled by al, Hostis humani Generis, The enemy of Mankind: The very name of the diuell.

PVBLIVS HELVIVS PERTINAX.

CHAPTER. XXI.

UPON the person of this Heluius Pertinax (of whom we are now to speake) Fortune (as it seemeth) meant to make the full experience of her power, and from a very slender foundation to raise the building of her owne Pride: His birth was but poore, and parents as meane, whose Father from a seruile condition got to be free, and traded in Mercery wares for his liuing: himselfe educated according to his birth rose by degrees to mount the Chaire of all wordly glory, and to be the Monarch of the whole world.

Dion. Cass. lib. 73.

(2) At first a Schoole-master, and taught the Grammar; next a Ciuil-Lawyer, and pleaded causes in Courts; and lastly, a Martial-man, and serued in Campe: where Fortune attended him with such fauourable successe, that within fiue daies, out of the ranck of a common Souldier he was preferred to bee Captaine of a Cohort, in the Syrian warres against the Parthians, which ended, he was imploied into Britannie, Missia, and Germany, and also had charge in chiefe of a Fleete vpon the Flemmish Seas: he serued likewise in Dacia, with such honourable proofe of his valour, as that wise Emperour Marcus Aurelius held him in high esteeme, and afterward made him Senator of Rome. Then was hee assigned Gouernour of all Syria and Asia, the greatest place of Credit and reputation that might be; and from thence sent againe into into Britaine, choſen out as the principall man, of note for to ſtay the Commotions there raiſed againſt Commodus, where in the Field he was left for dead: but thence alſo returning after hee had gouerned foure ſeuerall Conſular Prouinces, was created Proconſull of Africa, and immediately after Praefect of Rome. Neither yet made he his ſtand there, (though the greateſt of any ſubiectiue degree) till hee had mounted the Throne of Maieſty, and had obtained the command ouer All: which fell to his lot by the death of Commodus; and by the meanes of Martia, Ælius Latus, and other Conſpirers of his end.

Heluius Pertinax made Emperor.

(3) For the Murther being done in the dead of the night, Latus in great haſte repaired to Pertinax his lodging; at whoſe ſight the Old man in bed, expected nothing but Death, as ſuppoſing him ſent from Commodus to no other end. But Latus ſalutes him by the vnexpected name of Emperour, carrying him with acclamations vnto the Army, and in the morning to the Senate, where, of them all with great ioy, he was confirmed Auguſtus.

Heluius Pertinax enuied by the Pretorian Coherts.

(4) His firſt buſineſſe was to bridle the Licencious liues of the Pretorian Cohorts & iniuries done by them vnto the Romane Citizens, which gained him ſuch hatred, that it was cauſe of his death: For theſe men growne diſordered and lawleſſe in the raigne of Commodus, held themſelues wronged, to be nowlocked vnder the conſtraint of Lawes ciuil Gouernement: and theſe only enuied the peace & proſperity of Pertinax, whereas all the Prouinces abroad at the very hearing of his Election, and fame of his Imperiall vertues, laid aſide their weapons, and diſired to embrace peace with a Prince ſo nobly qualified.

Sabellicus.

(5) The firſt that conſpired againſt his life, was one Falco; whom notwithſtanding he freely forgaue, yet puniſhed certaine Souldiers thereto acceſſary: whereupon, the reſt aſſembling themſelues in tumultuous and furious manner, with their drawn ſwords inuaded his Palace. Hee ſeeing their purpoſes ſought no eſcapes, but deſcending the Palace, met them in the baſe Court: At whoſe preſence and Maieſty they were much amazed, and a while made a ſtand: vnto whom with great grauity, and without ſhew of any feare, he thus ſpake vnto them.

Heluius Pertinax aſſaulted by his Souldiers.

Heluius Pertinax his ſpeech to his Souldiers.

" (6) Souldiers and Companions, if you come to " kill me, (as I thinke you doe) you ſhall therein per- " forme an act neither valorous, nor otherwiſe very " commendable for you, no, nor any way grieuous " vnto my ſelfe, for euery mans life hath his limit, and " to mine, by Natures courſe, the laſt period cannot " be farre: Or thinke you that I feare death, who now " am ſo ripened for it, and haue already gotten the " very height of all renowne vnto my Name? Surely " you are deceiued: but at this I grieue, that my life " and ſhort time of Gouernment, which I had deuo- " ted to the good of all, ſhould ſeem ſo diſguſtfull vn- " to any, as to deſerue a violent and haſtned death, eſ- " pecially by you, who are by office, the Guarders of " my Perſon: you (I ſay) whoſe charge and Oath is, " to ſecure your Soueraigne from perill, and now ſeek " to ſheath your Swords in his breaſt, ſhall either " leaue a Teſtimony of my bad life deſeruing it, or " brand your places with ſuch ſtaines of Treaſon, as " Time ſhall neuer weare away. And what I pray is " mine offence? for maintaining your Lawes? why, it " was the charge your ſelues impoſed vpon me. Are " Lawes too ſtrait? ſurely, not to the vertuous, who " are euen a Law vnto themſelues: are they need- " leſſe? why then were they made? and being made, " why ſhould they not be executed? If the death of " Commodus grieue you, was I the cauſe? If he were " made away by Treaſon, your ſelues are conſcious of " my innocency. And this I aſſure you, in the word " of a Prince, that his death ſhall depriue you of no- " thing, which you require, if you require nothing " but that which is honeſt and iuſt. My life, whilſt I " was a Subiect, was ſpent with you in Warre, now (be- " ing your Soueraigne) is conſumed with cares for " your Peace: which if you free me of, by taking it a- " way, my troubles ſhall thereby end, but your con- " ſcience ſhal begin to grone vnder the guilt of blood " and perchance bee touched with too late Repen- " tance.

(7) His words were ſpoken with ſuch a mouing grauity, and vnmoued reſolution, that the formoſt in the attempt gaue back, and were aſhamed of their audacious enterpriſe, but the reſt furiouſly driuing forward, one Truſius with a Lance ran him into the Breaſt, whereupon Pertinax couering his Head with his robe, quietly yeelded his body to the traiterous ſtrokes of them all, and ſo died that poore, old, and innocent Emperor. The yeeres of his life, ſaith Iulius Capitolinus, were ſixty, ſeuen moneths, and twenty fiue daies: But Dio, Spartianus and Herodian accounteth them to extend to ſixty eight: Euſebius to aboue ſeuenty: The like diſagreement there is for the ſhort time of his Gouernment: for Euſebius ſaith that he raigned not fully ſix Moneths: Eutropius ſaith but three: Iulius Capitolinus and Aurelius Victor, eighty fiue daies: Dio, Herodian, and Spartianus, two Moneths and twenty eight daies: how long ſo euer, thus he liued, and thus he died, the fift Calends of Aprill.

CHAPTER XXII.

An. Do. 194.

THE ſtate of man continually attended with vncertaine chance, apparantly doth ſhew, the weake condition that nature enioieth, and with what vnſureneſſe the ſeat of maieſty is poſſeſt, as is ſeene by the precedent Emperor, who ſitting at peace in his Palace at Rome, renowned, beloued, and guarded with the ſtrengths of Europe, Aſia, Africa, AEgypt, and Greece, was notwithſtanding ſurpriſed and ſlaine at noone day, by a Band of Souldiers, not much exceeding the number of three hundred, and all eſcaping vnpuniſhed, the deed was ſo ſuddaine and mens minds ſo diſtracted, that it could not be fully beleeued, though witneſſed by ſight.

(2) The Senators miſtruſting each others, abandoned the Citie, and the Citizens in ſecret ſecured themthemſelues, all in an vprore, but none for reuenge of the treaſon: The murtherers, in as great feare as any, fortified their Campe, and with weapons in hand ſtood vpon their guard: But ſeeing all in a maze, and nothing againſt them attempted, a further boldneſſe (the like before neuer heard of) enſued: for by a Common Crier they made Proclamation for the ſale of the Empire, to any man that would giue them moſt: which offer was readily accepted by Didius Iulianus (a man of much more wealth then honeſty of life, and a Lawyer, ſaith Euſebius) who with larger promiſes then euer were performed, obtained the Emperiall Diadem.

Aelius Spartianus Proclamation for the ſale of the Empire.

Didius Iulianus buieth the Empire of the Roman Souldiers.

(3) His birth was in Millen, the ſonne of Petronius Didius Seuerus, his mother Clara Emilia, and himſelfe brought vp in ſeruice vnder Domitia Lucilla, the mother of Marcus Aurelius, by whoſe fauours, he was firſt made Queſtor, next Edile, & then Prætor in Rome. In Germany as a Captaine hee ſer[illegible] vnder Aurelius, then was he appointed Gouernour of Dalmatia, Bithinia, and of the Lower Germany, and was Conſul with Pertinax, and afterwards Proconſul in Affrica. Theſe were his riſings and meanes to that Maieſty, which not long he kept: for hated in Rome and not approoued abroad, Syria choſe for Emperor their owne Generall, Peſcenius Niger, Germanie, Septimius Seuerus. By whoſe conſent Clodius Albinus leader of the Britaine Armie was firſt elected Cæſar, and then his fellow in the Empire, whereby the Ægle, the faireſt of Birds became monſtrous, and in one Body bore three Heads.

(4) For Albinus at that time hauing gotten againe the gouernment of Britaine, where erecting his owne Statues and ſtamping his picture in his Coynes, gaue great ſuſpition that he intended to be a Competitor, and with his Army a foot meant to haue gained the Emperiall ſeat it ſelfe, by aduantage of Septimius forces, abſent in ſuppreſſing of Peſcenius; which to diuert inforced Seuerus vntill better oportunity, to declare Albinus his companion, for he much more feared him then either of the former: Becauſe Didius in Rome, and Peſcenius in Antioch conſumed their times in banquetting, and vnmartiall diſports, whiles Albinus managed his office moſt ſouldierlike, and was highly eſteemed and honored of them.

Albinus Gouernour of Britaine, a Competitor for the Empire.

(5) Seuerus haſting towards Rome, was met in Italy by Ambaſſadors from Didius, with faire offers of peace, and poſſeſſion of halfe the Empire: but refuſing compoſition and making ſtill forward, the Senate that ſo lately declared him a traytor, now proclaimed him an Emperor: And the Souldiers vnſatisfied of the couenanted promiſes, and in hope to purchaſe fauour with Seuerus, ſlew their Chapman Didius in his Palace, the Calends of Iulie, being but fiue daies after he had done himſelfe as much for Pertinax, when he had raigned, as Eutropius ſaith, ſeuen months: Spartianus ſaith but two, and Dio ſixty ſix daies: the yeere of his age fifty ſeuen, and of our Sauiours appearing in our fleſh, one hundred ninety and foure.

SEPTIMIVS SEVERVS

Chapter. XXIII.

Sept. Seuerus.

Clodius Albinus.

An. Do. 194.

Seuerus hauing by this bloudy accident of the giddie multitude gained with more facility then he expected, the fatal ſeat of gouernment, it was his next in place to ſuppreſſe Peſcenius by force, and Albinus by falſhood: whoſe Actions & liues ſince they hapned with this Emperor, and ended with his ſword, I will record together, beginning with Caius Peſcenius firſt, ſince firſt he fell vnder the fortune of this man.

This olde man in the yeere of Chriſt one hundred ninety foure, was elected Emperor by Acclamation of the Syrian Armie, of which (though begun but by a handfull in reſpect of all the other Emperiall forces) he had good hope, ſince to the honor of that Goddeſſe he dedicated the firſt marke of his Soueraigntie, the minting of his mony.

A perſon he was of ſeemly ſtature, louely feature and faire skinne, except his Neck, which differing ſo farre from the reſt gaue him the ſirname of Niger: his complexion was ruddy, his Body fat, his voice ſo piercing, that it would be heard a mile off: and his haire for more ornament long hee wore in reflected curles vpon his ſhoulders. A commendable ſouldier and well bearing himſelfe in the military offices hee vnderwent. In his Lieutenancy abroad he was ſeuere, and at home he ſo well acted his part when hee was Conſul, as in his Clemency and Iuſtice hee ſeemed emulous of Pertinax. Thus all his life he enioied the goodneſſe of his merit and fortune, and had not his ambition begun, where his yeeres were ending, had ſo parted: For no ſooner had hee put on the Robe Emperiall, but Seuerus defeated his Armie at Cizicum, purſued him to Antioch, and tooke him at Euphrates, ſending to Bizantium his head a Trophie of the Conqueſt, and to his wife, children, and followers (vnto whom at firſt this Victor granted baniſhment) in the end denied life.

(1) Now as ſoone as Seuerus made his approch neer Rome, he gaue command that the Pretorian Cohorts ſhould attend him diſarmed; which done, he vehemently checkt them for their proditorious trechery againſt Pertinax, and pronouncing ſentence, depriued them both of name, honor, and armes of Souldiers, and baniſhed them from Rome, and the circuit thereof for one hundred miles diſtance: which act of his wonne him such reputation, that in Rome the whole Story of Pertinax his ruine, and Seuerus his aspiring to his Throne, was at large portraited in an excellent peece of worke, of solide molten brasse, as Herodian relateth, though he ascribeth the occasion of it, to a dreame of Seuerus.

(2) Those two obiects Didius and Niger, who gaue some hinderance to Seuerus his beginning, being thus defeated of their high hopes; the third, which was Albinus, seemed now a more dangerous cloud, which would altogether ouer-cast his brightnesse & glory, if it were not dispersed or blown back in time: and therefore to make faire weather with him, hee created him Cæsar and his Successor in the Empire, but afterwards his good fortunes thus swelling in the East, and himselfe still courted by Ambassadors from all parts, with their tender of subiection, he began to grow proud, and to disdaine any Copartner in State: and thereupon first secretly sought the destruction of his Cæsar; which failing, he then proclaimed him Traitor and Enemy to Rome.

Albinus made Successor in the Empire.

His death practised.

Proclaimed Traitor.

He wageth warre against Seuerus.

(3) Clodius Albinus brought into these vnexpected dangers, prepared his strengths, and with the choice of all Britaine entred France, and neere vnto Lions tooke the field against the Emperour; but with no better successe, then Pescennius had done in Asia the lesse, in the same place (as Herodian, Eutropius and Spartianus affirme) where Darius was first ouerthrowne by Alexander. The Armies ioining, a bloody Battaile was fought, which through the great prowesse of the Britains went at first so sore against Seuerus, that being beaten off his Horse, despairing of Victorie, and almost of Life, cast off his Imperiall Robe, and flying, ignobly hid himselfe. Lætus one of Seuerus his Captaines, kept aloofe all this while, of purpose as was thought, to bring the Emperour to ruine, and now vpon report that hee was slaine, came on most furiously with his forces, in hope of winning both the day, and the Empire to himselfe: whereupon the Emperor drawne againe into the field, the day was his by the meanes, but not the meaning, of Lætus: whom on attainder of his Treason he afterward put to the sword. That day a great part of the flower of Britaine was slaine, together with their valiant Leader Albinus, a Captaine of exemplary Seuerity and Martiall discipline, a great admirer of Hannibal and Marius; for the Scipio's he thought them rather fortunate then valiant, and in the time of his seruice in this Iland, there was no toile which hee commanded his souldiers, but himselfe would beare therein a part, euen in carrying of burdens on his Backe: and yet so farre from vaunting of his valour, as that when an Historian would haue recorded his noble Acts, he willed him to write of theirs who were already dead, whom he need not to flatter; holding it a foppery to write of those, of whose fauour or wrath the Inditers stood in hope or feare: Being such a one, no maruaile if Seuerus so feared him, as he did, which he shewed euen after hee was slaine, by putting incredible numbers of great Personages both in the City and Prouinces to death, with this one Pretence, for all, that they wished well to Albinus.

Albinus vanquished by Seuerus.

After this ouerthrow Seuerus forthwith sent Heraclianus hither, to keepe the rest of the Britaines in quiet, and to be Lieutenant in Albinus his roome, as Spartianus writeth: Of whose affaires therein little remembrance is left, onely it seemeth by a Coine of Seuerus minted in his second Consulship, which fell in the yeere of our Sauiour one hundred ninety eight, and about the period of this his last Competitor, that the Britaines gaue not at first their seruice and seruitude to this man, vntill he had made the purchase of it by his sword; the brand of which he hath left to posteritie in figuring the Goddesse Victory seated vpon spoiles, and writing in a shield, Victoria Britan.

Spartianus.

Vnto this Lieutenant, Virius Lupus succeeded President of Britaine, as Vlpian the Lawyer termes him, and was about the yeere of Christ one hundred ninety seuen, as appeareth by this Inscription erected at Olinacæ amongst the Brigantes, in memory of the reedifying of that place by this Emperor and his eldest Sonne, then first designed Cæsar, by which the time is discouered, and in this stone inserted.

Virius Lupus made President of Britaine.

(4) This man strengthned the Prouince especially in the North, with many strong Castles, repairing many places ruined either by fire or fury of the bordering swords: Of which Lauat Ræ*, where the first Cohort of the Thracians lay, was one, as appeareth by this Altar there erected to the Goddesse Fortune, and since remoued to Conington the house of Sir Robert Cotton in Huntingdonshire.

Bowes*: vnder Stanmore in Richmondshire.

He warred against the Maata and North Britaines with such bad successe, that he was forced to redeeme his peace with mony, and was so much weakned by losse of his men, that he sent to Rome for present supply, with relation of his great danger, and the Enemies strength: which newes touched Seuerus to the quick; and notwithstanding his yeeres (sixty at the least) and gout wherewith hee was continually grieued, yet would he vndergoe that iourney in person himselfe, aswell to satisfie his owne vaine glorious humours, as to traine his Sonne Bassianus from his licentious life, wherein he wallowed idly in Rome, who together with his brother Geta, accompanied their Father into Britaine.

Bassianus why brought into Britaine.

(5) The Britaines then hearing of the Emperors approch, sent him their Embassage for intreaty of peace peace, whereby the Iland might haue been ſetled and ſecured without blood, but the old man (ſaith Sabellicus) had ſo vnſatiable a deſire to beare the glorious Sirname of Britannicus, that he preferred warre, and accepted not their proffered ſubiection.

(6) Seuerus thus entred, Geta was appointed to remaine in the South of the Prouince, and to gouerne thoſe parts that ſtood in quiet, aſſiſted by Æmilius Papinianus the famous Lawyer, whoſe Tribunall ſeat was held in Yorke; himſelfe and Baſſianus marching further into the North againſt the Meata and Caledonians their neighbours, both which bare themſelues boldly vpon the aduantage of their Countries, their waters brackiſh, and vnholſome drinke for their Enemies, the aire ſharpe and contagious to their conſtitutions, and the ſoile it ſelfe ſo peſtred with Loughs, Bogs, Meares, and Mountaines, that the Romans were forced to make way by continuall Labour, in cutting downe Woods, in building of Bridges, and in draining of Meares, ſo that by diſtemperature of diet, continuall labour, contagiouſneſſe of Aire, and afflictions by ſickneſſe, fifty thouſand of them periſhed, and that without Battaile, ſaith Dio: many Souldiers alſo, whoſe ſpirits were ſpent, and through feebleneſſe could not keepe ranke in their March, were for meere pitty ſlaine by their fellowes, leſt they ſhould fall into the hands of their Enemies.

Caledonians deſire peace.

(7) Theſe miſeries, notwithſtanding old Seuerus indured and fought many Battailes, but (as Sabellicus confeſſeth) euer with more difficulties to the Romans then to the Britaines, and yet in ſome ſmall skirmiſhes he went away Victor, and continued his courſes with ſuch reſolution, that laſtly the Caledonians thought good to intreate their peace; which vpon theſe conditions was granted: firſt, that they ſhould forthwith lay aſide all hoſtile Armes, without any further reſiſtance: next, that they ſhould deliuer into the Romans Poſſeſſion, thoſe Countries that were next abutting on their Prouince: and laſtly, that thence-forth they ſhould liue in quiet, attempting nothing againſt the publike Peace.

(8) The State thus ſetled, Seuerus bethought himſelfe of ſome further meanes to ſecure the Prouince, by building many In-land ſtrengths anew, and repairing thoſe with Stone and Cement which formerly were but of Turffe and earth, as appeareth by this Inſcription found in the Ruines of one of his workes neere vnto the Riuer VRE, in the County of Richmond erected.

A wall from Sea to Sea.

Herodian. Spartian. Pol. Virg. de Rob. Anglic. lib. 2. Hiſt. Boetius.

And neglecting the vttermoſt and vaſt Northerne parts of this Iland, drew a Wall or Fortification, which might ſerue as a Rampire and diuiſion betwixt the ſauage and more ciuill people, ſtretching it ſelfe thorow the whole Iland, euen from Sea to Sea; that is, from the Bay of Itun (otherwiſe Solweyfrith) in Scotland, to the doore of Tine or Tinmouth, containing in length One hundred thirty and two Miles, as Sextus Aurelius Victor, Eutropius, and others account them, and by ſome more. This Wall he built of Turfes and Timber ſtrong-lie fenſed with Bulwarkes and Turrets, neere vnto (if not vpon) the foundation of Adrians Wall, the tract whereof thorow the Countries of Weſtmorland and Northumberland, is more pleaſing to bee ſeene, then eaſie in word to be expreſſed. For which his Acts thus heere atchieued about the yeere of grace two hundred and eleuen, he aſſumed to himſelfe his much deſired Sirname Britannicus Maximus, cauſing in his owne and his ſonnes Coines that inſcription to bee ſtamped.

Seuerus ſurnamed Britannicus Maximus.

(9) And recording to poſteritie the glory of his firſt atchieuement heere, vpon the reuerſe of thoſe his moneies, whereon he ſometimes formed a Trophy erected vpon ſpoiles with two Captiues, vnderſetting the word VICT. BRIT. ſometimes a winged victorie: grauing a Shield, hung on that tree which is the meede of Conquerours, VICTORIAE BRITANNICAE: and ſometimes in ſuch a forme and phraſe as is expreſſed in the entrance of this his life. And now retired to Yorke, he left his eldeſt ſonne to finiſh this worke of warre by him begun, as being rather allaied then altogether ended.

Baſſianus diſloyaltie.

(10) Baſſianus thus ſet in the one part of the Iland, as Geta was in the other, ſought rather to gaine the affections of his Army, by a looſe libertie to doe what they liſt, then to manage the truſt repoſed on him, by the reſtraint of Martiall Diſciplane, and exaction of Militarie duties: hoping by ſuch his plauſibilitie and indulgence, to purchaſe to himſelfe their beſt concurrence for the obtaining of the Empire, which hee ſo thirſted after, as that hee often tampered with them to raiſe him, by the fall of his father.

Caledonians rebell.

(11) The Caledonians vnderſtanding the diſſoluteneſſe of his Campe, and the want of a better Captaine, ſuddenly aſſailed the Romans, putting many to the ſword, and taking great booties, (which they diſperſed amongſt their neighbours) without any regard of the obligation of their former Couenants: whereat the teſtie old man was ſo much diſquieted, and ſo farre enraged to reuenge, that hee gaue an expreſſe charge to make a generall Maſſacre, without exception of any; vſing in his ſpeech to his Souldiers, theſe verſes borrowed out of Homer:

Nemo manus fugiat veſtras, cademq; cruentam:
Non fœtus, grauidâ Mater quem geſtat in aluo,
Horrendam effugiat cædem. —

Let none eſcape your bloudy rage; with terrour let all die:
Spare not the mother, nor the child that in her womb doth ly.

A generall Maſſacre of them by Seuerus.

(12) This (which ſeemeth to haue beene the worke of Seuerus ſecond yeere in Britannie, Anno two hundred and twelue for ſo it is expreſſed vpon the monies of himſelfe and ſonnes) may (and with a fit and eaſie inference from the ſame authoritie) ſeeme to haue beene heere the fortune and effect of two encounters and Conqueſts that ſame yeere: for whether we obſerue the two ſeuerall coines of victorie then minted, on one of which is the Statue of that armed and winged Goddeſſe, at whoſe feet are two Captiues proſtrate bound; or the other bearing on it a double figure of that Lady, grauing the ſculpture of the former, VICT. BRIT. vpon a Shield, it can conclude no leſſe in probabilitie.

(13) Seuerus remaining in Yorke, where the Sixth Legion called Victrix kept, (which place afterwards grew to be one of the chiefeſt for account among the Brigantes, as commonly the Stations of the Romans Colonies were the ſeed-plots of all our Cities, and principall Townes) grew feeble and ſicke, being weakened with age, and wearied with trauell, his maladie more increaincreaſing by the diſturbances of the Enemie, and the daily diſloialtie of Baſſianus his ſonne, inſomuch that deſpairing of life, hee called his Counſell and Captaines before him, and vnderlaid with pillowes, he thus addreſſed his ſpeech.

Seuerus his ſpeech to his Counſell and Captaines.

(14) Eighteene yeeres almoſt haue I wielded " the affaires of the Empire, and borne on my ſhoul- " ders the burden of her encombred eſtate, both at " home and abroad; at my firſt entrance, troubled " euery where, now at length quiet, euen here in Bri- " taine, the moſt vnquiet and moleſtious Prouince of " all: The profit of which trauels I muſt now leaue " for others to enioy, and with eaſe in peace to keepe " that which I with care and warre haue gotten. If " therefore amity and mutuall concord, be embraced " (the only ſinewes of a Common-wealth) the glory of " the Empire ſhall yet ſhine more bright, ſith by con- " cord we ſee that ſmall things grow to greatneſſe, " whereas contrariwiſe, diſcord is the ruine of all. I " die and muſt leaue the ſucceſſe of all to my Succeſ- " ſors and Sonnes by Nature, though the Elder vnna- " turall: I meane Baſſianus new made Antoninus and " your Emperor, who often ere this hath ſought to " gaine that title by his ſword and my death; but " knoweth not the dangers that attend a Diadem, nei- " ther remembreth that high places are continually " garded with Enuie and Feares. But ſo blind is Am- " bition, as it ſeeth not that a Soueraignes greatneſſe " is ſuch vnto others, but leaſt in himſelfe, and that " the things poſſeſſed are not the very things they " ſeemed: It is not theſe Titles therefore can make " man happy, the line of his life being drawne forth " with ſo many vncertainties, and the height of his " power laid vpon ſo weake foundations. My ſelfe Spartianus. " at this inſtant may ſerue for example, of whom this " may bee ſaid, I was all things, yet nothing, ſeeing I " I muſt pay my debt to Nature, and leaue my ex- " ploits in Eaſt and Weſt to bee regiſtred (either at " your diſpoſall) for matters of moment, and good " of the Empire, or blotted to the reproch of my " gouernement, with the ſhadowing pencile of Ob- " liuion. That therefore my care for the welfare of " this State may ſuruiue my ſelfe, and bring forth " the happie fruits thereof when I am withered, this " ſhall be my laſt and onely requeſt, that you will e- " uer aſſiſt my ſonnes both with your counſell and " aide, whereby they may rule according to Lawe, " and you obay according to Right, that ſo in you " both, the good of the Empire be aboue all things re- " ſpected. With which words hee ended both his " ſpeech and his life.

(15) This Emperour by Hiſtorians is rancked with the beſt, both for his warres, wherein hee was verie fortunate, and for his wiſedome in gouerning the Empire: and yet is he taxed very ſharply both by Sabellicus for ſundry vices, and by Euſebius for ſtirring vp the fift Perſecution of the Chriſtians in the tenth yeere of his Raigne. In which Ireneus the learned writer, among many others, ſuffred Martyrdome: howbeit, towards his end, he became more milde to them, as ſaith Saint Ierome: as alſo that he was a diligent reader of the excellent workes of Tertullian, whom vſually he termed his Maſter.

(16) This Emperour was by birth an African, to which Country his affection & graces were ſo much, that the illuſtrious Citie of thoſe parts, recorded vpon their coyne his many fauours by this Inſcription, I N- DVLGENTIA AVG. IN CARTH. and in- Beda. ſhrined him amongſt the Gods of that Nation. He was the ſonne of Geta, his mother Pia Fuluia: himſelfe rough, cruell, couetous, and ambitious, and his nature, reliſhing too much of the Punick craft and ſimulation: otherwiſe a moſt expert Soldiour, and a worthy Prince, more battles hee fought, and more victories obtained, then any other that euer had ruled before him the Romane Empire. In a word, of vertues and vices ſo equally compoſed, that laſtly this grew into a cuſtomed ſpeech: It had beene good that this Emperour had neuer beene borne, or beeing Emperour, that hee had neuer died.

Seuerus his deſcription.

(17) Of ſtature he was tall, and of a comely perſonage, his countenance ſeuere and repreſenting Maieſty, his beard white and long, and the haire of his head he wore vſually curled. He was very learned in the Mathematicks, a good Philoſopher, an eloquent Orator, and of a deep ſounding voice. Hee raigned eighteene yeeres (ſaith Euſebius) by Dion Caſſius, Herodian, and Eutropius, ſeuenteen yeeres, eight months, and odde daies. He died in Yorke, the fourth day of April, in the yeere of Chriſt two hundred and twelue, not ſo much of ſicknes, as of diſcontent and greefe, or (if our Britiſh writers may bee credited) of a deadly wound giuen by Fulgence, Captaine of the Picts, who as the Monke of Cheſter ſaith, was brother to Martia, the firſt wife of Seuerus and mother of Baſſianus. His ſecond wife was Iulia Domna the mother of Geta, (though ſome thinke that ſhe was mother to both) a woman of a ſurpaſsing beauty, and an earneſt inſtigator of the two Bretherens reconciliation, had ſhe not been blemiſhed with other vices, as after we ſhal here.

CHAPTER XXIIII.

Bassianus Caracalla.

Septimus Geta.

An. Do. 212. BAssianus Caracalla, and his Brother Septimius Geta, together were declared Emperours by old Seuerus in his life time, and both of them by their father surnamed Antoninus, a name very gracious in the esteeme of the Romans, the elder so stiled about the yeere of Saluation two hundred and fiue, and the yonger foure yeeres after, (as it appeareth by the mintage of their moneys;) were approued and applauded by people and Senate, and of all men saluted and acknowledged for Emperours. Bassianus the Elder, stiling himself Britannicus Maximus, as it should seem, was admitted his Fathers fellow Emperour at Yorke at his residing there, to quiet the Northern Britains; wherein also hee gaue him the name Antoninus, for so implieth that famous Law, bearing iointlie the names of Seuerus and Antoninus, enacted by them at Yorke, touching the interest and right that masters haue to the goods and possessions of their seruants. His mother, the first wife of Seuerus, was Martia a British Lady (say our British Historians, though Sabellicus doth iudge her to be an African) and himselfe better beloued of the Britaines for her sake, then for his owne.

Cod. l. 3. Tit. de rei vindicatione leg. 1.

Geff. Monmouth. Sabellicus.

Geta was the sonne of the Empresse Iulia, a second wife, a woman of passing beautie and surpassing lust, who beeing perswaded (by some Oracle or dreame) that her husbands successour should be an Antoninus, lest her Sonne should lose his hope of the Empire, she importuned Seuerus to bestow the name of Antoninus also on Geta; who with it gaue him likewise the title of Caesar, about the yeere two hundred and two.

Some say it was Seuerus his dreame. Sabellicus.

And to vnite the affections of his two sons, aswel as to eternise their memories, he minted their features vpon one Medall, inscribing the one side ANTONINVS PIVS AVG. PON. TR. P. IIII. the other, P. SEPT. GETA. CAES. PONT. hauing the yeere before matched thē together vpon the reuerse of his owne money, and incirculing their heads with this word, AETERNITAS IMPERI. as if the separation of their affections were the dissolution of his and the worlds Empire.

Herodian. Sabellicus.

(2) Vpon Seuerus his death, Antoninus Caracalla, hastning for Rome, profered good conditions of peace to the Britaines, who long tired with warres accepted thereof, and hostages were giuen for conseruing the same. Whereupon the Empresse Iulia accompanied with both the Caesars, departed hence, carying with them the funerall ashes of the deceased Emperour in a goldē Vrna to Rome, where they solemnly consecrated him a God: the ceremony wherof (because it concerneth so great an Emperour and Monarch of this kingdome) is not vnworthy the inserting.

In the Porch of his Palace was a bedsteed all of Iuory, dressed with richest bedding and furniture of gold, wherein was laid his image protraited to the life, but yet in manner of a sicke man. On the left side sate all the Senators and Princes in blacke mourning weeds; on the right, all the great Ladies, cladde in white (which then was the mourning colour of that Sexe.) The Physitians diligently comming to visit him, and feeling his pulse, as if he were aliue, doe signifie that his disease did still increase vpon him. This they all did seuen daies together: at last, as if then hee were dead, all the prime of the Nobility carrie him in his Iuorie Bed to the * Forum, where all the Patrician youth, & Noble Virgins, incompassed him with most dolefull Hymnes and ruefull ditties. Thence againe he was remoued to Mars his field, where was erected a foure-square frame of Timber, of a huge height and compasse, the stories still mounting to the toppe with sundry ascents, and richly beautified with strange varieties of gold and purple ornaments, and images of great Art and price: On the second of which ascents, was placed the Emperours said Bed and Statue, with infinite store of sweetest odours, brought thither from all parts of the Citie: which done, the yong Nobles brauely mounted on Horsebacke, rid round about in a kinde of dance or measure, and another sort likewise (who represented great Princes) in their Coaches, whereupon his successor in the Empire, first setting fire to the frame, forthwith all the people did the like on all sides: and when the whole began to be on flame, an Eagle secretly enclosed within, was let fly out of the toppe; which soaring a great height, and out of sight, the people followed it with shouts and praiers, supposing that therewith the Emperours soule was carried vp to heauen. And thus Seuerus, which was before a man of Gods making, was now become a God of mans making: and the more to preserue the memory of his fathers glory, Caracalla erected a magnificent Edifice, which he instiled Seuerus his Porch, wherein with most exquisite Art, and admired workmanship, were portraited all his Fathers warres and triumphs, atchieued here in Britaine or elsewhere.

Sabellicus.

(3) But presently after, these two vngodly sonnes of this new supposed God, so much emulated each others glory, that the deadly sparkes of enuy, blowne a long time with the bellowes of their ambitious desires, brake out into the flames of murther and blood, being brethren by one Father, but not by the same mother (as it is said) & in this only like, that they were both starke naught, though both in contrarie kinds of Vices. And albeit the Empresse Iulia had sought by all meanes to make peace betwixt them, both formerly, here in Britaine, and now, after their returne to Rome: yet the desire of a sole Soueraignty, had beene a long time so rooted in Bassianus his heart (for which he had twice attempted his Fathers life, and so much hasted his death, that hee slew his Physitians, because they had dispatched him no sooner) could not indure an equall (much lesse a confronter) in authority, and therefore in the Court and in the armes of the Empresse, he slew her sonne Geta, in a time least suspected, when he had sate with him in state and disdaine, the terme of one yeare and twenty two daies.

Geta slaine in his mothers armes.

Herodian.

(4) And to cloake this fratricide with shew of constraint, first to the Souldiers, and then in the Senate, he accuseth his Brother to haue sought his death, and that in defence of his owne life, he was forced to slay the other, and flying to the Pretorian Cohorts for the safetie of his life, as though further conspiracies had been intended against him in the City, & at his return commanded Papinianus the famous Ciuilian, to excuse the murther in his Pleas at the Barre: which when he refused, hee caused him to bee slaine, as also all those, that had beene acquainted with Geta; whereby so many of the Nobilitie perished, that he was thereby accounted another Nero in Rome: and by his fauorites the name of Geta was raced out of all monuments & imperiall inscriptions, as we haue seene some of thē defaced vpon some Altar stones found here in Brit.

Dio Spartianus.

Papinianus slaine for refusing to defend a murther.

(5) Of nature he was subtile, and could well dissemble with them whom hee feared, and make shew of loue where hee deadly hated; alwaies fitting himselfe to the humours of flatterers: Among the Germans, counterfetting their gate and garments; In Greece, be like Alexander, bearing his necke somewhat awry; In Troy, would resemble Achilles; alwaies so Camelion-like, as the Romans (his followers) were therewith ashamed. In a word, Caracalla (saith Dio) neuer thought of doing good, because (as himselfe confessed) he neuer knew any goodnes.

Dio.

(6) And to fill vp the measure of all iniquitie, as one regardlesse of humanity or shame, he married Iulia his mother in law, late wife to his owne Father (a sinne (saith S. Paul) not to be named among the Gentiles) and by Sext. Aur. Eutrop. and Spar. reported vpon this occasion. It fortuned that Iulia in presence of Caracalla, either by chance, or of purpose rather, let fall the vaile which she wore, discouering thereby her naked breasts and beauty, which was great; whereat the Emperour casting his lasciuious eie and bewraying his affection, presently said, Were it not vnlawfull, I should not be vnwilling: to whom she replied (without respect of modesty) that all things were lawfull to him that made lawes for others, but was subiect himselfe to none: forgetting at once both the murther committed vpon Geta her sonne, and the scandals that accompanied so foule a sinne, the pleasure wherof they did not long enioy, both their deaths (by Gods vengeance) soone after ensuing.

1. Cor. 5. 1.

Sextus Aurelius Eutropius. Spartianus. Sabellicus.

Iulia her wicked speech.

(7) For Caracalla remaining in Mesopotamia, and carrying (as it seemeth) a guilty conscience, and suspition of his life, sent to Maternus, whom hee had left Gouernour of Rome, to assemble all the Astrologers & Mathematicians (vnto which learned impostors he alwaies gaue especiall credit) and of them to enquire how long he should liue, and by what death he should die. Maternus hauing so done, wrote for answere, that Macrinus his Prefect of the Pratorium (then with him in his expeditiōs) went about to murther him. Which is thought rather in enuy of Macrinus to haue beene fained, then by any Astrologicall directions so giuen forth. This letter and others comming to Caracalla his hand, at such time as hee was busie about his disport, he deliuered them to Macrinus to reade, and giue him the report at his returne. In perusall whereof finding himselfe to be accused of Treason, and fearing lest by the sequell hee might bee brought into greater danger, he incensed one Martial a Centurion (whose brother the Emperour had lately slaine) to murther him; which was soone performed, and occasion in the fields offred: for Caracalla stepping aside from his traine to ease nature, Martial, as though he had beene called, ran hastily in without hindrance or suspect, and with his dagger stabbed him to death; but being too late perceiued, was yet so hastily pursued, that he was hewed to peeces before his tongue could reueale the principall Traitour. Iulia his incestuous wife hearing of his death, with poison slew her selfe at Antioch, leauing her shame to suruiue her life.

Antoninus Sabellicus.

Antoninus Caracalla kild.

(8) Antoninus Caracalla, saith Eusebius, raigned Emperour seuen yeares and sixe moneths, but Herodian, Spartianus, and Dio allot him sixe yeeres and two moneths: he died the eight of Aprill, and yeere of Christ two hundred eighteene. The testimonies of these many writers notwithstanding, together with the place and circumstances of his death, and the person by whom it was committed, the British Historians do contradict, reporting him to bee slaine in Britaine in Battaile against the Picts, by one Carauceus a man of a lowe and obscure birth. But by this it may seeme some wounds receiued by him in those British warres, gaue occasion to that errour. He left a sonne not by his incestuous mother, nor by Glantilla his wife, whō he exiled into Sicily; but by a mistris, whose name was Iulia Simiamira his cosen German, and indeed no better then a common strumpet: which corrupt rootes brought forth as bitter fruits, euen Heliogabalus, of whom hereafter we shall haue occasion to write.

Antoninus Heliogabalus Emp.

An. Do. 219.

YOung Bassianus, surnamed Heliogabalus, the sonne of Caracalla before mentioned, thus elected, and prospering at his entrance, gaue hopes to his raisers, of many princely parts, and signes of those things that in sequele by better proofe appeared to be onlie signes indeed: for nature had plentifully adorned him with the complements of her gifts, had his mind beene answerably furnished with vertue. But as the one was ouer-prodigall and lauish in his outward forme, so was the other as sparing and defectiue in bestowing of her inward gifts: insomuch that both in minde and garment, he seemed to bee that which in truth he was not. This Emperour, as appeareth by the reuerse of his money, tooke it no meane addition of honour to his Imperiall Dignitie, to be stiled, The Priest of the Sunne; which in the Assyrian Tongue is called El, from whom he tooke the surname Elagabal.

Heliogabalus exceedeth in wickednesse all others before him

(2) Assoone as hee had settled the Empire firme vpon himselfe by the death of Macrinus, he began to discouer his owne dispositions, and in wantonnesse, apparell, lightnesse, and diet, to exceed any that had gone before him in Rome; and so farre differed from the manners of men, that modestie will not suffer vs to record his greatest vices.

(3) His apparell was rich, and most extreme costlie, and yet would he neuer weare one garment twice: his Shooes embellished with Pearles and Diamonds; his Seats strowed with Muske and Amber; his Bed couered with Gold and Purple, and beset with most costly Iewels; his Way strewed with the Powder of Gold and Siluer; his Vessels (euen of baset vse) all Gold; his Lamps burning with no other Oile then the Balmes of India and Arabia; his Fish-Ponds filled with no other water then of distilled Roses; his Ships (in his Naumachies or Ship-fights) floted in a Riuer of Wine; his Bathes most stately built, and againe after they were once vsed, presently pluckt downe; his Plate of finest Gold, but neuer serued twice to his Table; his Rings and Iewels most rich, yet neuer worne twice; his Concubines many and chargeable, but not one laine with twice; his Diet so profuse, that at euery supper in his Court, was vsually spent a Thousand Pound Sterling: inuiting the chiefe Citizens to a Feast, hee strewed all the Roomes with Saffron, as it were with Rushes, saying, That such Cattle were worthy of such costly Litter. Neere the Sea, with him no Fish was eaten: in the Land, no Flesh: whole Meales made of the Tongues of singing Birds and Peacocks, or of the Braines of most costly creatures, alwaies saying, That meat was not sauorie, whose sauce was not costly. And indeed so costly it was, that the reuenewes of Germany, France, Britaine, Spaine, Italie, Sicilia, Gracia, Asia, Syria, Ægypt, Arabia, and all the Ilands, were not sufficient to defray the charges.

(4) In his Progresse, six hundred Chariots followed him, laden with Strumpets, Boyes, and Bawdes, for whom he built a Stewes in his Court, wherein himselfe in the attire of an Harlot, made to them solemne and set Orations, terming them therein his Fellow-Souldiers, and Companions in Armes, with Instructions for them how to practise with most varietie their filthy Luxuries. In regard of which kinde of actions, one doth make this doubt, whether were greater his boundlesse Prodigalitie, his stupendious Lecherie, or his foppish Foolerie: the last of which his Imperiall Vertues, he gaue proofe of, when he gathered in the City ten thousand waight of Spiders, professing that thereby he vnderstood how great a City Rome was: at another time, ten thousand Mice, and a thousand Wizels, which hee brought forth in a publike shew to the people, for some wise State-purpose, like the former. Aelius Lamprid. Herodian.

(5) In Rome he built a Temple consecrated to the Sunne, (like to that in Phœnicia, whereof himselfe was Priest) commanding the Christians therein to worship: as also a Chatter-house for women to meet and determine of their Attires; and brought into the Senate-house his mother Semiamira, allowing her a Voice among the Senators. In modestie I forbeare to write the particulars of his vn-manly libidinous filthinesse, adding only that which a iudicious Author speakes of him: Kings (saith he) as they haue greater power to sinne then other men, so haue they lesser safety in sinning then any man; for being set aboue others in the eie of the World, they are as Markes that are aimed at, and lie open to the shute of Reuenge. And so was the state of this Superlatiue Monster, whose owne Conscience still stung him, euen in the midst of his sweetest sinnes, and therefore euer expecting some violent end, hee prepared silken Halters richly wrought to hang himselfe, if need were; and Golden Knines to stab himselfe, or cut his throat; and built a goodly Tower of exceeding height, adorned with Gemmes and Gold of inualuable cost, that thence he might cast himselfe headlong, hauing these words oft in his mouth, That howeuer he died, his death should be pretious in the eies of all men. But he failed of his hope, though not of his desert; for against him the Pratorian Souldiers suddenlie arose, no wrong offred them, more then vnto others, but out of a Iustice in God, who repaieth sinne with sinne, and suffreth not such outragious wicked ones to escape vnreuenged.

(6) These breaking into his Palace, found him not in estate answerable to his calling, but hidde (for feare) in a homely place suteable with his dirty conditions: from whence with Acclamations thorow the streets of Rome, more like a Dogge then a Man, they dragged him with his mother, saying, The Bitch and her whelpe must goe together: and after their furie spent, threw their bodies into the Common Sinke of the City, and thence into Tyber, sinking them downe with great great ſtones, leſt the carkaſes caſt vp with the waues, ſhould either find buriall, or infect the aire. The Senate approuing all that was done, decreed that his name ſhould be obliterated out of all monuments in Rome, and neuer any Antoninus (a name before very gratious) ſhould rule againe their Empire: ſo odious was the remembrance of this Image of Ignominy.

(7) He was aged but foureteene yeeres when hee became Emperour; by Herodians computation, he raigned ſixe yeeres, and died at twenty: By Aurelius Victor he died at ſeuenteene, & raigned not fully three yeeres: Euſebius ſaith, that he raigned fully foure: Onuphrius would haue him to liue eighteen yeeres, & to dy the 8 day of March, Anno two hundred twenty three.

ALEXANDER SEVERVS.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Alexander Seuerus Emp.

An. Do. 223.

BEfore the death of Heliogabalus, his Coſin German Alexianus, by the working of his mother Mammea, was made his Ceſar, whoſe vertues daily increaſing, with his age, gaue hopes to the better ſort of ſome happier times by his meanes: but ſo farre incenſed Heliogabalus (who hated nothing more then vertue), and ſo dimmed his fame, that he often aſſaied to take away his life by trechery: But ſuruiuing him, whom no man wiſhed to liue, he was with publicke bleſſings, and vnſpeakable ioy elected Emperour; * his name they changed from Alexianus to Alexander, and his ſurname giuen of old Seuerus.

Lampridius ſaith, he was borne on the day that Alexander the great died, and had therefore his name.

(2) He was the ſonne of one Varius, a Syrian borne, and of Mammea, ſiſter to Simiamira, though there are who ſay that both the ſiſters attending on their Aunt Iulia the Empreſſe, were gotten with child by yong Caracalla, and ſo he father of Alexianus: howſoeuer, he was brought vp in learning from his childhood, hauing a naturall propenſion to all humane vertues, and diuine pieties: He was very skilfull in the Mathematicks, Geometrie, Muſicke, Caruing, and Painting, & compoſed ſome Bookes alſo of Poetrie; ſo great a louer of the liberall Arts, that he allowed the profeſſors thereof annuall ſtipends for their further encouragement: and that which moſt is, hee much fauoured the Chriſtians, from whom he tooke to himſelfe examples of life, and vrged their Precepts vnto others, and this one eſpecially * NOT TO DO TO OTHERS WHAT WEE WOVLD NOT HAVE DONE TO VS. Their Chriſt he honoured (though as a Heathen man) and would haue had him conſecrated among the Romane Gods: vnto whom he alſo was minded to haue built a Temple, had not his Idol-Prieſts hindred the ſame, but a place of their holy aſſemblies he allowed them by his Imperiall warrant: for when certaine Vinteners or Victuallers laid claime to the place whereunto the Chriſtians reſorted to pray, he thus decided it, That it was much fitter that God therein ſhould be worſhipped, then belly-gods ſhould be pampered to ſurfet there. (A good document of a Heathen for ſome Chriſtians, who turne places conſecrate to Gods diuine ſeruice into Sheep-Coates, or to the like prophane vſes) This good inclination of Alexander the ſonne, was vndoubtedly ſtirred vp by the inſtigations of Mammea his mother, who, as Euſebius witneſſeth, had ſent for Origen (the Chriſtian Doctour) from Alexandria to Antioch: by whom ſhe was ſo wel inſtructed, that Ierome giues her the honourable Title of a moſt holy Woman.

Alexander Seuerus incited to Chriſtianity by his mother Mammea Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. lib. 6 cap. 20. Ierome.

(3) Himſelfe, though yong, ruled the Empire with great Wiſedome and Iuſtice: admitting onely ſuch for his Counſellors, as were men vncorrupt, ſage and learned, skillfull in the Ciuill Law, and experienced in Antiquities of elder times, and preferring none to any office or charge by ſuite, but only by the commendation of each mans worth and fitnes for the place: In regard whereof, he cauſed Turinus (one of his Courtiers who tooke money of diuers, with promiſe to procure the Emperours fauour in their ſuites) to be put to death by ſmoake, the Crier proclaiming, That hee had ſold ſmoake, and therefore with ſmoake he ſhould die. And likewiſe to cut off, in Lawyers their continuall ſelling of Iuſtice (the bane of all Common wealths) for a fee, hee granted a publike & ſet reward to ſuch as ſhould plead gratis. By which courſes, his ciuill affaires were nobly managed, and his warres likewiſe proued as proſperous: for hee triumphed with great glory ouer the Parthians: The Germanes alſo, who in furious manner had paſſed the Riuers Danuby, and the Rhine, in many skirmiſhes he put backe, and forced them to their former obedience.

Sabellicus.

Bountifull and liberal he was both to the people & ſoldiers, as by the reuerſe of his Coine aboue prefixed is ſeene, wherin is expreſſed the fourth Donatiuum and Congiarium, beſtowed by the bounty of this Emperour vpon the Souldiers and common people, of which Lampridius maketh mention in his life.

(4) But as Enuy euer attends perſons of Eſtate, and a deſire of change, breeds a diſlike of the preſent, ſo the Roman Legions growne farre out of order by the prodigious Gouernement of the laſt Emperour, proued now vnnaturall to their dread Soueraigne: whoſe warres drawing him into Germanie, and thence hither into Britaine, hee found ſome of his Souldiers here ſo tumultuous, that he thought fit to vſe exemplary ſeuerity towards them, whereupon they, being

Chapter XXVIII.

Maximinus Emp.

CAIVS. IVLIVS. VERVS. MAXI. CAES.

Maximus Cæſar.

An. Do. 236.

Aximinus, a man barbarous by birth and diſpoſition, (himſelfe a Thracian, his father named Nicea, borne in Gotland, very obſcure, his mother Ababa of little better rancke) ſpent his youth in keeping of Cattell, the pouerty of his parents admitting no better maintenance: yet afterwards his fortunes brought him vnto great aduancement, and that by working vpon the outward obiect of his perſon, being for ſhape and ſtrength (if the reporter deſerue credit) rather to be thought a vaſt Giant, then deſcribed for a goodly man: For Iulius Capitolinus, affirmes his height to be eight foote and an halfe by Geometricall meaſure, and his Body anſwerable in euery proportion, inſomuch, as he did weare as a Ring on his thumb, the * Bracelet which his wife vſed to weare on her arme, a ſtature thought vncredible; and yet Ioſephus, an Author of great credit, doth confidently record, that one Eleazar a Iewe accompanied Darius the Kings ſonne of Perſia vnto Rome, (ſent by Vitellius to Tiberius for an hoſtage) whoſe height, as he ſaith, was fully ſeuen cubits, a meaſure ſurmounting this.

Iuli. Capitol. Maximinus of a huge ſtature.

Capitolinus calles it Dextrocherium, being a broad plate of gold, ſet with rich Iewels, an ornament in vſe amongſt the Romane Ladies.

Ioſeph. Antiq. l. 18 cap. 6.

(2) This Maximinus increaſing ſtrength with growth, left his trade of Cattle-keeping, and reſorted to the Romane Campe then in Syria, where for his admirable height, he was admitted by Septimus Seuerus into the rancke of a common Souldier, and ſhortly after, preferred to bee one of his Guarde. Paſſianus made him a Coronell, and Heliogabalus gaue him the leading of certaine foote: but the laſt Emperour Alexander, aduanced him to be a Captaine of the fourth Legion, whoſe death notwithſtanding hee diſſoiallie practiſed (of ſuch force is the deſire of Soueraignty, which makes men forget all bonds of gratitude and loiall truſt) and was thereupon by the Souldiers elected Emperour, with fealty ſworne vnto him.

Maximinus his meanes of riſing to preferment.

Herodian and Aurelius Victor ſay tha this was done, Alexander yet liuing.

(3) The ignoble Vpſtart thus borne from the dunghill, vpon the wings of Fortune, vnto the ſeat of Maieſtie, thought the increaſe of his pride was an increaſe of State; and knowing hee had nothing for which he might deſerue to be loued, he ſtudied in the whole managing of his eſtate, how by all meanes hee might be feared. Hee therefore diſplaced Senatours, Captaines, Souldiers, and whom not? with murders, baniſhments, and confiſcations of their goods: all ſuch eſpecially he did cut off, whom hee ſuppoſed to haue knowledge of his baſe beginnings. The Chriſtians likewiſe vnder him were martyred, (whereof Origen wrote a Booke, not now extant) and he is by Writers accounted the ſixth Perſecutor of Gods Saints: ſo that, whereas his flatterers at firſt called him Milo, Antæus, and Hercules, for his ſtrength; now they all tearmed him, Buſiris, Phalaris, and Cyclops, for his ſauage crueltie.

Maximinus of a naughty diſpoſition.

Euſeb. Eccleſ. hiſt. lib. 6. cap. 17. Maximinus perſecuteth the Chriſtians.

(4) But his life being odious to God and Man, was often attempted to be taken away; firſt, by Maximus, a man of a Conſular dignitie; then by Quarcinus (whom Capitolinus calleth Ticus) ſet on by the old Souldiers of Septimus Seuerus, that had beene diſgraced by Maximinus; and laſtly by the Army in Africa, who elected Gordianus (their Proconſul, a very worthy and learned man of foureſcore yeeres old) Emperour, and his ſonne (of the ſame name and Princely qualities) his Cæſar: the Senate likewiſe confirming all that they had done. He tooke to himſelfe the ſurname Africanus either in reſpect of his Pro-Conſulſhip which he exerciſed in that Prouince, or elſe as deſcēded from Scipio his family who bore that ſurname: His ſonne Gordianus likewiſe was ſtiled Auguſtus, as appeareth by his Coines, whereon hee writeth himſelfe A V G. and vpon the Reuerſe, Liberalitas A V G. Gordianus elected Emperour, and his ſonne elected his Cæſar.

An.Do.238.

(5) In the meane while, aged Gordianus with the Ensignes and glory of an Emperor, entred Carthage, with blessings and acclamations of ioy: whereat his old enemie Capelianus, Gouernour of Numidia and Mauritania (Prouinces in Africke) much enuied; and gathering forces in Maximinus his name, made head against him, and shortly gaue him Battle, wherein Gordianus the younger was slaine before the walles of the Citie. The father seeing his Cæsars disastre, and himselfe an Emperour onely nominall, and his new risen Sunne to haue passed the circle of his height, and now to approch to the setting and fall, wished againe his priuate estate; and in despaire, griefe, and disdaine of his enemies successe, with the Girdle which he wore, strangled himselfe to death, when hee had beene stiled Emperour only twenty six daies: whereat Maximinus was not a little ioifull, and the Senate no lesse perplexed, seeing themselues depriued of their hopes, and now laid open to the Tyrants will, who like a Lion came raging on, threatning reuenge in all their blouds.

Gordianus the father strangled.

(6) The State thus standing, all the Peeres and Princes thereof assembled themselues together at Rome: and in the Temple of Iupiter, after long debating of their present dangers, concluded, that Maximus Pupienus and Clodius Balbinus together should bee Emperours; men of great account and fauour with the people. These taking Oath and Imperiall Robes, leuied forces to maintaine their cause: and Balbinus taking charge of the Citie, Pupienus marched to meet Maximinus, who in great pride had passed the Alpes, entred Italie, and now laid siege against Aquileia; in which this was very memorable, that The Citizens wiues cut off the haire of their heads, to make bow-strings for resistance of so hatefull a Tyrant: where after long assault preuailing little, his discontented Souldiers fell to mutinie: and entring his Pauilion, at noone day without resistance slew both him and his sonne, bearing the same name whom hee had created his Cæsar, and whose monies, as he minted them, we haue inserted at the entrance of his Empire. Their heads for a Trophy they sent before them to Rome, where with such acceptations they were receiued, as that the Senate acknowledged themselues to be rid of a Monster.

Maximinus and his sonne slaine.

(7) Hee was, as is said, exceedingly tall, his body great, and ioints proportionable, faire of face, full eies, and of such strength as is vncredible: and according to his limmes, so was his diet; for hee daily deuoured forty pound waight of flesh, and thereto dranke six Gallons of wine. He died aged sixty yeeres and odde, when he had raigned three yeeres, in the yeere of our Lord two hundred thirty and eight.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Pupienus Maximus Emp.

Clodius Balbinus Emp.

An.Do.238.

Vpienus Maximus and Clodius Balbinus thus elected together for Emperors, the one in action, and the other resident, a great sedition chanced betwixt the Senate and Souldiers, which grew to a bloudie issue among the Citizens, and Rome it selfe was set on fire in sundrie places; the Emperours presence and authoritie little preuailing: which strucke such feare into their hearts, that they accounted these times most vnfortunate, and themselues and present estate to be most desperate. But the death of Maximinus (and his head happily brought them at the instant) gaue present life to their dying hearts. And Pupienus comming to Aquileia as much quieted the Armie, sent backe the Lieutenants to their places of charge, and with great pompe and praise returned to his Fellow-Emperour.

(2) The parentage of Balbinus is reported to bee both both noble and ancient, made Citizens of Rome by great Pompey, and himſelfe borne at Cales in Spaine. Pupienus Auncestors were much latter, yet had hee borne many Offices of Magiſtracie, and euer diſcharged them with wiſdome and valour: both of them highly accounted of in Rome.

(3) Peace thus eſtabliſhed beyond all expectation, with ſhoutes and applauſes the Emperours enter the Senate-houſe, where (according to the cuſtome and their deſerts) they were ſtiled, The Fathers of the Senat, with thankes as to the onely preſeruers of their liues and eſtates: and ſome extolling the Senate highly for their prouident foreſight, in electing ſuch ſapient and worthy Emperors, contrarie to the raſh and vndiſcreet practiſe of ſuch as choſe their Gouernours to fit their owne fancies, rather then the charge to which they aduance them; and whoſe bad liues brought commonly their vntimely, but deſerued deaths. The Pretorian Souldiers tooke themſelues to bee taxed with thoſe aſperſions, and the rather, becauſe the German Strangers were brought in to be of the Guard, as if themſelues were not to bee truſted: ſo turning their ſpleene againſt the preſent Emperours, ſought to ſet vp a new, which ſhortly after they found opportunitie to effect.

Iul. Capitol.

The Emperours enuy one another.

(4) For theſe Emperours, though aged and wiſe, were not ſo linked together in affection, as they were neere ioined in authoritie: and therefore the winde of emulation had the eaſier paſſage betwixt the chinkes of their owne conceits; the one prizing his wiſdome and gouernment to be more iudicious; the other, his birth and Nobilitie to be more honorable: and each of them hauing his owne Guard, ſtood vpon his owne Guard, though one Palace contained them both: and both their endeuours euer well conſorting for the buſineſſes of the Empire.

(5) At this time the Prouinces of Parthia and Germanie grew vnquiet, and by ciuill diſcords, endangered their ſubiections: to repreſſe which, the Emperors agreed to goe in perſon, the one into the Eaſt, the other into Germanie. Now whileſt theſe great preparations were in making, the Capitoline-Games were celebrated in Rome, whereunto all (almoſt) reſorted, but eſpecially the new-come Guards of the Emperours. The Pretorians finding the aduantagious time, which they had long waited for, ſuddenly in armour aſſailed the Court; which Pupienus perceiuing, ſent in all haſte for Balbinus, and both their Guards for defenſe. But his Fellow-Emperour, vpon a vaine ſuſpicion detracted time himſelfe, and hindered the forwardneſſe of the Guards, ſo that theſe Traitours had eaſie acceſſe into both the Emperours Chambers, where in their rage they diſpoiled them of their Imperiall Robes, and haled theſe poore aged and innocent Emperours, like two Theeues thorow the middeſt of the Citie: Laſtly, they ſlew them, and left their bodies to deſpightfull ignominie.

(6) Theſe Emperours raigned together one yeere, and ſomewhat more, and died the yeere of Chriſt two hundred thirty nine: in which yeere happened ſo great an Eclipſe of the Sun, that the noone-day thereby became as darke as the mid-night.

M. ANTONINVS GORDIANVS.

Chapter XXX.

M. Antoninus Gordianus Emp.

An. Do. 239.

Ordianus (for Antoninus he might not be called, a law formerly acted inhibiting the ſame) was the ſonne of a daughter to old Gordianus (that had made away himſelfe in Carthage, as is declared) at the age of eleuen yeeres was created Cæſar by the Senate, with Pupienus and Balbinus; and at their deaths by the Pretorian Souldiers, elected Emperour, not yet fully fourteene yeeres of age. Greatly was he ſtrengthned by the Alliance and Counſell of one Miſitheus, his Prefect and Inſtructer, whom for his great learning he ſo honoured and loued, that he tooke his daughter for his wife; and by whoſe onely direction, he proſperouſly adminiſtred his State affaires.

(2) Touching the affaires of our Prouinces proceedings, or what Lieutenants were imploied in Britaine ſince Virius Lupus there placed by Seuerus (ſince whoſe death our Storie hath ſpent twenty ſeuen yeeres) we finde not recorded. Yet now in the raigne of young Gordianus, ſome glimmering light for her Gouernour appeareth by an Altar-Stone found in Cumberland at a place then called * Caſtra Exploratorum, with an inſcription for the happy health of the Emperour Gordian the third, his wife Furia Sabina Tranquilla, and their whole Familie: which votiue Altar was erected by the Troupe of Horſemen ſurnamed Auguſta Gordiana, when Æmilius Chriſpinus a natiue of Africa gouerned the ſame vnder Nonnius Philippus Lieutenant Generall of Britaine, in the yeere of Chriſt, two hundred forty three, as appeareth by the Conſuls therein ſpecified: whoſe forme and inſcription wee haue followed by the Stone it ſelfe, now remaining at Connington among many others, in the cuſtodie of Sir Robert Cotton Knight.

In his fift yeere, the Parthians vnder the Leading of Sapor their King, had paſſed into the confines of the Romane Prouinces, as farre as Antioch in Syria, which Citie they had taken, with ſpoile of the Countries adioining: againſt whom, the yong Emperour in warlike maner addreſſed himſelfe, and in perſon prepared to vndergoe the warres.

Thence marching to Antioch, recouered the Citie, forcing Sapor to forſake the Prouince, and to content himſelfe with his owne demaines.

(4) But long this Sunne went not without a Cloud, nor his fauourable fortunes without a checke; for Miſitheus, his Neſtor, paying Natures debt before it was due (being poiſoned by Philip, as Eutropius affirmeth) was wanting in counſell, & miſſed for truſt: to ſupply which, Philip (an Arabian, and of ignoble parentage) was made his Prefect; wiſe (I muſt needs ſay) had hee beene moderate; and valiant in Armes, had he beene true. But the glory of a Diademe beheld with the falſe light of ambition, ſo dimmed the eie of his dutifull affection, and blinded the ſenſes of his aſpiring mind, that he, who from nothing was riſen to be ſomthing, thought that alſo nothing worth, whilſt it was ſhadowed with the name of a ſubiect. Firſt therefore he ſought to winne credit with the Souldiers, to whom he was facible; to regard the poore, to whom hee was liberall; and in all things to outſtripe his Soueraigne, to whom he was treacherous. Yong Gordianus vnable to endure his Prefectors deſignes, or his owne diſgraces, and perceiuing the marke whereat he aimed, complained his wrongs in open aſ-

Gordianus his ſpeech to the Souldiers.

" (5) I got not this ſtate from my Parents by " birth, nor yet by any deſerts (I muſt confeſſe) in my " ſelfe, being the leaſt of many that did deſerue it bet- " ter: but it was you, my fellow Souldiers (vpon what " fate I know not) that haue made me what I am. If " then I haue defrauded your hopes, by carrying my " ſelfe vnder your expectations, I wiſh to bee ſet " in the place where I firſt was; or rather (if I ſo de- " ſerue) my life, and ſtate, may at one inſtant be en- " ded by your vnerring hands: For Noble mindes " cannot brooke to be curbed with the bitte of baſe " indignities, nor ſuffer their vaſſals to bee Corriuals " of their Maieſtie. It is a icalous obiect (I muſt needs " confeſſe) and many times caſts great ſuſpition whē " is ſmall occaſion, but I, for my part, haue alwaies " thought of that humour, that men cauſleſly ica- " lous, doe moſt iuſtly deſerue what they vniuſtlie " feare; and both your ſelues will bee my witneſſes, " how farre I am from the touch of that ſtaine, and " alſo the dailie occurrents of my Caſar, (if ſo low I " may terme him) doth make more then manifeſt. I " am but yong, yet elder by ſixe yeares then I was; " my body tender, yet expoſed to the chaunce of " warre; my counſell raw, yet bettered by your wiſe- " domes; and my conqueſts in my ſelfe nothing, but " yet in your valours both glorious & famous. What " then are mine errours, that I may amend them? or " your diſcontents that I may redreſſe? for by the " powers of heauen I proteſt, it is your loues which " I moſt eſteeme, and the good of the Empire, for " which I onely wiſh to liue; the firſt is in your pow- " ers to beſtow at your pleaſure, but the other in me " (if it be poſsible) ſhall liue euen after death.

(6) Theſe complaints notwithſtanding, Philip ſo politickly, nay, rather traiterouſly brought his owne proiects to passe, as that the yong innocent Emperour was displaced, and abandoned of all: in which distresse he first sued to be made his Cæsar, and that denied, to be his Prætorian Prefect: but neither would bee had, yet at length the charge of an ordinary Captaine, was with some difficulty granted him. But Philip bethinking himselfe of the greatnes of Gordianus his blood, his loue and esteeme both in Rome and the Prouinces, and his owne vertues equalising any, hee commanded him to be slaine in the twenty two yeere of his age, and the sixt of his raigne. The Senate hearing thereof, elected M. Marcius, and after him again, L. Aurel. Seuerus, Ostulianus. But Philip through the giddie multitude, preuailed against both. This Emperour though yong, so well demeaned himselfe, that the Senate by authoritie added to his titles TVTOR REIPVBLICAE, and PARENS PRINCIPVM POPVLI ROMANI, and after his death euen by his owne murtherers, his Monument of faire Stone was raised in the confines of Persia, and vpon his sepulchre this inscription set Gordianus slaine.

DIVO GORDIANO VICTORI PERSARVM VICTORI GOTTHORVM VICTORI SARMATARVM DEPVLSORI ROMANARVM SEDITIONVM VICTORI GERMANORVM SED NON VICTORI PHILIPPORVM.

To the Sacred Gordianus vanquisher of the Persians, Gothes, and Sarmates, extinguisher of the Romane Ciuill discords, and subduer of the Germans, but not of the Philippians.

(7) He was of condition most noble and louely, of behauiour gentle, very studious and giuen much to learning; hauing in his Librarie no lesse then threescore and two thousand Bookes, as is reported. The truth is, that wicked people were not worthy long to enioy so vertuous, so clement, so peereles an Emperour. He died in the moneth of March, in the yeere of our Redeemer two hundred forty fiue.

M. IVLIVS PHILIPPVS CAES.

Iulius Philip. Cæs.

An. Do. 245.

WHat man is there, who considering those forepassed murthers, of so many, and so mightie Monarchs, would not, by the spectacle of others calamities, be induced to preferre the securitie of a moderate estate, before the desire of Soueraignty; whose glorious content is onely in appearance, but the cares and hazards are both reall and perpetuall. But of so attractiue vertue is the Load-stone of Maiesty, through the imagined felicity thereof, that most mens desires are drawne to that one point of the Compasse, and if a little faire winde of fortune shall blow on them; they will launch forth with their full sailes into that Mare incognitum, a Sea of vnknowne calamities. And amõgst others, such were the blinde desires, and such the vnhappy euent of this Iulius Philippus the Arabick Barbarian. Of parentage obscure and ignoble, as Victor and others affirme, who pluckt off the imperiall robes of his Liege-Lord, to inuest himselfe.

(2) Being now accepted as Emperour by the Souldiers in Parthia, he wrote to the Senate of the death of Gordianus, as though it naturally had happened, and with faire pretensions of his good purposes, but more through the feareof his Parthian Souldiers, obtained their consents; whereupon shuffling vp a most dishonourable peace in those parts, and declaring his sonne Philip for his Cæsar, (whose Coines with his, we haue set in the beginning of this Chap.) hee made all speede towards Rome: where, the yeere insuing, his shewes and games were exceedingly magnificent, for the Celebration of the Birth-day, (as we we may terme it) of Rome, that beeing, the thousand yeere from her foundation.

(3) It pleased God at length to touch this Emperours heart, both with such a sense of his owne forepast sinnes, and also with the light of heauenly truth, that he hath the honour of being the first Emperour baptised into the faith of Christ, together with his sonne Philip, and his wife Seuera: though the publike

The meanes of his conuerſion from Idolatrie, were Fabianus and Origen, who by letters exhorted him therunto: and for the ſame Profeſsion, were both himſelfe and ſonne murdered by Decius his Captaine, though others report, that Decius did rather hate Chriſtianitie for their ſakes, then them for their Profeſsions ſake. And howſoeuer Pomponius Latus accuſeth him to bee a diſſembling Prince, yet Euſebius declareth the effects of his Profeſsion farre otherwiſe: for Philip (ſaith hee) ſeeking to communicate with the Saints, could not bee admitted, till ſuch time as he had made open confeſsion of his Faith; at which time he ioined himſelfe with thoſe, who for their ſinnes were brought to examination, and was placed in the roome of the Penitents, becauſe that in many things he had beene faulty: which willingly he obeied, and declared by his workes his ſincere and religious minde towards God. Which may the rather appeare by Sabellicus and Bergomenſis, who ſhew, that the hatred of Decius againſt Philip and his ſonne was conceiued, for that they had committed the cuſtodie of their Treaſures vnto Fabianus the Chriſtian Biſhop of Rome, who baptized them, as ſome write; though others ſay, Poncius the Martyr did it.

But the Emperour fearing this to be but policie in Decius, leſt by delay he might giue him more ſtrength, omitted no time to vphold his owne, and with a mightie Armie vndertooke theſe affaires himſelfe, not truſting any more to the diſpoſall of his Captaines. And immediately departing Rome, with a ſterne reſolution, and ouer-hard hand, held the reine of that begun Expedition, whereby he preſently loſt the loue of the Armie, and Decius was accounted the more worthy of rule, whom in Verona they forthwith proclaimed Emperour, and cut off Philips head thorow the teeth, before they had departed Italie. At newes whereof, the Pretorians ſlew Philip his Caſar and ſonne, a man of ſo obſeruable compoſedneſſe, as that he had beene neuer ſeene to laugh in all his life. And thus the two Philips ended their raignes.

C. VIBIVS TREBONIANVS GALLVS, CAIVS VIBIVS VOLVSIANVS, Emperours.

Chapter XXXIII.

Tre. Gallus Emp.

Vibius Volusi. Emp.

An.Do.252.

THis ouerthrow of the Romans, and death of Decius, in outward ſemblance was ſo greeuouſly taken by Trebonianus Gallus, that no man was ſo forward for reuenge as hee, and therefore the laſt in ſuſpicion of Treaſon. The Armie hee ſtrengthned, and daily encouraged, pretending great ſeruice againſt thoſe barbarous Scythians, but all to gaine credit and liking of the Souldiers, whereby hee ſoone atchieued his deſire, and with their applauſes was proclaimed Emperour.

Gallus elected Emperour.

(2) By Birth, he was deſcended of an honourable Familie in Rome: but true honour cannot harbour where dwelleth treachery and falſhood, as it was with him, when appointed by Decius to bee Gouernour of Myſia, and to keepe the paſſages from the inuading Gothes, the deſire of Rule ſo corrupted his minde, that he plotted with them againſt the Armie, and betraied the truſt and life of his Soueraigne.

His parentage.

(3) Neither is he ſtained with the blot of Treaſons only, but alſo with a careleſſe and cruell gouernment; for with the Gothes hee made a diſhonourable peace, whereby the Romans (who were Lords of the World) became Tributarie by a yeerely pay to thoſe vnciuill Scythians, who neuertheleſſe in ſhort time brake their Truce with him, ſacking and ſpoiling the Prouinces of Thraſia, Myſia, Theſſalia, and Macedonia: the Perſians then alſo by their example entring Meſopotamia and Syria, made ſpoile euen thorow Armenia.

Pomp. Lætus. Blondus. Sabellicus.

(4) Gallus little regarding theſe troubles abroad, conſumed his time idly in Rome, rather as a Bondman to his owne voluptuous deſires, then a Conquering Monarch; taking for his companion and Fellow-Emperour, his ſonne Voluſianus, as appeareth by inſcription tion of Coine placed before, a very childe, whose yeeres did quit him of any Capitall Crime. But himselfe not perceiuing the infortunate succeesse of Decius for persecuting the innocent Christians, stumbled (as Eusebius saith) at the same stone, and banished them whose Praiers preserued his prosperous estate: at which time followed so vniuersall a Pestilence, that no Prouince in the world was free from the same: and his wicked Life and most vnfortunate Raigne hastened now vnto their period.

(5) For the Gothes continuing their furies begunne, his General Aemilian. Maurus ouerthrew them with a wonderfull slaughter; whereby hee grew so famous, and Gallus so contemptible, that the Souldiers (euer affecting change) proclaimed him Emperour, the newes whereof soone rouzed Gallus from the Bed of his lasciuious pleasures, and with his sonne entred the quarrell against Aemilianus, whose fortune was to slay them both in fight, the yeere of Christs Incarnation, two hundred fifty three, after hee had raigned not fully two yeeres, and liued (as Victor testifieth) forty and seuen: whereupon the Armies ioining their forces together, conferred the Imperiall Title and Ensignes vpon the Conquerour.

Æmilianus Maurus Emp.

An. Do. 253. Emilianus succeeding Gallus by the only election of the Mysian Armie, was by birth an African in the Prouince Mauritania, of Parentage base and obscure; who being risen by the Warres from meane places of seruice, and no better then a Common Souldier, aspired to the charge and credit of a Captaine Generall.

Aemilian. Maurus his descent.

(2) His Election at first was contradicted by the Italian Bands, in fauour of Valerianus their owne Leader, whom they sought to raise Emperour, the Senate also inclining thereto, the fame of the man among them was so renowned. The most voices therefore heard on his side. Some haue rather accounted Æmilianus an Vsurper, then ranked him in the catalogue of lawfull Emperours.

Eutropius.

(3) But seeing Eutropius doth allow him the place, we are not to dispute his title or claime: only his short time of gouernment admitteth no matters of large discourse, being cut off in the budde, before the graft had time to spring. For his Armie disliking what themselues had done, and hearing of the worths and election of Valerianus, laid down their weapons born in his defense, and tumultuously murdered him in the heat of their blouds, after hee had raigned in name, without action, the space almost of foure moneths.

Aemilian. Maurus his end, and continuance of his raigne.

(4) So vnconstant is the state of worldly felicitie, and may bee compared to a mastlesse Shippe, which without Tackle is left to the mercie of the raging Seas, that is one while caried with the faire windes of hope towards the hauen of wished desires, but straightwaies ouerwhelmed with the waues of despaire: and most especially him that is borne vpon the opinions of the giddy multitude, now carried aloft vpon the flouds of their fawning fauours, and anon left in the sands of their retiring ebbes, with a sudden shipwracke of all their fore-gone fortunes. And these aduentures too soone Æmilianus felt, who the same yeere that hee thus put foorth to Sea, lost all his aduenture, and therewith his life, Anno 253.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Anno Dom. 254.

IF euer the saying of the wise Athenian Solon (spoken to Cræsus the rich king of Lydia) was true, That no man can be happy before the day of his death: then most truly may it be verified of this Valerianus the next succeeding Emperor: whose yeers were multiplied with increase of honour, vntill they came to seuenty and seuen, but then were clouded with such ignominious miseries, as the like had neuer hapned to any Romaine Emperour before him, and (I may well say) to no other Monarch in the world before liuing: Such is the Ordinance of our great God, sometimes from the Dunghil to raise men of low degree, and to place them with Princes in the Chaire of Maiestie; then againe to bring down the Mighty from their Seate of Glory, & to leaue them chained with the poorest Captiues, & basest Vassals. For such was the State of that Great & Proud King of Babel, who from the height of Maiesty fell into the cõditions of an vnreasonable Beast. And so was it with Valerianus, though not vtterly abandoned frõ the Societie of men, as Babels King was: yet was he caried Captiue vnto a Nation whose Society was scarce humaine, and where his vsage was more then barbarous.

Valerianus his descent.

(2) This man was both nobly descended, and of so great esteeme among the Romans, that beeing but a priuate, and then also absent, they chose him for their Censor, an Office of high dignitie, conferred euer vpon the Best, as Trebellius Pollio, who wrote the History of his Life, hath declared. Eusebius reporteth his beginning to haue beene gracious and milde towards the Christians, aboue any of his Ancestors whatsoeuer; yea euen those who were themselues openly accounted Christians: insomuch, that his Clemencie was their Protection, and his Court the Sanctuarie of their safeties. But Satan (whose hatred sleepeth not) stirred vp an Egyptian Sorcerer against them, who so inchanted the Emperors heart, that with great crueltie he began the Eighth Persecution, & so raged, that some haue appropriated the sayings of the Apocalyps in the thirteenth chapter vnto him, as to whom power was giuen for two and fortie monethes ouer the Saintes of God, and a mouth to vtter great blasphemies: Of which opinion is the ancient Dionysius Alexandrinus. Many indeed were the Martyrs that he caused with horrible tortures to die, and more had done, if the iust reuenging hand of God had not cut him off.

(3) For Sapores the sauage King of Persia, making great spoile in Syria, Cilicia, and Cappadocia, drew Valerian from Rome into Mesopotamia, to withstand his rage, where striking Battell with him was left (either by Treason or Chance) without sufficient Guard to secure his Person, and was there taken Prisoner by the Persians, hauing then raigned seuen yeeres (whereof two were spent in spilling of the bloud of Saints) and thence forward, the rest of his life was enthralled to a most miserable and mercilesse seruitude: For the Tyrannizing Persian puft vp with this fortunate gale, to an excessiue swelling of pride; whensoeuer he was disposed to take Horse, made Valerianus his Foot-stoole, causing this Greatest Monarch of the World to whom all Nations did homage, to bow downe his necke and backe for himselfe thereon to tread, and mount into his Saddle: In which vnsufferable slauerie, his old body indured without release, to the end of his most wretched life, which by some Authours account was full seuen yeeres more; the very time of the Babylonian Kings abasement.

(4) But herein the misery of Valerianus is much greater then Nabuchadnezars was, in that God both restored him to his former glory, and indued him with heauenly grace to confesse his sinnes; whereas Valerianus perished in the desperate calamitie whereinto he was fallen; as Eusebius sheweth in these words: And thou Valerian, forasmuch as thou hast exercised the same cruelty in murdering the subiects of God, therefore hast proued vnto vs the righteous Iudgement of God, in that thy selfe wast bound in Chaines, and caried away for a Captiue Slaue with thy Glorious Purple and thy Imperiall Attire, & at length also cõmanded by Sapors King of the Persians, to be slaine, & powdred with salt, hast set vp vnto all men a perpetuall Monument of thine own wretchednesse.

Eusebius in serm. ad Conuentum Sanctorum.

(5) How vnspeakeable the cruelties were which this wretched Emperor endured by that Tyrant, may hence appeare, in that not only those which were Allies to the Romaine Empire, but also the Barbarous Kings, and friends of Sapores were moued with commiseration, and distaste, as Trebell. Pollio proueth by their own letters sent for his release, the copies whereof he there produceth. Other Princes also of the East, as of the Bactrians, Albanians, Iberians, and Scythians, inhabiting Mount Taurus, had such sense of these ignominious vsages, that they disdained to receiue the letters from Sapor of his Victorious successe, and sent their Ambassadors to Rome, profferring their assistance for the redemption of their Emperour; yet all auailed not, and Sapor held still his Prisoner, abating nothing either of his owne pride, or his Captiues miserie, but in the end (so hellish a fiend is reuenge) commanded his Eyes to be pulled out, and so for age and griefe he died, as Eusebius saith: being, as Agathus (a writer of credit) reporteth, flaied aliue by direction of this vnhumane King. Thus did God punish one Tyrant by another, and thus himselfe felt those torments vnpittied, which hee had without pitie inflicted on others. The race of whose Raigne is accounted to bee seuen yeares before his Captiuitie, wherein he liued almost so long as Galienus his sonne sat Emperour, and died in the yeere two hundred sixty one.

Valerianus had his Eyes puld out.

VAlerian now Captiue in Perſia (while Odenatus graſping the aduantage, tooke vpon him the Empire of the Eaſt; & the now guideleſſe Armie of Rome, occupied onely in ſpoile and mutinie, their leaders in faction, and the whole State aſtoniſhed in affrighted terrour and amazement) Baliſta (a gallant gentleman) firſt of the Romans mooued with the inſtant miſerie of the Common-wealth, reſolued by electing anew an Emperour, to preuent the apparant ruine of his owne Country: yet neuer in this his worthie reſolution, once dreamed of Gallienus, (though before choſen Auguſtus in the full fortune of his father) but the affection of the Armie forcibly ſetled the Garland vpon Macrian and his two ſonnes, as the moſt worthie; who with his eldeſt not long after ſubdued by Aureolus vſurping Illyria (againſt Gallenus then receiued Soueraigne by the Roman Senate) and his youngeſt betraied to murder by plot of Odenatus, left the diſtracted Empire to thoſe three, of which the laſt diſdaining much the indignitie offred to the State of Rome, by that baſe captiuitie of Valerian, whoſe calamity nothing touched the ſenſe of his vnnaturall ſonne, entred a warre againſt the Perſians, and tooke from them their Cities Niſabis and Carras. But ſuch was the moderation of this man, that although hee had power of an independant Soueraignety, yet he held ſtill a good correſpondencie and intelligence in all his actions of Gouernment, with Gallienus, to whom he ſent (as monument of Victorie and Reuenge) ſuch of the Perſian Nobilitie as became his Priſoners: and thus Odenatus did conquer, and Gallenus triumph. But ſuch was the baſeneſſe of the other, that when he could not by any Princely vertue in himſelfe, eclipſe the true merit of Odenatus, he endeuoured to deface by treacherie what he could not ſuppreſſe by valour. But in this failing, hee made him then (through feare) copartner of his Empire, ſtiling him Auguſtus, and ſtamping his face and the Perſian Triumph vpon the publike Coine of the State, by approbation of the Senate, leauing him alone to defend thoſe Frontiers of the Empire, whileſt himſelfe, neither regarding his old fathers miſeries, (moſt miſerable that he had ſo vnnaturall a ſonne) the diſhonour of the Romane State, nor the reuolts of the Prouinces, wherof newes was daily brought him, ſpent his vnprincely thoughts vpon fruitleſſe deuices, as in reſeruing ſundry Fruits and Flowers, that they might grow greene and flouriſh all ſeaſons of the yeere; and (which was worſe) vpon women and wanton dalliances. Yet had hee a Ladie of excellent beauty and allurements, Cornelia Salonina Pipara, to his wife, the daughter of the King of the Marcomanni, whoſe feature wee finde often minted vpon her Monies. His ſonne by her Saloninus hee adopted Cæſar, of whom there is no more remembred in Storie, then that hee was borne noble, trained vp princely, and periſhed through the errours of his father, and not his owne. And to his brother Licinius Valerianus (to whom the father had giuen the title of Cæſar) he added the honour of Auguſtus. And therefore we haue not held it improper, to adioine to his their monies in the front of his life.

(2) The calamities of this Emperours time were ſo many, as almoſt exceed credit: and Signes ſhewed both in the Heauens and the Earth, manifeſted his wrath, that ſate vpon the Throne of Iaſper, from whoſe preſence iſſued Thundrings, Lightnings, and Voices. For (by Writers of beſt credit) the Sunne was clouded as vnder ſackcloth, and not ſeene for many daies together. Earth-quakes great, and fearfully reſounding, ouerthrew Cities and other edifices, ſhaking the ground ſo terribly, that vaſt Caues, and hideous gaping bowels of the earth were thereby laid open, and whereout (no leſſe ſtrangely) flowed great ſtreames of ſalt waters. The Earth roared, and ſeemed to thunder, when there was no voice heard in the aire. The Sea ouer-ſwelled her bankes, and brake into many Continents, drowning Countries, Cities, and People: and (beſides all theſe) ſo violent a Peſtilence raged, that in Rome no leſſe then 5. thouſand perſons died in a day.

(3) Theſe miſeries ſomewhat mooued this Heathenish Emperour to remorſe: and thinking thereby to pacifie the wrath of the Diuine Powers, hee ſtaied the Perſecutions of the Chriſtians, ſending out his Edicts in fauour of them. For not only the Heauens, Earth, and Seas declared the anger of their God, out of whoſe mouth went a two-edged ſword, but the Prouinces alſo ſeemed to be remoued out of their places. The Souldiers of all parts electing their owne Generals, aduanced no leſſe then Thirty at once, who aſſumed the title of Emperours, but are recorded to Poſterities by the name of Vſurping Tyrants. And as they were all deadly oppoſite each to other, ſo were they iointly almoſt all bent againſt Galienus; whereby the Roman Empire was more oppreſſed with her owne forces, then euer it had been by forraine Powers. And ſince ſixe of them aſſumed the Purple Robe in this Weſterne Angle of the Empire, it will not be impertinent to the courſe of Story, with a light touch to remember them, and to expreſſe their Monies, as we haue done the reſt of thoſe that held the reines of gouernment in theſe parts of the Romane World.

Apoc.1.16.

Thirty Emperors at once.

M. Cassius Labienus Posthumus after the death of Saloninus (who was committed to his education by Gallienus) assumed the Empire, by aide and encouragement of those of Gallia, ouer whom he had born the office of liefetenancie by fauour of Valerian the Emperour. And these againe, as all Populars greedie of Innouation from him and Iunius Cassius Posthumus his sonne, tooke both honour and life, after ten yeares gouernment. This opportunity either made by L. Ælianus, or fitly taken, mounted him vp with ease into that Emperiall throne, in which he sate not with like fortune of continuance, though of conclusion. To this man succeeded together, M. Aurelius Victorinus, and Lucius his son; both in a Tumult neere Colayn by their souldiors murthered. And had not the inordinate lust of the elder, blemished his other vertues, he had to al the most excellent Emperors bin nothing inferiour, in the best of their other vertues.

(7) The restlesse humor now of the giddy Commons, next setleth it selfe vpon Aurelius Marius, a soueraigne sutable in his meane condition to their base affections (for he was no better then a Black-smith) yet to him a man of their own meanes & making, they were no lesse vnconstant and cruel, then to the rest: after three daies, setting an end of his gouernment, with a sword of his own forging. And therfore Piuesius Tetricus, the father and sonne, though ascending the throne of Maiestie, with the greatest applause of that people, and filling it vp with much merit and happy successe of their own, when they considered the insufferable insolencies and desperate practises of that prophane ranke, chose rather to adorne Aurelians Triumph, in a voluntarie captiuitie, then to liue and rule at the deuotion of a lawlesse multitude. And these times seemed no lesse fatally bent to bloud, disorder, and tyranny in other parts as well as these: For the Pannonians raised Ingenuus: The Mysians, A. Regillianus: The Egyptians, Æmilianus: In Africa Celsus was proclaimed: In Illyricum, Aureolus: and in the East, Odenatus (a man the more famous for Zenobia, his glorious and magnanimous Wife; Whose valour was so feared of Galienus, that to make him his, hee admitted him his Fellow-Emperor, with the Stile of Augustus as we haue remembred before.) The [a] Germans inuade Italy: The [b] Gothes waste Greece, Pontus and Asia; The Samartians seize [c] Austriche and Hungary: The Persians robbe Syria: The Saxons breake into Gallia: The Franks into Spaine: In a word, all are in vproares, the second seale opened, and the Red-horse prepared for Battaile, whose Rider had receiued a great and sharpe Sword, with Commission giuen him to take Peace from the Earth: and these times of troubles are so famous in Storie, and the reuolutions of Acts so agreeable to the words of the Prophetie, that they may seeme iustly a most exact accomplishment of that sacred vision.

(5) Finally, when Gallienus had raigned from his first Associating with his Father the terme of fifteene yeeres, Martian, Heraclianus, and Ceronius, three of his principall Captaines, (compounding together that one of them should bee Emperour) plotted his death, whiles hee besieged the Citie Millan, where they traiterously murthered him, the yeere of our Lord two hundred sixty nine, after that hee had suffered the Empire to be rent in peeces, and vsurped by many Forraine and barbarous Nations.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Fla. Claudius Emp.

An. Do. 269.

ROMES glory thus declining, and the Imperiall Foundations thus vndermined, the aſpiring tops of all that beautious frame beganne to ſhake, and to foreſhew the ſignes of her approching fall. And had not the Fates euen at that inſtant raiſed a ſtay to vnderprop the Walles, thoſe mounted Towers which ſo long had braued the Skie, had beene laid leuell with the Ground, and made the ruines of All-conſuming Time.

(2) For whereas by the ſtrange confuſions vnder the late Emperour, the Eagles body was burdened with the waight of thoſe thirty heads at once: of which number though many of them by their owne mutuall rauening were conſumed before the death of Galienus, yet the mightieſt, as Aurelius Gouernour of Dalmatia, Tetricus and Victorinus, who held Britaine and Gallia; and Zenobia (the Heroicke Queene and wife of Odenatus) all the Eaſt; to omit the Murderers of Galienus, that durſt not make their claime, (their deed ſo ill diſgeſted) all theſe were ſtill remaining and ſtrong, at ſuch time as Flauius Claudius by the Souldiers was elected before the Walles of Milan, and confirmed with much ioy by the Senate in Rome.

His deſcent.

(3) This Flauius was deſcended of noble Parentage, out of Dalmatia, by ſome; or as others ſay, of Dardania, and ſprung from the Troian Bloud. But Aurelius Victor will haue him the ſonne of Gordianus the Emperour before ſpoken of. Howſoeuer, a moſt worthy man he was, an excellent Captaine, of ſingular continence, a iuſt Iudge, a louer of ſtrangers, ſeuere to the wicked, but moſt benigne to the vertuous: ſo that we may well ſay, In Rome was a new world; or at leaſt, In the World was a new Rome.

Aurel. Victor.

Flauius Claudius his vertues.

(4) His firſt Expedition was againſt Aurelius, that held Milan, whom he there ſlew, and ioined his Souldiers to his owne ſtrength. But preferring the generall good before his particular quiet, he addreſſed his warres for the Eaſt, againſt the Gothes, who (as Iornandes their Story-writer reporteth) had infeſted thoſe parts of the Empire (for fifteene yeeres continuance) with continuall irruptions, and had now lately entred friendſhip with many other like barbarous Nations, inuading Thracia, and the Countries before them, euen vnto Macedonia: and thence taking their way thorow Hungarie, came downe the Riuer Danubie, with two thouſand Saile of Ships, fraught with Munition and Men. To meet theſe, Claudius prepared: but before his Encounter, he wrote thus to the Senate:

Iornandes. Gothes inuade the Empire.

Paul. Oroſius.

Two thouſand ſaile of Gothes.

Claudius Letter to the Senate.

(5) "Renowned Fathers and Reuerend Lords, vnderſtand ye for certaine, that three hundred and twentie thouſand men of warre are entred our Confines, whoſe waight doth ſeeme to burden the Earth it ſelfe, and whoſe warre-like preparations make theſe parts of the Empire to tremble and quake; with whom I am now to ſtrike Battle: wherein if the Conqueſt be mine, the ioy will be yours. But if I fall, yet I pray remember that I fight after Galienus hath raigned, and rent the ſtrength of the Romans in theſe remote Prouinces, and after the Rebellions of Lollianus, Poſthumus, Eugenius, Regillianus, Celſus, and others, who haue ſo weakened the ſinewes of our Armes, and broken the Swords and Launces of our defenſe, that I may well ſay, wee want, if not ſtrength, yet weapons wherewithall to fight. And to our ſhame be it ſpoken, Zenobia a Woman commands all our Croſſe-bowes, and bends them againſt our vnarmed breſts. How ſmall ſoeuer therefore our performance ſhall bee in this ſeruice, repute it (I pray) for great, and wiſh our proceeding may ſort to the weale of the Empire.

Gothes vanquiſhed.

(6) Which done, with no daunted ſpirit he entred Battle, and with more then wonted courage fought ſo valiantly, that he ſlew and tooke Priſoners, to the number of three hundred thouſand fighting men, with two thouſand Shippes laden with Munition, ſo that whole houſes were filled to their toppes with Targets, Shields, Swords, and Launces, and other abiliments for Warre, whereof he wrote againe to Rome: and following the Enemie with ſucceſſe of Victorie, in Thracia neere Bizantium, in Macedonia neere Theſſalonica, droue the Gothes out of thoſe parts which they had ſo long infeſted, and reſtored the wonted bounds of the Empire. Thence marching into Germanie, neere the Lake called Garda, gaue that reuolted Nation a great ouerthrow, where (as Eutropius and Victor doe report) hee vanquiſhed two thouſand of thoſe ſtrong Germans, and there eſtabliſhed againe their ſubiection to the Romans power. And now minding to goe forward againſt Tetricus and the puiſſant Zenobia, a Feuer did firſt cut off his purpoſe, and ſhortlie after his life: a thing very ſtrange and rare in that age, as by the courſe of their raignes wee haue hitherto ſeene; not that ſo great a Monarch ſhould die, (they being all of the ſame earthly mould that meaneſt men are) but that in thoſe daies a Roman Emperour ſhould die in his bed, as other men doe, of a naturall death.

Flauius Claudius died a naturall death.

His perſonage and qualities.

(7) Hee was of perſonage tall, his bodie well compoſed and ſtrong, bright and cleere eies, his face great and full; and of life moſt temperate and chaſte. Hee raigned one yeere, tenne moneths, and fifteene daies, and died the fourth of Februarie, in the yeere of Chriſt, two hundred ſeuentie one. His Statue of Gold was ſet vp in the Capitoll, and his Target of the ſame metall hung vp in the Senate-houſe, himſelfe (in honour of his admired worth) placed among the Romane Emperours that were deified for Gods: ſuch an eſtimation and loue did his vertuous life procure vnto him euen after his death.

M. AVRELIVS QVINTILIVS.

Chapter XXXVIII.

A. Quintilius Emperor.

An. Do. 271.

Entropius.

Quintilius brother to the last Emperour.

QVintilius, the Brother of Claudius, and Vice-Roy in his abſence for the Guard of Italy, was by the Armie whereof hee had command, proclaimed Emperour immediately vpon the Newes of Claudius his death: The Senate as ioifully confirming his Election, as they were ſorrowfull for their loſſe of his moſt worthy Brother. Brethren indeed they were by nature, and in conditions not much vnlike; ſo that what ſeemed to bee paſt in the one, was in the other ſupplied and ſtill remaining: For this M. Aurelius Quintilius, was both wiſe for Ciuil Gouernment, and experienced for Warres, wanting no complements of an abſolute Prince.

(2) But long his glaſſe ſtood not without a turne, nor his Fortunes fauning without a frowne. For the victorious Souldiors which in his expeditions had followed Claudius, and thought themſelues worthy of the firſt voyce in Election, proclaimed Aurelianus for Emperour, a moſt valiant Captain; and of whoſe proweſſe there had been ſo ſufficient experience, as that Quintilius knew hee could not ſtand againſt him.

And therefore miſtruſting the ſtrength of his Title, and affections of his Souldiours, reputed it ignominious for a noble minde, to die with leſſe honour then he attained vnto, and enioied by his life: and therfore reſoluing to die an Emperour, choſe rather by a voluntary cutting of his own veines, to powre out his life with his bloud, then to hazard the chance of vncertaine warres, or to returne to his priuate eſtate.

Quintilius cut his own veines, and ſo bled to death.

And thus no longer raigning then ſeuenteen daies, (which ſhort time could miniſter little matter of larger diſcourſe) hee died with his brother the ſame moneth of February the twentith day, and yeere of Chriſt his incarnation, two hundred ſeuentie one.

He raigned but ſeuenteen daies.

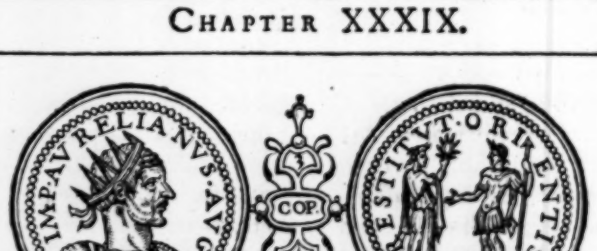
Chapter XXXIX.



Val: Aurelianus Emperor.

An. Do. 271.

SO ſhort was the Raigne of the laſt Emperour Quintilius, that Aurelianus who followed him may be ſaid to be the Succeſſor of Claudius, and not of him: being elected by his Legions in the Eaſt, as ſoone as the other had beene in Italy (though confirmed before him of the Senate in Rome) continued ſtill his riuall for Maieſtie, and attained the top of that high ſet Gole, whereof Quintilius failed, before his foot had well mounted the firſt ſtep.

Aurelianus his deſcent.

(2) This Valerius Aurelianus was of parentage neither honourable nor rich, and yet his fortunes carried him to the height of both. Some recount his birth was of Dacia; others of Myſia; both ſo doubtful that Flauius Vopiſcus, (the copious Writer of his Life) leaues it vndecided, and to the cenſure of his Readers. His riſings were by the Warres; wherunto from his child-hood hee had a naturall inclination: and for continuall carying of his weapons, was commonlie called Aurelianus the Sword-bearer.

Fla. Vop.

(3) His

(3) His ſeruice was ſufficiently knowne to the Generals of diuers Prouinces, who had forty ſundry times imploied him in the charge of a Lieutenant: and vnder Claudius in Perſia he was the Coronell of the Horſe. In the warres of Sarmatia he is reported to haue ſlaine forty Enemies with his owne hands in one day; and at other ſeuerall times, to the number of nine hundred men, as both Vopiſcus and Theoclius haue affirmed. And generally ſo famous were his deeds, both before he was Cæſar, and after, as that he is by ſome compared with Iulius and Alexander.

Aurelianus comparable with Cæſar and Alexander.

(4) Vpon the ratifying of his election by the Senate at Rome, hee haſted not thither to be ſaluted and enſtalled Emperour, but foorthwith marched againſt the Sueuians and Sarmates, who ſore infeſted the Empire with warres: and hauing ſoone ſubdued them, and quieted thoſe parts, in great haſte hee came into Italie againſt the Germans, who with Fire and Sword had gone as farre as Milan: and them likewiſe with great valour hee forced thence. Then entring Rome with great pompe, cauſed the Walles to bee repaired and inlarged, which was not lawfull but onely for Victorious Emperours. But long he ſtaied not, ere he returned into Syria, againſt the ſtout Queene Zenobia, whoſe braue reſolutions, and warlike power for fight, her Letter in anſwer vnto him (when being ſorely tired, he profered her wealth, life, and liberty to yeeld) doth manifeſtly declare: the tenour thereof being as followeth.

Aurelianus inlarged the walles of Rome.

(5) "Zenobia, the moſt mighty Eaſterne Queene, "to Aurelianus, Romes Auguſtus, ſendeth greeting. "Neuer Captaine to this day, in vſing Penne in ſtead "of Speare, or filed Words for weapons points, hath "more ſufficiently diſcharged the parts of Warre, "then thou to me in Writ haſt done: wherein I well "perceiue thy drift, and blame thee not, that ſeeſt me "but a Woman: which Sex you men make ſubiects "only by your ſmoothing tongues. But know, Au- "guſtus, thou dealeſt not with a Roman Dame, nor "with her who vpon baſe conditions will ſubſcribe "her honour; but with Zenobia, the * Palmyrean "Queene, in whoſe womanly breſt the manly heart "of great Odenatus doth ſtill liue and lie. Art "thou his better? thou art deceiued: or I her worſe? "nothing leſſe: who from her perſon doe deriue my "Pedigree, and from her courage will maintaine my "cauſe. I am a Queene, and raigne beloued, was Romes "Empreſſe, obeied and honoured; and the wife of "Odenatus, whom all you Romans greatly feared. Are "my powers weake? The Perſians (whoſe ſtrength "you well haue tried) will ſupplie. Are my Souldiers "few? The Saracens haue more that will aſsiſt: and "the Armenians are wholly at my command. If then "Theeues and Robbers in Syria were ſufficient to ouer- "throw thine Armie, what hope is left thee to eſcape "our hands, when all theſe our ſtrengths ſhall be thus "conioined in one? Therefore the ſame offers that "to me thou haſt ſent, the ſame to thee I heere re- "turne, and will performe, if thou in time embrace "this truce.

(6) This haughtie anſwer of that vndaunted Queene, put more fire to the furie of Aurelianus, who tooke the Letter in ſuch ſcorne, that hee threatned death to the Inditer, (whom he ſuppoſed to be Longinus the Philoſoper, who was alwaies with her, and her Inſtructer) which afterwards he did accompliſh: for deſtroying her ſeuerall Aids before they could meete together, and beſieging Palmyra her ſtrong Citie, hee brought the ſame to ſuch diſtreſſe, that in the end hee tooke her Captiue; and glad of ſuch a prey, carried her himſelfe to Rome, where following his Chariot of Triumph, attired in Tiſſues and richeſt Robes of price, ſhee was lead his Priſoner in Chaines of Gold: vpon whoſe preſence the Spectators with admirations ſo much gazed, that ſomewhat it dimmed the Maieſtie of Aurelianus: for ſhee is ſaid to be exceedingly faire, though not very white, but ſomewhat browne: her eies blacke and bright, her teeth ſhining like pearles, her bodie tall, and of moſt ſtately proportion, her countenance modeſt, milde, and pleaſing, her voice ſweet, her conuerſation honeſt, her minde chaſte, and body continent, wiſe, temperate, and learned in the Greeke, Latine, and Egyptian tongues. Yea the atchiuement of this Conqueſt was held ſo notable, that hee reputed himſelfe the Reſtorer of the Eaſt, as it appeareth by the reuerſe of his money here prefixed in the entrance of his raigne.

(7) Theſe Acts of Aurelianus made him ſo famous abroad, and feared at home, that Tetricus which had held out againſt Galienus, came in vnder his protection, holding it more ſafe to bee a Subiect in quiet, then a Commander againſt an Oppoſite of ſo inuincible a minde: by whom thereupon hee was made Gouernour of Campania, and of other Prouinces in Italie.

(8) Hitherto this Emperours ſucceſſes were very proſperous (we may well ſuppoſe) for his indulgence to the Chriſtians, whoſe aſſemblies he permitted, and whoſe Biſhops he ſo fauoured, that at their requeſt hee baniſhed Paulus Samoſatenus the Heretike out of their Councels, and publiſhed an Edict in the behalfe of their Synods. M. CLAV-

M. CLAVDIVS TACITVS.

CHAPTER XL.

Claudius Tacitus Emp.

An. Do. 276.

Aurelianus being dead no man ſought to be Emperour.

THE former ſeditions ended by Aurelianus, and the ſtate of the Empire remaining now in quiet, no man appeared to ſue, much leſſe tumultuouſlie to ſtriue for that Royal Diadem; but all the great Commanders (as though they made courteſie in giuing way each vnto others) ſtoode at the foot of Maieſtie; no man attempting higher to mount. The ſouldiors ſent to the Senate, to deſigne the man whom they beſt liked; the Senate requeſted the ſouldiers to elect him whom they held worthieſt; in which reſpectiue complements, and moſt kinde correſpondencie of all parts, eight moneths paſſed with a peaceable Interregnum, as writers report.

Senate and Souldiers ſtrain courteſie who ſhall chooſe the Emperour.

(2) It ſeemeth, the freſh ſenſe and fearefull experiences of the former heady proceedings, made men more wiſe, then to ſeeke their owne deaths, and eſpecially the Generals to be better aduiſed, then to runne deſperately vpon their owne deſtructions. A change vncredible, that Thirtie ere whiles would needs be ſtiled Emperours, among the tumultuous Souldiours (though they were ſure to buy the vſe of that name with their deareſt bloud) and not one now in peace could bee found, either haſty to ſeeke it, or verie willing to accept it.

Eutropius Vopiſcus. Orosius Onuphrius.

(3) At laſt both Senate and Souldiours, hauing in their eye M. Claudius Tacitus, a man very Noble and of Conſular degree, of great age, ſingular learning, & long experience in Magiſtracie; him by a ioint and conſpiring ſuffrage, they all elected to their Empire: but he hauing before hand ſome inkling of this their purpoſe, got him out of the way, liuing very ſecretly two moneths at his Rurall Mannor, flying (ſaith Vopiſcus) that high dignity which he fore-ſaw would proue his ouerthrow. And when they did by Embaſſages often ſollicite him to accept of their Election; ſending him the Enſignes and Stile of Auguſtus: hee againe returned them, though with harty thanks, yet abſolute deniall, alledging by reaſon of his age and infirmitie, that hee was euery way vnable to diſcharge their ſo great expectations.

Claudius Tacitus elected Emperor

(4) But after much inter-courſe, and many intreaties paſſed, at length (the neceſsitie of the State ſo requiring) he accepted their offer, though not with much contentment to himſelf, who knew the waight of ſo great titles would proue heauy & alwaies dangerous for him to beare; but with vnſpeakeable ioy, was receiued by the whole State, which promiſed all bleſſed hopes to the ſtate vnder ſo worthy, ſo wiſe, ſo vertuous, learned, and ſo iuſt an Emperour.

(5) For as before his aduancement, he was of Exemplary compoſednes and vertuous diſpoſition, ſo in this high Eſtate, his life was temperate, and without al pride, & ſo deſirous to be a Preceder of moderation, & ſingularity vnto others, as that he would not permit his Empreſſe to weare any Iewels of high price, nor to vſe other cuſtomable ſuperfluitie, or exceſſe in his owne houſe. For learning and learned men, whom he euer embraced in his priuate Eſtate, he now by all meanes endeuored to honour and aduance, and publikely profeſſed that what Imperiall vertues hee had, hee was to aſcribe them to his ſtudy of good letters: For which cauſe, hee was wont to call Cornelius Tacitus (that worthieſt Hiſtorian of the Romans State) his Father, and commanded his workes to be carefully preſerued in euery Library throughout the Empire; and ten times euery yeare to be tranſcribed on publique coſt. All which notwithſtanding, many of that worthy Authours Bookes haue ſince miſcaried.

Claudius Tacitus his care to preſerue the works of Cornelius Tacitus.

(6) But his vertues were too great for the world long to enioy: and ſith his Raigne was but ſhort, it is booteleſſe to lengthen it with long diſcourſes: For his Peace continued without any memory of Warres; and his ſhort time (wherein hee did nothing without conſent of the Senate) was ſpent rather reforming other mens vices, and abuſes of the Lawes and State, then in diſplaying his owne vertues; which doubtleſſe (if their faire ſtreame had not beene vntimely ſtopt) would haue proued incomparable to any his fore-goers, and vnmatchable by any his followers. What death hee died is left vncertaine; Eutropius thinketh him ſlaine, by his rebellious ſouldiers in Aſia, vpon his voiage againſt the Perſians: but Victor reporteth that hee died a naturall death, and that of a burning-feuer, in the citie of Tharſus: And Flauius Vopiſcus, (who wrote his life) ſaith his death came vpon a ſurcharge of griefe, by reaſon of factions; whereby (the infirmitie of his age thereto helping) his vnderſtanding was crazed, and his heart broken, whereof hee died, when he had raigned ſix moneths, and twenty daies, the yeare of Chriſt Ieſus, one hundred ſeuentie ſix.

An. Do. 277.

NO sooner was the death of Tacitus diuulged, but his brother Florianus (much vnlike him in that point) tooke vpon him the Name and Authoritie Imperiall, without expecting any election either of Senate or Souldiers, and therfore not likely long to stand sure. And although in all other princely parts hee was not much vnlike his brother, yet hauing so great an Opposite as Probus was, on whom the Easterne Armie had conferred the same Title, the blossomes of his conceited hope withered euen in the budde, and perished before they had any time of growth.

Florianus made himselfe Emperour.

(2) For no sooner came to his eares the newes of Probus his election, but he found that heady and precipitate attempts were pleasing in their Beginnings, but full of difficulties in their Proceedings, and most disastrous in their Successe: and therefore despairing both of Men and Meanes to raise the Building, whose foundation he had so hastily (but too weakly) laid, he caused his owne veines to be cut, as Quintilius before him in like case had done, whereby he boldly bled to death, after hee had enioyed a Titular Soueraignty only eightie daies, saith Eutropius: but Vopiscus saith, not altogether two moneths, and thinkes him killed by the Souldiers, in the Citie Tharsus likewise, in the yeere of Christ two hundred seuenty and seuen.

CHAPTER XLII.

Val. Probus Emp.

An. Do. 277.

THE Easterne Armie most potent and famous at the death of Tacitus, from them was expected the new Emperours election, which accordinglie they did, but with much more wisedome and deliberate circumspection, then the Souldiers of those times were accustomed to doe. For euery Captaine of the Armie singled out his owne Companies, and in seuerall Assemblies exhorted, that all affections laid aside, they would applie their mindes to thinke of the worthiest man, on whom they might conferre their voices and fauours. At which time, the opinion of Probus his worth had so generally possessed the hearts of all men, that the shout and crie of all was vniforme, Let vs haue Probus for our Emperour. This being signified to Rome, the Senate with applause and thankes approoued and confirmed his Election, with additions to his Title, Augustus, The Father of his Countrey, and the highest Bishop. For in those times, euen amongst Heathens, the sacred Title of a Bishop was accounted an additament of honour euen to an Emperour.

Probus called the father of his Countrey, and the highest Bishop.

(2) He was borne in Hungarie in the Citie Sirmia, of honourable Parentage, especially by his mothers side. His fathers name was Maximus, a man famous in Militarie Seruice, who died Tribune at the warres in Egypt: and himselfe very young, but very valorous, by the Emperor Valerianus (who ſo loued him for his vertues, that he vſed to ſay of him, that of all men he beſt deſerued the name Probus, that is vertuous) was made a Tribune alſo. In which Office, with great praiſe he ſerued vnder Galienus, Aurelianus, & Claudius the Emperours; vnder whom beſides other exploits he fought ſeuerall ſingle-combats to the great honour of himſelfe and Countrey, and receiued as markes of victories, many Ciuicall Crownes, Collars, Bracelets, Launces, Banners, and other Enſignes of Martiall deuice and Priuiledge. Preferred to be Generall in Africa, he ſubdued the Marmarides: In Egypt the Palmerines; vnder Aurelianus the Sarmates and Germans; vnder Claudius the Gothes; and in all places ſo famous for his Acts, that hee was compared with Hannibal and Cæſar.

(3) His firſt ſeruice after hee became Emperour was in Gallia, againſt the Germans, that had made themſelues Lords thereof, where in one Battell, continuing two daies, he ſlew foure hundred thouſand of them, and recouered ſeuentie Cities from the Enemy, as himſelfe ſignified by his own Letters to the Senate. After this warring in Sclauonia, he quieted the Prouinces of Muſcouia, Ruſsia, and Polonia: And entring Thracia, did no leſſe in Greece, Syria, Arabia, Paleſtina, and Iudea; whence paſsing into Perſia, hee had honourable compoſitions of Narſeus their mighty King. Wherupon iſſued ſo vniuerſall Peace, that there were no warres heard of in all the Prouinces of the Empire; inſomuch that it was a common Prouerbe, The very mice durſt not gnaw for feare of Probus. But long this laſted not, ere hee was diſturbed: for the Egyptians erected one Saturninus, a Captaine both wiſe and valiant, for Emperour, and that ſo ſore againſt his will, as he was like to be ſlaine by them for gaine-ſaying their deſires; and by a ſpeech deliuered to his Erectors, he made known to them his aduerſnes from ſo dangerous an ambition; to this effect.

(5) Theſe ſpeeches (as Flauius Vopiſ. the Writer thereof receiued them from the report of his Grand-father, who was there preſent and heard them) could nothing at all diuert the reſolution of the Souldiers, but that they perſiſted and maintained their Election againſt Probus: who vpon notice thereof haſtning toward them with a mighty power, offred them pardon, as one vnwilling to ſhed Ciuill-bloud, or to loſe ſo worthy a man as Saturninus was: but vpon refuſall of his proffered Clemencie, hee gaue him a moſt ſharpe battell, wherein moſt of the Reuoulters were ouerthrowne, and Saturninus in the aſſault of a Caſtle beſieged, was ſlaine, to the great griefe of Probus, who ſought to haue ſaued his life.

(6) But with his death ended not all Ciuill Broiles: for Bonoſus & Proculus two monſters of that age (though of different kinds of vices) oppoſing themſelues againſt him, and aſſuming the Title and Robes Imperiall, vſurped the Prouinces of Britaine, Spaine and ſome part of Gallia, knowing that in theſe places Probus was not much beloued. Bonoſus vvas borne in Britaine, but brought vp in Spaine, without note of action, but onely in his cups, for hee was eſteemed the greateſt drinker of all men liuing: inſomuch as Aurel. ſaid of him, he was born, nō vt viueret, ſed vt biberet; not to draw breath, but to draw in liquor: & yet (as it ſeemeth) hee was in good account vnder the ſaid Aurelianus, hauing a charge of Ships vpon the Germane Seas, which either by treacherie or negligence were burned by the Enemy, in the mouth of Rhine, and (as Probus tooke it) not without the priuitie of Bonoſus: who therefore not daring to ſtand to the triall, made all his powers againſt the Emperour, but was in Battell ouercome, and deſpairing euer againe to make head, put his owne in a halter, whereupon it was ſaid, that a Barrell was hanged, and not a Man.

Whom ſecretly in the Night, hee murthered, and then ſpeedily returned to Rome; hauing by this Expedition, both appeaſed the tumults in the Prouince, and approued his fidelitie to Probus. About this time (as is recorded) certaine Vandals and Burgundians that had inuaded Gallia, were ſent into Britaine by the Emperour to inhabite, who though they had troubled the Romans peace in Gallia, yet did them good ſeruice in Britaine to ſtay their ſubiection; and the Britaines themſelues for ſome good ſeruices were now ſuffred by theſe Emperours, to plant Vines, and make Wines, with other matters aſwell for pleaſure as profit.

(9) At length the Empire in theſe weſt parts ſtanding vniuerſally quiet, Probus determined a iourny into the Eaſt, to end at once all forraine wars; ſaying, he would ſhortly bring it to paſſe, that the ſtate ſhould need no more Souldiers: (which ſpeech they tooke very indignely) & hauing paſſed Illyricum in Sclauonia, was by ſome of his own Army (for curbing, as they cōceiued, with an ouer-hard hand their diſſolute & idle maners) conſpired againſt & treacherouſly murthered, in Nouember the ſecond, and yeere of Chriſt, two hundred eighty two, hauing raigned fiue yeeres and foure moneths: others ſay, ſix yeeres: where notwithſtanding they erected for him a moſt honourable Sepulchre, wherein was engrauen this Epitaph: Here lieth the Emperor Probus, iuſtly for his goodnes called Probus, of all the Barbarous Nations and Tyrants a Conqueror.

ROBVS thus ſlaine in the midſt of his Army, without any apparant cauſe miniſtred, the Souldiers were ſtricken into a great feare and miſtruſted each other to be guilty of the Treaſon, no man therefore diligent to finde out the beginner, nor haſtie to puniſh the bloudy executors; but holding the right of Election to remain in themſelues, they preſently choſe Carus for their Emperor, who had been the Prætorian Præfect valiant, ſufficient, of worth and eſteeme; whereunto the Senate likewiſe conſented.

Carinus ſlaine by a thunderbolt.

(2) From whence or what parents we ſhould deriue his birth, is vncertaine, and of diuers writers diuerſly reported. For Flauius Cæcilianus, who wrote the ſtorie of his time, as Vopiſcus doth report, ſaith, that he was borne in Sclauonia, or as we call it Moſcouia. Oneſimus an ancient writer affirmeth his birth was in Rome, and that his father was a Sclauonian indeed, but held for a citizen, as he citeth by letters from Vopiſcus: Aurelius Victor, Euſebius, and Paulus Oroſius wil haue him a French man, and borne at Narborne: but whence ſoeuer, his princely parts deſerued theſe his princely preferments, and no waies for the ſhort time of his raigne, carried he himſelfe vnder expectation. (3) His firſt proceedings was to finde out the murtherers of Probus, whom hee ſeuerely puniſhed, which tooke away all ſuſpition of treaſon in himſelfe. Then marching againſt the Sarmates, whoſe furie had pierced ſo far into Panonia, that they threatned Italy it ſelfe, he ouerthrew with the ſlaughter of ſixteen thouſand, and tooke twenty thouſand of them priſoners. And leauing Carinus (his elder ſonne) to gouerne Britaine, Gallia, Illyricum, and Spaine, himſelfe with the younger, Numerianus, prepared for the Eaſt againſt the Perſians, in which expedition he tooke in his way Meſopotamia, Seleucia, and certaine cities whom the enemie had entred: and being ſurprized with ſicknes, and not able to trauel, pitched his Pauilion vpon the ſhore of Tigris, where in the midſt of his armie (about the yeere of our ſaluation 283.) garded from all ſuppoſed dangers and aſſaults of man, felt the vnexpected ſtroke of death euen from the hand of God himſelfe: for in his bed by a thunderbolt falling from heauen, he was ſlaine, with many others then preſent with him in his tent, and the ſame conſumed altogether with lightning fire.

(4) The terrour thereof ſo daunted the courage of his whole army, that no further they proceeded in their enterpriſe: and his death was ſo grieuous vnto Numerianus now elected Emperor, that with continuall weeping (a fault in few Sonnes who are raiſed by their fathers fall) his eies were ſo weakened, that he could not indure any light. Vpon which accident, Arrius Aper, (his wiues father) tooke occaſion to conſpire his death, hoping thereby to attaine the Empire himſelfe. For hauing at all times free acceſſe to his preſence, at length in his cloſet hee ſecretly murthered him; pretending to the armie, that his infirmitie only kept him from ſight; and ſo leauing his body to putrifie and corrupt, in ſhort ſpace by the very ſauor thereof the treaſon was deſcried, and the Traitor ſlaine by the hands of Diocleſian, who was both his Iudge and executioner.

(5) His Empire thus ended before it was well begunne, the Armie proclaimed Diocleſian, a Principall man in the Campe for Emperor: who to vphold his election, made al his power for Gallia, againſt his Concurrent Carinus, a man of profuſe ſenſualitie, who there had cauſed himſelfe to bee proclaimed, and in his fathers abſence had ſo ruled there and in Britaine, that Porphyrio liuing at the ſame time, gaue out this teſtimonie, that Britaine was a fertile Prouince of tyrants. Betwixt theſe two Captaines, many skirmiſhes were fought with variable ſucceſſe, till laſtly in a ſet battell, Carinus was ſlaine by a Tribune, whoſe Wife he had defiled; whereby the Imperiall Title was ioyntly conferred vpon Diocleſian.

THe Empire thus deuolued to Diocleſian, with approbation of the Senate, hee euery way ſtudied to bee accounted worthy of the ſame, as knowing well his birth was no way anſwerable to his preſent lot: and therefore choſe for his Caeſar, Maximianus, a man of better deſcent, very honourable, wiſe, and valiant, as was manifeſted in his firſt ſeruice againſt the Gaules, whom with an infinite number of peſants in that prouince, troubling the peace of the Romans, hee with much ſlaughter ouercame. For which exploit ſo fortunately accompliſhed, the Emperor made him his Conſort in the Gouernment.

(2) Diocleſians parentage is vncertainly reported by Writers, ſome making him the ſonne of a Notary, and others of a meere Bondman; but all agreeing that his Country was Dalmatia, and his offspring very baſe. This man being but a Common Souldier, conſulted with a Witch for his future ſucceſſe; who told him (if you pleaſe to beleeue the reporters) that he ſhould become an Emperour after he had killed a Bore: to which he gaue credit, and euer after was a great enemie to that beaſt, and in time grew vnder Probus to ſo great account for dexterity in expediting his affaires, that he was made Steward of his houſe, and now laſtly elected to the Empire.

(3) The very firſt thing that he attempted, was the puniſhmēt of his predeceſſors death: for which Arrius Aper being conuicted before his tribunall ſeat, himſelfe riſing ſuddenly from the Throne, ran him thorow with his ſword, in outward ſhew for zeale of Iuſtice, as not able to endure ſo foule a fact: but in truth to fulfill the Prediction of his hoſteſſe, the Druid; for that Aper ſignifieth a Bore. After which act, he held his Empire fully eſtabliſhed.

(7) Carauſius now rich & compaſſed with friends, ſeeing his deſtruction thus intended and ſought, thought

(8) Againſt him Maximianus ſet forward with a puiſſant Armie, and marched to the Britiſh Ocean: but there vnderſtanding the power of his Enemie, and finding himſelfe in want of men for Sea-ſeruice, hee pitched downe his Tents: and knowing Carauſius a man meet to command the Ilanders, and able to defend them againſt the other Warlike Nations, ſent him offers of peace: the making of which is remembred vnto vs by the Coine of Carauſius before expreſſed, whereon are ſtamped the Portraitures of two Emperours ioining hands. He reedified the wall (as Ninnius the diſciple of Eluodugus writeth) between the moneths of Cluda and Carunus, fortifiing the ſame with ſeuen Caſtles, and built a round houſe of poliſhed ſtone vpon the banke of the Riuer Carun, which (ſome thinke) tooke name of him, erecting therewith a Triumphall Arch in remembrance of Victorie. (9) Conſtantius who had leuied an Armie, and was come with great ſpeed vnto Bulloigne in France, (a Towne that Carauſius had ſometime fortified and kept) hearing now of his death, determined the recouery of Britaine; and after great preparations, at length paſsing the Seas in a darke fogge or miſt, landed his men without impeachment: which done, hee fired his owne Ships, therby to fruſtrate all hopes of eſcape. Allectus, who had laien to intercept his comming, forſooke alſo the Seas, and meeting at vnawares with Aſclepiodotus, great Seneſchall of the Prætorium, as a deſperate man, haſted vpon his owne death: for encountring with him, hee neither ordered his Battle, nor marſhalled his men, but fought at randome very vnfortunately: for hauing put off his Purple Garment, he was among many other ſlaine, when hee had held his eſtate the terme of three yeeres.

Mamertinus Paneg. Orat.

Many Artificers in Britaine.

(11) But leauing Conſtantius to be further ſpoken of in his due place, let vs purſue the Raignes of theſe two Tyrants, who new began the Perſecutions of Gods Saints in all the parrs of the Empire, wherein the rage of Satan ſo preuailed, that ſeuenteene thouſand men and women were crowned with martyrdome, within the ſpace of one moneth, beſides infinite numbers of ſuch as were otherwiſe puniſhed.

Gildas. Damaſus. Sabellicus.

As in other Countries, ſo heere in Britaine the Chriſtians Churches were demoliſhed, their Bibles and other godly writings burned, and themſelues tormented with a more cruell and longer continuance then formerly had beene vſed: for this endured the terme of ten whole yeeres together, leauing no time of intermiſsion, nor place free from the ſtaine of Martyrs Bloud.

Euſebius. Beda. Rad. de Diceto.

The Chriſtians torments for ten yeeres together.

And amongſt others, it made Britaine to be honored with the glory of many holy Martyrs, which conſtantly ſtood and died in the Confeſsion of the Faith; whereof the firſt is reported to bee Albane of the City Verolanium, who was beheaded at Holmehurſt (ſince called Derſwold) where now the Towne of S. Albans (bearing his name) is built, and in whoſe honour, Offa the great King of Mercia founded a moſt magnificent Monaſterie. Of this Alban the ancient Fortunatus Priſcus in his booke of the Praiſe of Virginitie, maketh mention thus:

Beda hiſt. Angl. lib. 1. cap. 7.

Albanum egregium fœcunda Britannia profert:
Britaine fertill of all good,
Waſht with glorious Albans blood.

S. Albane put to death at Saint Albans.

(12) His Inſtructor Amphibolus afterwards apprehended, was brought to the ſame place, and whipped about a ſtake, whereat his intrailes were tied: ſo winding his bowels out of his body, was laſtly ſtoned to death. Sundry others alſo in other places laid downe their liues for their Profeſsions ſake, as Iulius and Aaron at Leiceſter, ſaith Beda, or rather at Caer-leon in Monmouth-ſhire, as our Grand-Antiquarie iudgeth: and in Leichfeild ſo many, that the place became another Golgotha, A Field of dead Corps. For which cauſe the Citie doth beare an Eſcocheon or Field charged with many Martyrs, for their Seale of Armes euen vnto this day.

(13) This laſt rage is by Oroſius and Beda accounted the Tenth Perſecution from Nero; and by others, the Tenth Horne of the Imperiall Beaſt, who had receiued his Power from the Dragon (the diuel) and Forme from thoſe foure Beaſts deciphered by the Prophet Daniel, whoſe mouth was as the Lyons mouth of Aſſhur, his feete like the Beares feete of Perſia, his ſpots as the Leopards of Greece; and theſe ten hornes taken from the Monſter of the Grecians parted kingdome, the Seleucies and the Ptolemies, called in Ezekiel, Gog and Magog, and here alluded vnto by S. Iohn, that thus made battel againſt the Saints. But as thoſe foure Beaſts periſhed and were cruſhed by the fall of The ſtone cut without hands, Emmanuel borne in our fleſh: ſo this Beaſt compounded of them Foure, fell in the deſtructions of theſe moſt wicked Emperors, whereof all almoſt died ſo vntimely and vnuſuall deaths, as the like is not read of elſewhere.

The violent deaths of many Emperors.

(14) For ſome ſlew themſelues, as Nero and Otho did; ſome were ſmothered to death, as was Tiberius; ſome poiſoned by their wiues, as Claudius and Commodus; ſome tugged and torne in pieces by their own Subiects and Souldiers, as Vitellius, Heliogabalus, Pupienus, and Balbinus; ſome ſtabbed by them whom they moſt truſted, as Caligula, Domitian, Didius, Gallienus, and many others; ſome tumultuouſly murthered, as Pertinax Seuerus, Maximius, Æmilius, and Probus were; ſome ſlaine in battell and defence of their titles, as Macrinus and Gallus; ſome hanged themſelues, as Gordianus and Maximianus did; ſome drowned and ſwallowed vp, as Decius and Maxentius were; ſome ſlaine by a thunderbolt from heauen, as Carus was; ſome died in moſt miſerable captiuitie, as Valerianus did, whoſe skinne was fleaed off, he yet aliue; ſome cut their owne veines and bled to death, as Quintilius and Florianus did; ſome dying mad, as did this our Diocleſian; ſome few, and them ſomewhat fauoring Chriſtians, died in their beds, a thing moſt ſtrange to ſee in theſe times, wherein the Wrath of God thus fought againſt them in his Iuſtice, and the power of his Goſpell preached by his Apoſtles and Diſciples, that as a Conqueror crowned, and riding vpon a White horſe, bare a Bow in his hand, and ſhot the ſharpe Arrowes of death into the hearts of theſe the Kings enemies, as in the opening of the Firſt Seale is ſeene; and in the Second is deſcribed and made manifeſt by a Red Horſe prepared for Battell, whoſe Rider bare a Bright ſword, and had commiſsion To take peace from the earth; which moſt effectually wee haue ſeene performed in moſt of theſe preceding Emperours. And as Famine in great Warres is not greatly ſtrange; ſo Scarſitie exceeding Plentie, was ſeene vnder the opening of the Third Seale; whence a Blacke horſe ſent from God, paſed through the earth, whoſe Rider bare a Ballance to weigh Corne, as it were Spice, for dearth: and in the raigne of this laſt Tyrant Diocleſian, they that had Eagles eies might ſee the threefold iudgements of God in the opening of the Fourth Seale, when Sword, Famine, & Death went all together as a pale-horſe, ſent from the preſence of the Lamb, whoſe rider was Death and Hell, following as his Page. Theſe were the times of calamities, whē as the Soules of the righteous in the opening of the Fifth Seale, cried for vengeance for the bloud of the Martyrs, whom theſe ten hornes had gored to death: and vnder the Sixth Seale, both then, and for euer the wicked are ſaid to call for the Mountaines to fall vpon them, and for the rockes to hide them from the preſence of Him that ſate vpon the Throne, and from the wrath of the Lambe, before whom none could ſtand.

But why doe I (weake man) thus open the Curtaines of Gods moſt ſacred Tabernacle, to behold the Mercy-ſeate of his diuine Myſteries in the accompliſhments of theſe holy Oracles, when as they who haue worne the Ephod, and in whoſe hand Aarons Rod hath Budded, with a religious reuerence haue feared to look into the ſame? Therefore with the charge of Ioſhua I will not approach neere the Arke, and with Iobs hearers will Lay my hand on my mouth, and returne to the proſecution of my purpoſe.

Exod.39. Numb.17. Ioſh.3.4. Iob 29.9.

(15) It was the nineteenth yeere of his raigne, in the month of March, when this Tyrant ſent forth his wicked Edicts through all his Empire; That all churches ſhould bee vtterly ouerthrowne; that the Scriptures ſhould be burnt; that all Chriſtians for honour ſhould bee held infamous, and all Chriſtian ſeruants ſhould bee vncapeable of freedome; that all Paſtors ſhould be enforced to offer to Idols, &c.

Euſeb.eccleſ.hiſt. lib.8.cap.1.2.

(16) The fountaine & chiefe cauſe of theſe miſeries lighting on the Church of Chriſt, did ariſe from the Chriſtians themſelues, as Euſebius in theſe words declareth: After that our conuerſation through too much libertie and licentiouſneſſe was degenerated, and holy diſcipline corrupted, whiles euery one of vs did enuie, bite, and backbite each other, waging inteſtine warres within our ſelues, and piercing one anothers hearts with the ſharpe ſpeares of opprobrious words; ſo that Biſhops againſt Biſhops, and people againſt people were at bitter contention. Laſtly, whiles nothing but hypocriſie was in the face, deceit in the heart, and guile in the tongue, whereby miſchiefe was euen full at the brimme, then began the heauy hand of God to viſit vs, &c. Where he proceedeth and ſheweth that the greeuous ſinnes of the Chriſtians, was the cauſe of drawing downe theſe iudgements on their heads.

Euſeb.hiſt.eccleſ. lib.8.cap.1.

(17) And ſo this wicked Tyrant accordingly was but as Gods Inſtrument and Iron-threſhing-flaile, to bruiſe the precious wheat and ſeed of the Goſpell, and to cruſh that outward glory of the Chriſtian profeſsion, which then was flouriſhing in moſt parts of the world.

Amos 1.3.

(18) But long the Lord deferred not their releaſe nor that Tyrants end. For after the Firſt yeere of their perſecutions, and twentith of his Raigne, the thirteenth day of Aprill, in the yeere of Chriſts Natiuitie three hundred and three, hee with his Fellow Emperor (both of them by the reuenging hand of God, ſtricken with a mad humor (ſaith Euſebius) renounced the Empire, and deſcending from the Tribunall put off their Purple and Imperiall robes, whereby they againe became Priuat men.

Euſeb.eccleſ.hiſt. lib.8.cap.13.

(19) Diocleſian retired into Dalmatia, where in the Citie Salonia, hee poiſoned himſelfe, as Aurelius Victor affirmeth: and Euſebius ſaith, that no ſmall diſeaſe ouertooke him, for that hee died mad. His conſort Maximianus eſcaped not vnpuniſhed, but died for attempting the Murther of Conſtantius, and as Euſebius auoucheth, hee hanged himſelfe in the citie Marſillis: ſuch ignominious deaths followed theſe two perſecuting Tyrants, whereof Diocleſian had formerly made himſelfe a God, and by an Edict commanded his Foote to bee kiſſed: a practiſe pretily ſince imitated by his Succeſſors, who haue reuiued the wounded Head of the Beaſt, and haue trod his ſteppes in wounding and perſecuting the true members of Chriſt.

Chapter XLV.

Constantius, Chlorus, Emp.

G. Val. Maximianus, Emp.

Diocleſian and Maximianus reſigned vp the Empire the 9. Cal. of May, in the yeere of Chriſt 304.

Galerius and Conſtantius Empe-rors.

The Chriſtians inioy peace.

Diocleſian and Maximianus reſigning vp their Soueraignties (as is ſaid) at the Citie Nicomedia in Bithynia, cõmitted the charge thereof, and the defence of the Common-weale vnto Gallerius and Conſtantius, who had been their Cæſars: vpon which occaſion, great peace followed in the Church of Chriſt, and moſt eſpecially vnto theſe Weſterne Prouinces. For thoſe Emperors confirmed by the Senate, preſently diuided the Empire betwixt them, as two Seuerall Eſtates, and not ſubiect to one Gouernment, as formerly had been exerciſed; which (as Euſebius hath noted) was the fatall end of the Imperiall Glory.

(2) Vnto Gallerius fell the gouernment of Sclauonia, Macedonia, Thracia, Egypt, and the Prouinces in Aſia, who tooke for eaſe of that burden theſe two, whoſe Coines we haue here expreſſed.

Maximinus and Severus made Cæſars.

(2) C. Galerius, Valer. Maximinus, and Aurel. Valer. Seuerus his ſiſters ſonnes, whom in the yeere of Chriſt three hundred and ſix, hee elected Cæſars, and after Auguſti; which honours the laſt enioied not long, for he was ſlaine at Rome by the treachery of Maxentius, after one yeere. And the other, when he had foure yeeres gouerned as Cæſar, and three as Auguſtus in the Eaſt, died at Tharſis in Cilicia.

(3) And to the lot of Conſtantius, who much at one time with his Copartner, elected his ſonne Conſtantine, (ſo famous in chriſtian hiſtorie) Cæſar, fell Italy, France, Britannie, Spaine, Germany, and moſt of the Prouinces in Africke: which ſeeming to him (who rather choſe to gouerne well then much) too ſpatious, gaue vp to Gallerius all that in Africke, as too remote from the Seat of his reſidence, and eie of his direction.

Conſtantine the Great elected Cæſar.

(4) This good Emperor was for his Palenеſſe ſurnamed Chlorus, by birth a Roman, his Father named Eutropius, his Mother Claudia, Neece to the Emperor Claudius. Himſelfe had attained the dignitie of a Senator, and was both Wiſe, Valiant, Noble, and Vertuous; whoſe parts Euſebius doth thus commend.

Conſtantius was a man of ſingular clemencie towards men, and pietie towards God. He did not partake with him in crueltie, whoſe partaker he was in Soueraignтie: neither ſtaining his Raigne with the bloud of the Saints, nor deſtroying our Churches and places of Praier, as Maximianus furiouſly did; but rather he reuerenced and highly honoured thoſe who truly honoured God. For which God ſo bleſſed him, that this godly Father left a more godly Sonne Conſtantine, the Heire of his well-gotten Empire.

Euſeb. eccleſ. hiſt. lib. 8. cap. 16.

(5) To which his vertues, other Authors adde, that he was of great affabilitie, louing, and gentle, little regarding his Priuate Profit, but altogether raigning to inrich his Subiects, and to that end would often ſay; That it was more behouefull for the Weale publike, that the wealth of the Land ſhould bee diſperſed into the commons hands, then to lie locked vp in Princes coffers. In which kind, ſo auerſe he was from all ſuperfluities, that hee may be adiudged faulty the other way: for vpon Feaſtiuall daies, and in his Entertainments of Strangers, he was faine to borrow Plate of his friends (for ſuch many times are richer then their Soueraignes) to furniſh his Table and Cupbords.

Pomp. Lætus.

(6) But aboue all other vertues, was his louing countenance countenance and protection to the late persecuted Christians, making his Court their Sanctuarie, and his Chapell their Oratorie. And to winnow the Chaffe from the Wheat, he vsed the like policie as Iehu King of Israel sometime had done against the Priests of Baal. For he commanded all his Officers to offer sacrifice to the Idoll-Gods, pretending to dis-court all such as refused: but contrariwise those that obeied hee put from him, with this reproofe, that hee who is disloyall to his God, will neuer be true nor trustie to his Prince.

2. Kin. 10. 20.

Constantius policie to trie who were true Christians.

(7) When he was first made Cæsar, he was forced to forsake his first wife Helena, by whom hee had his vertuous sonne Constantine, and to take Theodora daughter in Law to Maximianus, for a further confirmation of friendship.

Constantius his wiues.

(8) Helena by birth was a Britaine, the daughter of Cælus a British Prince, as saith Eutropius, though Nicephorus make her of Bithynia, and Beda tearmes her his Concubine, some an Inne-holder, and others for her person and parentage stand very doubtfull: to meet with whom, let vs heare the censure of Times Chiefe Secretarie, the learned Cambden in his Britannia: Constantius (saith hee) what time hee serued in Britaine vnder Aurelian, tooke to wife Helena daughter of Cœlus or Cœlius a British Prince, on whom he begat that noble Constantine the Great in Britaine; for so (together with that great Historiographer Baronius) the common opinion of all other Writers with one consent beare witnesse, vnlesse it bee one or two petty Greeke Authors of late time, and those dissenting one from the other; and a very learned man, grounding vpon a corrupt place of Iul. Firmicus. Howbeit, compelled he was by Maximianus to put her away, for to marry Theodora his daughter. This is that Helena which in Antique Inscriptions is called VENERABILIS and PIISSIMA AVGVSTA, and for Christian Pietie, for cleansing Ierusalem of Idols, for building a goodly Church in the place where our Lord suffred, and for finding the sauing Crosse, is so highly commended of Ecclesiasticall Writers.

And yet both Iewes and Gentiles termed her by way of ignominie and reproch, Stabularia, because shee (a most godly Princesse) sought out the Cribbe or Manger where Christ was borne: and in that place where stood that Hostelry, founded a Church; for which cause she was by the Enemies of Christian Religion called an Hostesse, and (because such are commonly kind to their Guests) a Concubine also. For whose defense, let the Funerall Oration of Ambrose, made vpon the death of Theodosius, answer, wherein hee doth rather commend her humilitie, then affirme any such base Offices in contempt of her person.

A Church builded by Helena in the place where our Sauiour suffred.

They say that this Lady was at first an Inne-holder or Hostesse, &c. Well (saith he) this good Hostesse Helena hasted to Ierusalem, and sought out the place of our Lords Passion, and made diligent search for the Lords Cribbe. This good Hostesse was not ignorant of that Guest which cured the way-faring mans hurts, that was wounded by Theeues. This good Hostesse chose to be reputed a Stable-sweeper, that she might thereby gaine Christ.

Helena buildeth another Church where the Inne stood in which our Sauiour was laid in a Cratch.

Ambrose his Oration vpon Theodosius.

And verily she was the mouer and only worker of her husbands conuersion, who casting off all superstitious worships, willingly acknowledged the onely all-ruling God, suffering the Christians that had beene hidde in Caues and Dennes, now to exercise their Deuotions publikely, and both to reedifie the old ruinate Churches, and to erect new.

(9) Of the like Pietie wee reade in a Queene of the like name, Helena, Queene of Adiabena (commended by Iosephus) that was a Conuert to the Iewish Religion, who comming to Ierusalem to visit the Temple in time of a greeuous Famine, which happened in the daies of Claudius, sent to Alexandria for great quantity of Corne, and for Dried Figges from Cyprus, which shee very charitably bestowed vpon the poore. And about three stades or furlongs off from Ierusalem, built a Sepulcher with three Pyramides, wherein her selfe and her two sonnes (both Kings) were afterwards interred. But to proceed.

(10) Constantius being heere in Britaine, and lately returned from his Expedition made against the Caledonians and Picts, fell sicke in the City of Yorke, where the Imperiall Throne of his residence was set. At which very time, Constantine his sonne escaping the hands of Gallerius, (with whom hee had beene left hostage) hasted from Rome, hauing belaid all the way with Post-horses for the purpose, and left them houghed for feare of pursuit, came with all speed to Yorke, and to his fathers presence; who so much ioied at his sight, that he sate himselfe vpright vpon his Bed, and in the presence of his Counsellors spake as followeth:

His preuenting pursuit.

He commeth safe to Yorke to his father.

(11) "It now sufficeth, and death is not fear-
"full, seeing I shall leaue my vnaccomplished actions
"to be performed in thee my Sonne, in whose person
"I doubt not but that my Memoriall shalbe retained,
"as in a Monument of succeeding fame. What I had "intended, but by this my fatall period left vndone,
"see thou performe: let those fruits bee ripened in "thee the Branch, that I thy Stocke from a vertuous
"intent haue had ingraffed alwaies in me: that is, go-
"uerne thy Empire with an vpright Iustice; protect "the Innocent from the Tyrannie of Oppressours; and
"wipe away all teares from the eies of the Christians;
"for therein, aboue all other things, I haue accoun"ted my selfe the most happy. To thee therefore I
"leaue my Diademe, and their Defense, taking my

"euerlasting obliuion: but leauing my Vertues (if e-
"uer I had any) to reuiue and liue in thee. With conclusion of which vertuous counsell, hee tooke his last farewell of his sonne, his friends, and his life, after he had sate Cæsar sixteene yeeres, and Emperour two, as Eusebius accounteth, and died the fiue and twentieth day of Iuly, the yeere of our Sauiour three hundred and six, and of his owne age fifty six.

CHAPTER XLVI.

Val. Constant. Emp.

Licin. Licinianus Emp.

An. Do. 306.

THE Father thus departing both gloriously and peaceably, in the presence of his Son and sage counsellers, the griefe in the losse of the Sire was no greater then was the ioy conceiued that they had gained the sonne for his Successour, all men reioicing at the good fortune of that iourney, wherein hee came to close the eies of his dying father, and to comfort the sorrow of his mournefull Countrey-men. For forthwith heere in Britaine by acclamation of the people, assistance of the Souldiers, and aduice of Erocus King of the Almans (who by the way had accompanied him hither in his flight from Rome) they proclaimed him at all hands Emperour, and Successour to all that part of the world which his father held. This election was ioifully ratified by the Senate, and of all other Prouinces so gladly accepted, that they accounted this Iland most happie of all other, whose chance was first to see him their Cæsar, as in these words of the Panegyrist is seene: O fortunate Britaine, and more happie then all other Lands, that hast the first sight of Constantine Cæsar.

Euseb. Eccl. Hist. lib. 8. cap. 14.

Socrat. Eccl. lib. 1. cap. 2.

Panegyricke Oration vnto Constantine the great.

(2) His birth (as is said) was in Britaine, and honourably descended, his father a Roman Senatour, Cæsar, and Emperor; his mother a Britaine, (daughter to Cælus) a Princesse vertuous, wise, chaste, and religious: himselfe in true Pietie degenerating from neither. At his first entrance he pursued the reliques of the warre which his father had begunne against the Caledonians, and other Picts, subduing the Britains that were more remote, and Inhabitants of those Ilands that are witnesses (saith one) of the Sunnes set or going downe Eutropius. Constantines descent.

Euseb. in vita Constantini.

(3) Maxentius the sonne of Maximianus Herculius, who at the death of Constantius was proclaimed Augustus by the tumultuous Prætorian Souldiers at Rome, and Romulus his sonne (whose face wee haue heere with his fathers from both their monies expressed) was created his Cæsar (the way to that Seat of Maiestie whereunto hee had too hastily and most vnduly climed) for now this Vsurper by his Necromancies, Adulteries, Persecutions, and Murders, was growne so vntolerable and odious, that the Senate sent to Constantine, crauing his aid and redresse; who sore lamenting the sores of the Empire, and the case of the Christians, first wrote: but that taking no effect, prepared his forces against Maxentius.

Sabellicus.

Maximianus the father, either in true zeale or fained pretence, (which by the sequell is more probable) tooke great offense at his sonne Maxentius vnsufferable outragiousnesse; and vnder colour of dislikes and redresse, repaired to his sonne in Law Constantine, whose daughter Fausta hee had maried, and notwithstanding his faire pretences before the face of Constantine, yet secretly he tampered with Fausta to make away her husband. But the good Lady well knowing that the bond of a childe is great, but greater the loue of a wife, reuealed his treacherie to Constantine, who caused him therupon to be put to death, a fit end for so bloudy a Tyrant. And ripe was the like destiny for his no-way-degenerating sonne, against whom hee prepared his forces: and drawing Licinius Gouernour of Sclauonia, who was made Cæsar, to his side, by giuing him his sister Constantia to wife, (a man but of an ordinarie descent, though Gallienus Maximinus had made him in Illyrica his Copartner in the East) hasted towards Rome with an Host of ninety thousand foot, and eight thousand horse; leuied out of Britaine, France, and Germanie.

Maximianus put to death by Constantine.

(4) But knowing well that successe in warre dependeth more in diuine assistance then humane strength, yet doubtfull what God hee should in this blessed enterprise inuocate for aid, (for as yet he was not fully setled in the Christian Faith, though the Gods of the Gentiles he obserued altogether deceitfull) cast vp in this his holy meditation his eies Eastward to heauen, and had by diuine ordinance presented to him in obiect the signe of a Crosse, wherein were Starres (as letters) so placed, that visiblie might bee read this sentence in Greeke, IN HOC VINCE, as diuers Authors report.

Yet are there some frō the testimony of Eusebius himselfe, vnto whom this blessed man did declare his Vision, that affirme this forme being the first Greeke Characters of the name of Christ, (to which the reuerse of Decentius hereafter expressed, as of many others, may adde much probabilitie) rather then either of these, although Tertullian and S. Ierome affirme, that the latter was the very figure of the Crosse whereon our Sauiour died: but this as a question beyond my iudgement or intention, I leaue to those learned Diuines and others, who haue laboured in that subiect with curious search.

(5) This miraculous signe promising Victory, and that (saith Eusebius) not in an Inscription only, but by voice of Angels, was so comfortable to Constantine, that with great courage he went forward, bearing before him and his victorious Army, in place of the Imperiall Standard, the forme of this vision imbrodered with gold and stones of greatest price. And as one armed from heauen, proceeded against his hellish aduersarie.

Maxentius as much depending vpon his Sorcerers, was no lesse assured of the victory. In furtherance whereof, as a stratagem of warre, hee framed a deceitfull Bridge ouer the riuer Tyber, neere to Pons Miluius, to intrap Constantine: but ioyning battell, and ouerlaid with strokes, retired and fled, and (whether for haste, or through forgetfulnesse) tooke ouer the same Bridge, which suddenly failing vnder him, hee was with many more drowned, and Constantine remained Victor. In memory whereof, hee caused a triumphall Arch to be erected in the midst of Rome, wherein his Statue was imbossed, holding in his Right hand a Crosse; according to the fashion of that which hee had seene in the heauens: and vpon ancient inscription in memory of this Victory, this we finde engrauen: INSTINCTV DIVINITATIS, MENTIS MAGNITVDINE CVM EXERCITV SVO, TAM DE TYRANNO QVAM DE OMNI EIVS FACTIONE, VNO TEMPORE IVSTIS REMP. VLTVS EST ARMIS. Thus: By instinct of the diuine power, with great magnanimitie and helpe of his armie in a lawfull warre, he reuenged the cause of the common wealth, as well on the Tyrant himselfe, as on his whole faction all at once. With the like successe had he warred against the Frankners in Batauia, whose Victorie was likewise stamped in gold, wherein is a Woman sitting vnder a Trophey, and leaning her head vpon a Crosse-bowe, with this inscription, FRANCIA.

(6) But as his fame increased in the mindes of most, so was it as much maligned by Licinius his fellow Emperour and Brother in Law; who in his heart neuer fauoured the Christians, howsoeuer for a time outwardly hee suffered their Religion: but at last, seeking occasions against Constantine, hee raised a cruell Persecution in the East, where he raigned with Martinianus, whom at Byzantium, and Iulius Licinius Licinianus at Arlas, he had before made Cæsars: permitting thē to stampe these monies as marks of Soueraigntie.

(7) By this affliction of Gods Church, he inforced this Champion of God for their defence to prepare his forces, with which hee met Licinius in Hungarie, where he gaue him a great ouerthrow. But hee escaping to Byzantium in Asia, the lesse, ioyned againe battell, and was there taken Prisoner: yet by the mediation of his wife Constantia, had his life spared, and was confined within the citie Nicomedia; where for his treasons afterwards, he and his sonne Licinianus, that somewhat suruiued him, were put to death. And now the peace of Gods Saints manifestlie appeared, and the progresse of the Gospell passed vntroubled.

Licinius put to death at Nicomedia, and his sonne after, Anno 326.

(8) For now (saith our Gyldas) no sooner was the blasting tempest and storme of Persecution blowne ouer, but the faithfull Christians, who in time of trouble and danger, had hidden themselues in woods and deserts, and in secret caues, being come abroad to open sight, reedified the Churches ruinated to the very ground. The Temples of holie Martyrs they founded, and erected (as it were) the Banners of victory in euery place, celebrating festiuall holy daies, and with pure hearts and mouthes performing the sacred ceremonies: for the which blessednesse, he euer after had the Attributes ascribed vnto him of most blessed Emperour, most pious, happy Redeemer of Romes Citie, Founder of Peace, Restorer of Rome, and of the whole World, most great, inuincible Augustus, Sacred, Diuine, and of sacred memory, &c. Howbeit, for admitting these praises, as it should seeme, he is taxed by Eutropius and Victor of pride; as also crueltie for putting to death Crispus his sonne (by Mineruina his concubine, whom hee had made Cæsar, and permitted to stampe these monies here vnder inserted) as likewise his wife Fausta, sister to Maxentius: but others affirme that the causes of their deaths were iust, though (as Paulus Orosius saith) the reason thereof was kept secret, and Zosimus doth therein excuse him as Cassiodore relateth, and so doth Rufinus and Eusebius.

(9) Touching Constantius affaires in this Iland, it appeareth by the last Author, that after his Fathers death, and his owne departure out of this Country, some aspiring mind taking aduantage of his absence, in other warres, perswaded the people here to withdraw their obedience. Whereupon once againe he addressed himselfe with his Armie to the reestablishing of the Ilands subiection: and passing (saith Eusebius) ouer into Britaine, inclosed on euery side within the banks of the Ocean, he conquered the same. The ioyfull memory of this expedition is registred to posteritie vpon his Coine set in the entrance of this Chapter, inscribed Aduentus Augusti, and by these Letters, P. L. N. the place of the Mint to be at London.

Eusebius.

(10) After this (saith the same Author) he began to compasse in his mind other parts of the World, to the end hee might come in time to succour those that wanted helpe: and when he had furnished his Armie with milde and modest instructions of Pietie, hee inuaded Britaine, that hee might likewise instruct those that dwell inuironed round about with the waues of the Ocean: bounding the Suns setting as it were with those coasts. And of the Politicall gouernment therein by him altered, let it not seeme offensiue that I, who know and professe mine owne weake sight in most of these matters, doe light my dimme candle, at the Bright-shining Lampe of that Illustrious Antiquarie, who saith:

Cambden in his Britannia.

(11) About this time (saith he) as euidently appeareth by the Code of Theodosius, Pacatianus was the Vicegerent of Britaine: for by this time the Prouince had no more Propretors, nor Lieutenants, but in stead thereof, was a Vicegerent substituted. And againe, Seeing that Constantius altered the forme of the Roman Gouernment, it shall not be impertinent to note summarily in what sort Britaine was ruled vnder him; and in the next succeeding ages.

He ordained foure Præfects of the Pretorian, to wit, of the East, of Illyricum, of Italy, and of Gaule: two Leaders or Commanders of the forces, the one of footemen, the other of horsemen in the West, whom they tearmed Præsentales. For ciuill gouernment there ruled Britaine, the Præfect of the Pretorium or Grand Seneschall in Gaule, and vnder him the Vicar Generall of Britaine, who was his Vicegerent, and honoured with the title, Spectabilis; that is, notable or remarkable: him obeied respectiuely to the number of the Prouinces two Consular deputies, and three Presidents; who had the hearing of ciuill and criminall causes.

For military affaires, there ruled the Leader or Commander

mander of the footemen in the West, at whose disposition were the Earles or Lieutenants of Britaine, the Earle, Count, or Lieutenant of the Saxon coast along Britaine; and he Duke of Britaine, stiled euery one Spectabilis.

The Earle Lieutenant of Britaine seemeth to haue ruled the Inland parts of the Iland, who had with him seuen companies of footmen, and nine coronets or troopes of horse.

Amianus Marcill.

The Earle Lieutenant of the Saxon coast, who defended the Maritime parts against the Saxons, and is named by Amianus Lieutenant of the Maritime tract, for defence of the Sea coast, had seuen companies of footmen, two Guidons of horsemen, the second legion, and one cohort.

The Duke or Generall of Britaine, who defended the Marches against the Barbarians, had the command of thirty and eight garrison forts, wherein their Stations kept, consisting of fourteen thousand foot, & nine hundred horse.

Nineteene thousand foote and seuenteene hundred horsemen maintained in ordinary in Britaine.

So that in those daies (by Pancirolus account) Britaine maintained nineteene thousand, two hundred footmen, and seuenteene hundred horsemen, or thereabout in ordinary.

Besides all these, the receiuer of the Emperors Finances or publike reuenewes: the Pronost of the Emperors Treasures in Britaine, and the Procurator of the Draperie in Britaine; in the which the clothes of the Prince and Souldiers were Wouen: and the Count also of priuate reuenewes had his Rationall or Auditor of priuat State in Britaine: to say nothing of the sword-fence-schoole Procurator in Britaine (whereof an old inscription maketh mention) and of other officers of inferior degrees.

(12) After the setling of these affaires, to the end that he might with the more facilitie bridle the vntamed Persians that seldome were in quiet, he remoued the Imperiall seat of his Residence into the East, for now Gallerius and Licinius both dead, the rent and diuided state of the Roman Empire was in him vnited: and purposing to build there a Citie, as an eternall Monument of his name, he chose the plot at Chalcedon in Asia: but whiles they were measuring out the circuit, an Eagle scouping at the Line, fled with it ouer the Sea towards Byzantium in Thracia, to which place (the thing seeming ominous) he transferred his new foundation, and there built a most Magnificent Citie, naming it New Rome) as appeareth by an inscription of his Statue). In imitation whereof, he circulated Seuen hils with a Wall for Height, Thicknesse, and Beauty, the fairest in the world: and not only erected Temples, Towers, and most stately Palaces himselfe, but by his publike Edicts, cõmanded all the Princes of the Empire to raise therein some Monuments & memorable Edifices, beseeming the Maiesty of so glorious a foundatiõ.

Sabellicus.

A Iewish Doctor thus described this Citie, in an epistle which himselfe deliuered to our English Ambassador, remaining in Constantinople in Anno 1594.

(13) Hither also from Rome hee caused to bee brought many renowned Monuments of Antiquities, as the famous Goddesse Pallas of old Troy, the Image of Apollo in brasse of an vnmeasurable bignesse; the Statues of Iuno, Minerua, Venus, and the like: whereupon Hierome saith; That Constantine to inrich this one Citie, impouerished all others in the Empire: and other Writers which saw it in the perfectiõ of beauty, report it to be rather an habitation for the Gods, thẽ the dwelling place for Earthly men. Herein also (so studious was he of good Arts) was built the Proud Palace of that Publike Library, wherein were contained one hundred twenty thousand of the chiefest Written Bookes, and in the midst thereof were the Guts of a Dragon, in length one hundred twenty Foote, on which was admirably written in Letters of Gold, the Iliads of Homer. The New Name of this new Citie lasted not long; for the affection of all men to the Founder, afforded it rather the name of Constantinople. As a trophey then of this Emperours renowne, though now a brand of infamie to another of that name, who lost it in the yeere 1452. to Mahomet the Turke: and as New Rome was reared and ruined in one name, so had Old Rome in Augustus her pitch of height, and in Augustulus her period.

Constantinople built by Constantine.

(14) He drew likewise hither those Legions that lay for defence of the Prouinces, as well in Germany and Gallia, as in Britaine: from whence hee brought (saith Malmesbury) a great power of British Souldiers, through whose industry and forward seruice, hauing obtained Triumphant Victories to his hearts desire, and attained to the Empire: such of them as were past seruice, and had performed the painefull parts of Souldiers their full time, he planted in a certain part of Gaule Westward, vpon the very shore of the Ocean: where at this day their posterity remaining, are wonderfully growen euen to a mightie people; in manners & language somewhat degenerate from our Britaines.

Wil. Malmsbury.

In which his doings, he laid open the Prouinces to the irruptions of their Enemies; and is therefore by Zosimus hardly censured, as being the onely man that by this meanes first subuerted the flourishing estate of the Empire. And indeed, by withdrawing his Forces out of Britaine, the Picts and other their wonted Enemies had the bolder and easier entrance into the more ciuill parts of this Iland; whereby ere long, being altogether abandoned of the Romans, it became a pray of Conquest to the Saxons, as shall be shewed in due place.

(15) But howsoeuer his policie failed (carried (as it seemeth) by a Diuine inspiration to leaue Rome) yet is this good Emperour much commended by all Writers for his many vertues, especially for that hee so laid the foundation of the Christians securitie, that the same hath stood vnder the protection of Princes euer since, euen vnto this day. And albeit that many Cæsars his successors, haue often attempted to shake it by their authorities, and the sharpe instruments of heretikes dangerously haue vndermined it, yet hath it borne out the Stormes of all their boisterous assaies, and stood in the strength that this Emperor first laid it.

Constantine the establisher of Christianity.

(16) And vpon this foundation, that a glorious building might be raised, hee congregated three hundred and eighteene Christian Bishops in the Citie Nice in Thracia, where himself was present, and also President of the same Councel (though now his Beadsmen (the Popes) put him & his Successors from that right) and as another Moses, he then pacified the contentions of the brethren, and reestablished the authorities of the Bishops for the godly gouernment of the Church in that Primitiue age.

(17) But as the cleerest Sunne hath his set, and the fairest day his night, so Constantines glorious life drew to an end, though his liuing-glory shall be endlesse: for intending a voyage against the Persians, hee fell grieuously sicke, and counselled by his Physitions to be carried vnto Nicomedia, a Citie in Bythinia, to the Hot Bathes that naturally there sprang (which caused some erroneously to write that he became a Leaper) he died on the way neere to the place, and in great deuotion commended his departing Soule to his Crucified Redeemer, Maij 22. the yeere of Christ Iesus three hundred thirty seuen, and of his happy victorious raigne thirty one, and of his age sixty fiue; whose body was interred at Constantinople, in the Church of the Apostles that himselfe had therein founded.

(18) Eusebius writing this good Emperors life, saith, that he deferred his Baptisme vntill his old age, in desire that he might receiue it in Iordayne, where our Sauiour himselfe was baptised. Yet others thinke that he was baptised with his Son Crispus, what time he created him his Cæsar: for the Celebration whereof, hee caused a most sumptuous Font to be made in Rome; which Platina & Sabellicus affirme to haue continued to their times. And the ingenuity of the same Sabellicus is much to be approued, in that speaking of Constantines Donation, which some so much vaunt of (though the vanity of that forgery is now laid open to the view of all by sundry learned men) he acknowledgeth (himselfe being a Romanist) that he findeth no mention of any such matter, in any of the ancient Records which he followed, and so leaueth it to the Patronage of those Craftsmen, out of whose forges it first was formed. He left to succeed him in the Empire as Augusti, (with distaste of the eldest) his three Sonnes, Constantine, Constantius, and Constance, whom before he had made Cæsars, & designed by Testamẽt, Delmatius, the son of Anniballinus, (his brother) Cæsar: and therefore we haue inserted his mony in ranke of those that succeeded this great & glorious Emperor.

An. Do. 337.

FOR the Empire being diuided among these Brethren, Constantinus the eldest, whose portion was Britaine, France, Spaine, and part of Germanie, tooke himselfe wronged in this partition; whereas Constans his second brother had Italie, Africa, Sclauonia, Dalmatia, and Greece; and Constantius the youngest possessed Thracia, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Egypt, Prouinces much greater in his sight, then his owne seemed to bee; and therefore at last ambitiously hee attempted to inlarge his vpon the Frontiers of his brother Constans, at that time in Dacia, and in warres against the Gothes, who there also inuaded his territories, but was met with and slaine by a Captaine of his brothers, neere to the Citie Aquileia in Italie, when he had held his Seigniories the terme of three yeeres.

(2) Hereupon Constans grew exceedingly proud, and seising his deceased brothers Prouinces, ioined them vnto his owne Possessions, and with his brother Constantius came into this Iland. This Battle, and their arriuall heere, by the words of Iulius Firmius, chanced in the winter season: for (saith hee, speaking to these Emperours) you haue subdued vnder your Oares the swelling and raging waues of the British Ocean, euen in the deepe of Winter; a thing hitherto neuer seene before. And the Britaines were sore afraid to behold the vnexpected face of their Emperour. This Constans was he that called a Councell to Sardica against the Arrians, whither were assembled three hundred Bishops, and among them, some of the British, as formerly we haue mentioned. But this Prince being youthfull, cast away all care of the Empire; and drowned in his owne pleasures, followed ill counsell, (the vsuall way to Princes ruines.) Olympias the Widow of this Constans was giuen to Arsaces King of Armenia, by Constantius his brother, to be a bond and purchase of his surer friendship, of which his need was much, as the times required: for after the death of Constance, Vetranio was proclaimed Emperour by the Pannonian Armie, though shortly disrobed, and sent to end his decrepit age in a priuate fortune. Nepohanus the nephew of Constans by his sister Eutropia, was at Rome by the abiect Rout saluted Augustus, which he enioied not much aboue twentie daies, being suppressed by Magnentius, who had now made the truncke of Maiestie, his Soueraignes bodie, the Basse, whereby he meant with Decentius and Desiderius, his two brethren, to ascend the Throne.

(3) Simon Dunelmensis saith, that Great Constantine at his departure from Britaine, left one Octauius to gouerne the Land, who shortly rebelled, and after diuers conflicts was slaine by Traherne, Commander of a Roman Legion. Galfridus makes the said Octauian a Britaine, and will haue him to raigne with great Victories ouer this Iland the space of fifty foure yeeres, which (as Fabian hath accounted) doth extend to the time of Valentinians Rule in Rome: so farre doe our British Historians differ from the Romans. But from them most certaine it is, that Magnentius before mentioned, a Britaine by his father, though borne among the Leti in France, inuested himselfe into the Imperiall Dignitie, vsurping France, Spaine, and Britaine, thus stamping the face of himselfe and his brother Decentius, by him made Caesar at Millan, vpon the currant Monies of such reuolted Prouinces as he vsurped.

(4) At this time the Generall of the Armie in Britaine was one Gracianus, the father of Valentinian the Emperour, by birth an Hungarian, and so strong of limme, that no fiue men could pull a rope out of his hand with all their force; whereof hee was surnamed Funarius, the Roper. This man giuing entertainment to Magnentius, was condemned in confiscation of all his goods by Constantius that now ruled sole Emperour, vnto whom also the Britaines submitted themselues, and whose Deputie after Gratianus was aged Martin, a man (no doubt) vertuous and vpright, as he witnessed by his death: for Constantius, whose base and distrustfull heart feared the wagging of euery leafe, by the slaughter of many guiltlesse, sought to make himselfe secure: and egged on by his Flatterers, (to serue their purposes) sent one Paulus a Notarie into Britaine, to apprehend them that had aided Magnentius.

(5) The said Notarie was a Spaniard of a pestilent wit and subtiltie, especially in finding out all quirkes and deuices to endanger mens estates: whose businesse being now to apprehend and bring away such Martiall men as had entred action in the foresaid conspiracies, he vnder that pretence drew into danger many that were guiltlesse, and the Emperours true Subiects: some of which hee imprisoned, others he tormented, and many with Manacles and Chaines so bruised, that therefore he was called Catena. Old Martine the Deputie, much lamenting their miseries, besought the Spaniard to surcease, and not with the Offenders thus to punish the Innocent; wherat the proud Catch-pole so much disdained, that hee threatned and sought to bring Martin before the Counsell, and that in bands in manner of a Traitor; which so much incensed the aged man, that with his dagger he assailed him; but perceiuing the wound he gaue was not deadly, he stabd the same into his owne side, and thereof presently died: vnfortunate in this fact, but otherwise a most righteous man (saith Amianus) that thus attempted to ease the wrongs of these oppressed Britaines.

(6) But besides these their distresses, the outrodes of the Scots and Picts breaking into the Marches of the Britaines, sore molested their peace: for redresse whereof, Iulian the Cæsar wintring at Paris, and distracted into sundry thoughts, was afraid in person to passe those Seas himselfe, and to leaue Gaule without a Ruler, especially at such a time, when the Almans had stirred vp a most cruell warre: wherefore hee sent Lupicinus at that time Colonell of the Infanterie, and Master of the Armorie, to withstand their furie; a warlike man certes, and skilfull in feats of Armes, but withall proud of heart and countenance, looking high, and speaking bigge, and in gesture demeaning himselfe in his charge as an Actor vpon a Stage, and otherwise so qualified, that men doubted a long time whether he were more Couetous or Cruell. He from * Bononia imbarked all his men, and with a good gale arriued in the Hauen * Rutupi, marching in all haste to * Lundinium, that from thence, after aduice taken, according to the qualitie of the businesse, hee might make more haste to come into the field, and giue battle. But he, designed to gouerne the East, and make good those Frontiers against the Persians, forgot the duty of his charge, and gaue himselfe vp at Antioch to all licentious lusts and cruelties: of which when Constantius (infected afore with some icalousie of his ambition) was informed, he so plotted, that this lost man, drowned in his owne vicious securitie, was surprised, and with his hands bound backward (like a Felon) giuen vp to the common Headsman for execution. His brother Iulianus was then made Cæsar, and this Emperours other sister Helena bestowed vpon him, whose Victories against the Germans and Gaules gained him such applause, that he was against his will by the Souldiers elected Augustus, and made Consort with Constantius in Power Imperiall.

(8) Whose fortunes thus sticking in a tumultuous State (for, with others, Nigrinianus (whose consecrated memorie is left to posteritie vpon this money) attempted the disquiet of this Emperour, by an ambitious affection of rule, that was both short and fatall to him) did plainely foreshew, that neither his Raigne nor life would last long.

For besides the affections of the time that then followed that new risen Starre Iulian, his nightly visions and imagined apparitions did both terrifie and appal his mind; for as he thought, his fathers Ghost presented vnto him, a Babe of an ingenious countenance, which strooke the Ball (that the Romans call Tufa, a Globe borne only by a Monarch) out of his right hand, betokening nought else but a change of State. Whereupon warres prepared, Constantius set forward to encounter him, and comming to Tharsus, from Antioch in Syria, fell there sicke of a feuer, which still increased as he further trauelled, and in the borders of Cilicia, at the place called Mopsus Wels, situated at the foote of Mount Taurus, died the third day of Nouember, the yeere of Christ by Ieromes account, three hundred sixtie foure: by others, three hundred sixtie one; when hee had ruled twenty foure yeeres, and liued fortie and a few moneths, as Amianus Marcellinus, and *Pomp. But Socrates and Zosimus say, that he liued forty fiue yeeres, and raigned thirtie eight, that is, thirteen a Cæsar, in the life of his Father, seuen a Competitor in the liues of his brethren, and seuenteene yeeres Emperor alone.

Hee is neither accounted with the best, nor worst Emperors, his Vertues seeming to hold scoale with his Vices: temperate, courteous, liberall, and affable; not elequent, yet desirous to speake well; blunt witted, yet a great fauorer of learning; a most skilfull Archer, and apt to take paines; but withall very suspitious; led by Flatterers, and most cruell to the accused, and in exacting importable Tributes, drew more hatred vpon his head then mony into his coffers. But especially is he stained with the heresie of the Arrians, for whose sake he banished many of the Christians, and amongst them Athanasius, that excellent light of the Catholike Church. In fauour of those Heretikes, he caused to be summoned foure hundred westerne Bishops vnto the Councell of Ariminum, whereof three are reported to come out of Britaine. And he is by Amianus his Life-writer, condemned for mingling fooliſh doting superstitions, with the sincere doctrine of the Christian Religion, giuen rather to a more intricate search therein, then to settle his opinions vpon grauitie: and stirring vp schismes and discords in maintaining of words and contentious disputations, which as they spread more and more, gat wing euen vnto this Iland of Britaine, as by the words of our lamenting Historian Gyldas is seene. When (saith he) the sweete concent of Christ the head, and his members the body, had continued vntill such time, as that deadly and perfidious Arrianisme, like to a pestiferous Serpent from the other side of the Sea, casting vp her venome vpon vs, caused brethren dwelling together, to be disioyned piteously one from another. And thus the way as it were being made ouer the Ocean, all other cruell and fell Beasts where soeuer, shaking out of their horrible mouthes the deadly poison of euery heresie, inflicted the deadly stings and wounds of their teeth vpon this our Country, desirous euermore to heare some noueltie.

(11) For personage, this Emperor was indifferently tall, his complexion browne, the cast of his eies loftie, his sight quicke, his haire soft, his cheekes alwaies shauen; from the graffing of his necke to the groine very long, but from thence somewhat short and bowlegged withall. His body after death was embalmed, and in Constantinople enterred neere vnto his Father, at the commandement of Iulian, whom by his testament (for all his former displeasure) hee declared his Heire and Successor.

Julian his Parentage.

Amian. Marcell. lib.25.cap.7.

Vlian succeeded, whose birth had as much of Nobilitie as either the greatnesse of place; (for it was New Rome); or the high bloud of parentage could adde vnto him; for his Father Constantius, was the brother of great Constantine, and not much his mother Basilina was lower in her birth, though most vnfortunate in bearing him, her owne destruction. An Orphant he was left together with Gallus his brother, long tossed betweene the sourges of his owne imperfect constitution, and the bloudy iealousie of his ruling-kinsmen (not long before the fatall ruing of his Father) for being too neere allied to their Crownes.

Meane he was of stature, yet carrying from head to foote a iust proportion and vniforme knitting of his lineaments, whereby he had agilitie and strength: big and broad his shoulders, his necke fat, bearing his head forward; louely and gracefull was the cast of his quicke and cleere eye, straight his nose, and no feature of his face amisse, but the greatnes of his mouth, and the parting of his nether lippe; the soft haire of his head he wore in a decent length, and his rough beard he cut in a pointed fashion.

His proportion and feature. Amian. Marcel. lib.25.

(2) His education was vnder many masters, of which Mardonius a Scythian Eunuch was the first. From him he was sent to the publike Schoole at Constantinople, where of Nicocles of Lacedemon, he learned his Grammar, and of Ecebolius the Sophister his Rhetoricke; and of both of them (as of Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia) the Christian Religion, in which his delight was such, that he betooke him to the function of of a Deacon, reading in publike to the people the ſacred Bookes; and aimed at no further marke of greatneſſe then the reputation of a holy man: led on with the loue of knowledge, hee went to the Schooles of Nicomedia, where, of Iamblicus, who ſucceeded Porphyry in the Chaire; he learned the Philoſophie of Ariſtotle and Plato. There bewitched at length with the fame of Libanius Eloquence, though deteſting his religion; from reading in priuate ſtudie his prophane labours, hee grew a publike hearer of his inuectiue Lectures: and imitating at firſt in exerciſe of wit only this Rhetoricians forme of declaiming, hee grew in the end the profaneſt Railer, and deadlieſt Enemy of all other himſelfe againſt the Church. And to fill vp this veſſel of iniquitie, Maximus, the only Impoſtor and Magician then of the world, (worthily after for his impious doctrine put by Valentinian to the ſword) muſt come to Nicomedia. From him did Iulian learne ſuch Aſtrologie as ſetteth Natiuities, and ſuch Magicke as inuoketh Spirits. And here was the ſchoole of this mans Error, and Miſtris of his impietie. The ſeedes of whoſe Nature and Education hauing thus obſerued, let vs ſearch with an impartial Eye into his manners and condition, and ſee what vertue was in fruit.

(3) His temperance is commended to vs with admiration. He ſlept little, and could awake at pleaſure: his bed was euer with the hardeſt, and his diet of the meaneſt meat, and the moderateſt meaſure, whereby he neuer but once, and that by accident, disburdened his ſtomacke by vomit; and would often ſay, that it was the ſafetie of his life, that he neuer had any war with his belly. Such was his chaſtitie, that hauing loſt at once in France, Helena his beloued wife, and her infant, his only Sonne, he neuer ſo much as in ſuſpect, had an incontinent deſire. And therefore of all the Perſian beauties taken in thoſe warres, as the richeſt ſpoiles, Nec contrectare aliquam voluit nec videre: Neither ſuffer in his Army either Cookes or Barbers, as being deliciarum atq; intemperantiæ miniſtros.

(4) The loue of Iuſtice in this Prince is remembred to vs in his rules of DIRECTION: for he ſo amended the Lawes Ambagibus circumciſis, that the Iudges might cleerly ſee, Quid iuberent fieri quid vetarent: and in his EXAMPLE for imitation. For when to an innocent deniall before him, Delphidius the Orator inueighed ſaying; Nocens eſſe poterit vſquam ſi negare ſuſſecerit: himſelfe replied, Et quis innocens eſſe poterit ſi accuſâſſe ſufficit? and ſo diſcharged the party. And for the other, thoſe his letters to Arſacius is a ſure record. Let there bee in the Cities of your charge, many Hoſpitals erected, that the want of the wayfaring may be releeued by our benignitie: and not of them only of our Religion, but of all the reſt: for it ſutes not well with the goodnes of our Gouernment, that when the Iewes permit none of theirs to beg, and the wicked Galileans releeue not onely theirs, but ours, that ours ſhould be diſconſolate of other helpe.

Some haue blemiſhed his bounty with the brand of vaineglory: thus did the Antiochians for depreſsing ſo much the reaſonable price of Graine in their Markets, by a profuſe expence of his owne Treaſure, gaining thereby at firſt onely the applauſe of the light multitude, after which he hunted, and drawing on in the end a miſerable dearth, through the licentious exceſſe of their improuidence: which often happeneth.

And although there be ſome paſſages in his Gouernment more eaſie then in ſome others that may imply a gentle diſpoſition toward them, (ſometimes taking the Gods to witneſſe, that the Galileans (for ſo he named the Chriſtians) ſhould not vndergoe the leaſt of iniury, neither be led to Pagan ſacrifice, or forced to any thing beyond the compaſſe of their owne contents: and that he not onely reuoked the Edict of Conſtantine the Arrian Emperour, whereby thoſe holy men ſtood long exiled: but taking the aduantage of an vproare begun by the Arrians, (their Enemies) at Edeſſa ſeiſed vpō their goods, ſwolne too great in number and fortune by the gracious aſpect of his Predeceſſors, to whom hee diſſembled himſelfe a Chriſtian): yet did he whiles he had in his owne hands the reine of Gouernment, by all his actions and ends, declare himſelfe an heauy oppoſite vnto them. Sometimes by allurements to aſſay to corrupt them; ſometimes by a ſubtill ſiding with one faction of the Church, as he did with the Catholike againſt the Arrians, to counterpeiſe their power, vt ſecurius regnaret, that by ſuch licence of ſedition, Non timeret vnanimantem plebem, he need not feare the power of their vnitie, as himſelfe profeſſed.

From this vnfortunate plot of earthly policie (but with worſe ſucceſſe) he incited the Iewes to reedifie the Temple at Ieruſalem, and renew their Sacrifice, remitting to them their debt of Tribute, and vowing that at his returne from Perſia he would viſit that holy Citie, and (as he ſaith to them) vt vnà vobiſcum in ea Deo optimo gratias agam; well beleeuing that by raiſing ſuch an oppoſite to the Chriſtians, he ſhould ſuppreſſe their increaſe, and annihilate their Prophecie of Ieruſalems deſolation. To repaire theſe curſed walles againſt the prouidence of Diuine Iuſtice, Alipius of Antioch, that had beene Gouernour of Britaine, was ſent: but his indeuour, and the worke of all his Miniſters, was interrupted by fearefull flaming balles of fire, which iſſued from the Earth neere vnto thoſe foundations, conſuming very many of the Iewes and workemen; by reaſon whereof, this Element ſtill giuing freſh aſſault on them, the place became vnacceſſible, and the enterpriſe giuen ouer: ſo vaine it is for Man to ſtriue againſt the decreed purpoſe of God. And it is by others affirmed, that at the ſame time an Earthquake ſo ſhooke thoſe Foundations which were left by Titus vntouched, that one ſtone thereby was not left ſtanding vpon another, but were all laid leuell with the ground: by which miraculous ſights many Iewes were turned to the embracing of the Chriſtian Faith, vpon whoſe garments fell formes of Croſſes, which ſhined as the beames of the Sunne, neither could they by any meanes be waſhed or wiped away. Alipius that had beene chiefe in this buſineſſe, was afterward confined into Baniſhment, with the loſſe of his goods, by Valens vpon ſuſpition of Treaſon. And where there remained any antique Monument of the Infant Chriſtian Church, or any new erected badge of Religious deuotion, thoſe hee cauſed to bee defaced. Thus did he in Cæſarea Philippi, with that Braſen figure of our Sauiour arraied in a ſhort veſture, and the Woman cured of her blodie iſſue, kneeling and eleuating her hands to him; and at whoſe feet in the ſaid Pillar grew a certaine Hearb, in heighth vnto the Hem of his Garment, which cured all kind of maladies; placing his owne figure, to the intent that it ſhold be worſhipped: but ſuddenly it was with Lightning from Heauen deſtroied, breaking with violent force the Breſt thereof aſunder, and ſtriking the Head faſt into the earth; whoſe Reliques, as Zoſimus ſaith, remained there to be ſeene a long time after, a witneſſe of mans preſumptuous error and Gods iuſt diſpleaſure. Manie lawes he made againſt them, and manie rights of Subiects hee took from them. By Edict he forbad the Chriſtians the publick Schooles & ſtudy of the Arts and Tongues; Ieſting away the reaſon of this iniuſtice with ſcoffes, as hee did the reſt; ſaying, that Ariſtotle, Iſocrates, and Plato, who muſt be their guides in ſuch liberall learnings, adoring Mercurie and the other Gods, he held it abſurd that they ſhould read and learne of their Bookes, that loath and raile at their Religion.

The equitie of this extended power may appeare by Marcellinus cenſure, a man of his owne Religion, who of it ſaith, Inclemens obruendum perenni ſilentio; Let the Edict be dambd to eternall ſilence. When hee ſeized vpon the goods of the Chriſtians, which was often, and vpon weake pretences, he vſed to inuert the Letter of their owne Doctrine, in warrant of his foule act, ſaying that he did it, vt facilius in Regnum Cælorum veniant. When hee had diſabled the Chriſtians of all command, either in the Field or Common-wealth, (as he did Iouinian, Valentinian & Valens, after Emperours) he would ſay, he did it becauſe their Goſpell taketh from them Poteſtatem Gladij. And whereſoeuer any poore Chriſtian implored the hand of Iuſtice againſt wrong and violence, they returned with no better redreſſe, then that it was the rule of their Religion, perferre iniurias, it was the dutie of their Profeſſion to beare all iniuries. And although moſt Authors agree that hee ſtained not his gouernment with the bloud of any Catholikes, well knowing that gore of Perſecution is the ſeed of the Goſpell; yet ſome affirme that when Apolloes Oracle, neere Antioch, had loſt his power of anſwer by the holy preſence of Babillaes bodie (there martyred and intombed) and that the Chriſtians in remooving it away, ſung ſolemnly the Pſalm, Let all them be confounded which worſhip grauen Images: this Emperour (although the Act was his direction, though not the order) grew ſo inraged, that hee put then many Chriſtians to the ſword.

His prudence.

Of the prudence and learning of this man there be many notable monuments remaining: for in all the courſes of his life he did rather labour to content the parts of his vnderſtanding, then of his ſenſualitie, often being heard to ſay, Turpe eſſet ſapienti, cùm habeat animum, captare laudes ex corpore: and therefore writing to Ecdicius, Prefect of Ægypt, to helpe him to the Bookes of George Biſhop of Alexandria, hee ſaith, Where others delighted in Horſe and Hawkes, I haue beene from my infancie inflamed with the loue of Books. As for his Miſopogon, (where playing with his own perſon and beard, he ſharply reprehendeth the Antiochians of their intemperance in frequenting Stage-Plaies; of their impietie, in changing Iupiter and Apollo (Gods of their Forefathers) into the Chriſt of the Galileans; and of couetouſneſſe in their Magiſtrates, in ſelling Iuſtice) it is one of the wittieſt Inuectiues extant of thoſe middle times.

His Religion.

In the courſe of his Religion hee is by the Writers of his owne affection and time rather reported ſuperſtitious then deuout; and his fancies therein rather to them accounted ridiculous then religious. Such was the exceſſe and waſte of Oxen in his ſacrifices, that it is beleeued if his returne had beene from the Perſicke Expedition, there would haue beene want of them to ſupply his Rites, and therefore they might happily ſay as the white Oxen did of the Emperour Marcus, Si tu viceris, nos perimus. Yet were his rules of order to the Prieſts of his ſuperſtitious zeale, ſuch as may well become the moſt religious Church-man of our age to imitate: for he prohibited thoſe Prieſts from gaze of Stage-Playes, frequenting Tauernes, or exerciſing any foule or illiberall profeſsion, perſwading them to imitate the Chriſtians, whoſe bounty to ſtrangers in diſtreſſe, charity in burying the dead, and whoſe humble manners and ſanctitie of life (though but diſſembled) had ſo much increaſed their Profeſsion.

His Fortitude.

(6) His fortitude appeareth in the proceſſe of his Martiall Actions. At three and twenty yeeres hee was made by Conſtantine his nephew Cæſar, matched to his ſiſter Helena, and ſent in perſon to reſtraine thoſe barbarous Nations that had forced in vpon the Roman Limits. But whether this imploiment was grounded vpon the Emperours owne feare to aduenture his perſon againſt theſe Sauages, a deſire to nurture this mere Scholar his brother in law in more princely manners, who then was rude; or to expoſe him (in reſpect of ſome icalouſy in State) to an aſſured perill: it remaineth doubtfull. Only himſelfe ſaith, that he that beſtowed his Title of Cæſar, libenter dabat; & qui accepit, omninò recuſabat: for in it hee gained nothing but vt occupatior interiret, taking this his Expedition againſt thoſe Inrodes, as a baniſhment into the Hercinian Deſert, vt tanquam venator cum feris bellaret: and beleeuing himſelfe rather thereby called out to an expected death, then intended honour. But this man then neither of opinion or hope, and who ſhould haue ſeemed to haue effected a point of excellent ſeruice, if hee had no more but defended the frontiers, and repelled the Enemies, did by his valour performe no leſſe then deeds of admiration.

Ex Epiſt. Julia Maximo Philoſopho.

Hee recouered the reuolted Cities of Gallia, ouerthrowing ſeuen of the mightieſt German Princes in one ſet Battle.

Hee ſent to Rome Chonodomarius and Badomcarius, two of their greateſt Kings, as ſpoiles to adorne the Trophey, and attend the triumph of Conſtantius. Hee forced on euery ſide thoſe to feare his power, that had ſo long beene fearefull to the Roman Empire. And had he returned home, borne vp only with the merit of this his ſeruice, and opinion of the world, and not beene blowne beyond the bounds of his old moderation by a new deſire, hee had eſcaped the imputation of ambition and treacherie, and beene eſteemed a iuſt ſucceſſour, againſt whom he is deemed now an vniuſt vſurper. But it may be ſaid that it was a diuine power that inſpired it, and a ſtrong hand that inforced him to it: for from aboue the Porch of his entrance, into one of the regained Cities, the Wreath of Laurell (reſerued an ornament of that place) fell in wonder vpon his head. to affect the Empire, and reſtore the State. As touching his election, he calleth the Gods to witneſſe his vnwillingneſſe, and the publike proteſtation he made againſt it at Paris, when he was there by the tumultuous Armie ſalated Auguſtus. And although by the great prouiſion made by him of Corne from Britannie, to hold a foot the Armie againſt the plots of Conſtantius (that grew now enuious of his fortune, hee may ſeeme to haue intended the ruine of his Soueraignte) yet doth hee by the Gods of his greateſt confidence, Iupiter and the Sunne, proteſt, Quod Conſtantium occidere nunquam optauit, imò ne id accideret exoptauit.

(7) But Conſtantius ending this quarrell and competition by his death, Iulian, whom a Pithoniſt had deluded with the hope of Perſia, telling him that his fortunes ſhould be as his feature, like Great Alexander, bred in him a thirſtie deſire after the ſurname Perſicus: whereupon hee prepared an Armie for this expedition, and ſeeking the fauor of his Gods the Moone, Fortune, and Mars, embrued their Altars with the Blood of an hundred Buls at once; though manie ominous ſignes, as they were interpreted by his Philoſophers and Southſaiers, forbad the ſame. Such was the great Earthquake happening in Bithynie, that ſwallowed vp the Citie of Nicomedia. Riuers likewiſe are ſaide to ſtand drie, euen in the heart of winter; and Springs forgetting their vſuall boilings, yeelded not foorth their wonted waters: yea and if wee will beleeue the reporters; his ſucceſſe was foreſhewed by the departure of an Angell, and by a Meteor gliding in the Aire. All which hee ſought to preuent, by pacifying his Heatheniſh Gods with multitudes of Sacrifices: and with an Armie extended ten miles in length, entred Perſia, cutting aſunder the Bridges by which hee paſſed ouer his men, to adde to them more of reſolution, as their meanes were leſſe of returne, refuſing all humble ſubmiſsion and compoſition offred him by their King; and at the place then called Phrygia, ioined Battle againſt Surena, a great Commander among the Perſians, and Merenes, Generall of their Horſe, accompanied with two of the Kings ſonnes, whoſe powers not able to reſiſt the Romans, gaue backe and fledde.

From whoſe hand this Iauelin came (ſaith Amianus) God only knoweth. Some report the Caſter to haue beene a fugitiue Perſian: others ſay that from the hand of one of his owne Souldiers it proceeded: and Caliſtus one of his owne Guard, that wrote this Battle in Heroicall Verſe, affirmeth, that by ſome wicked Fiend or Diuell, this Iauelin run him thorow. (8) Thus ended this Emperour, the twenty ſixth of Iune, in the two and thirtieth yeere of his age, and three hundred ſixty and three of Chriſts Natiuitie, when he had raigned Auguſtus neere three, and Cæſar full ſeuen yeeres. Whoſe wit and eloquence needs no further teſtimonie then the Monuments of his owne Pen; nor his religious zeale more then the Function his youth ſo worthily performed in the Chriſtian Church. His Imperiall Vertues we ſee match him in ſtorie with Titus, in moderation with Aurelius, and for ſucceſſe in warre, with Traian; three of the moſt excellent Princes: and his fortune was to ſee bounded within his ſole greatneſſe, what the hand of right and ſword of tyrannie had ſo late diſperſed. But now one Errour, his Apoſtaſie, diſroabing him of all his Morall Vertues, leaues him an obiect naked to the vulgar eie, but as a Monſter of men, and marke of infamie. I hold it therefore fitting no leſſe the vſe, then the iuſtice of a Storie, to doe him (as I haue done) all his right: ſince in him we learne that all thoſe admirable endowments of Nature, embeliſhed with all the morall and internall graces that Art could adde, are not the baſe of holineſſe, without diuine grace; nor dalliance of Fortune, and fulneſſe of Empire (that made this man wanton and forgetfull) is the center of ſecuritie and happineſſe, without heauenly protection: ſince from the ſenſe of Sacred Pietie hee fell to Pagan Superſtition: for many are called, but few are choſen; and in the ſeat of Preſumptuous Maieſtie he felt the rod of Diuine Reuenge. Matth.20.16.

Iouianus his Parentage.

(2) His Father was Varonianus, by birth an Hungarian, a Captaine of good note, who not long before had laid downe his charge of warre, and retired into his Country, to a more quiet course of life. Himselfe serued Iulian the Apostata in his Campe; from whence he departed by vertue of his Edict, commanding all Christians out of his pay, among whō * Iouinianus (as wee haue said) chose rather to cast from him his Sword and Girdle, (marks of honour to Military Professors) then to forsake the Ensigne of his Heauenlie Chieftaine, and the Badge of his Christian Profession.

(3) No sooner was he clad in the Purple Robe, but one Iouianus (a Roman Ensigne-bearer, lately at variance with this new Elected Emperor, then a priuate man) fearing the danger of so powerfull an Enemie stepped now aboue the degree of the common sort, reuolted to the Persians; and hauing good accesse, informed King Sapores of the death of Iulian, (to them till then vnknowne) and disabling Iouianus for an Vnskilfull and Effeminate Captaine, both incouraged the Enemie; and gaue directions how to take the aduantage. The Persian as ready to execute as ioyous to heare, set forward his forces, his Elephants leading the way, whose terrible brayings and fearefull approach much affrighted the Roman Souldiers. A sore battell was fought, and fountaines of bloud drawne from the sides of both parts: wherein, with an infinite number of Persians, Iulianus, Macrobius, and Maximus, three Roman Tribunes, of those Legions that then were the Principall of the whole Army, were slaine: in regard whereof, and especially for want of Victuall, (whose scarsitie then was such, that for one Pecke of Meale, ten peeces of Gold were giuen) Iouianus made Peace with the Persians for thirty yeeres, giuing them fiue Prouinces beyond Tigris, some Cities and Forts in Mesopotamia, whereof Nisibis is named for one that had been the very sinewes and strength of the Confines, euer since the Warres of Mithridates: for which his doings, he is taxed by Eutropius and Amianus (who both liued in his daies) and of most the deed is held very dishonourable to the greatnesse of the Roman Empire: howbeit diuers others excuse him very iustly, considering the extreame misery and famine wherein Iulianus left the Army, which was in apparant hazard to be giuen ouer for a pray to the Enemy, to the indangering of the whole Empire, had it not been thus preuented: and therefore they highly commend him heerein, as the onely Preseruer of the Roman Army.

(2) His birth was of Pannonia, in the Citie Cibalas, of meane and poore parentage; the sonne of Gracian spoken of before, who by trade was a Rope-seller, but of great strength; and therefore by seruice preferred to places of account, and had been made Ruler of Britaine. went. As for the Tracts of Gaule, the Frankners and Saxons their neere confined neighbours, whereſoeuer they could breake foorth, and make Roades by Sea or Land, made hauocke heere by ſeizing of Booties, firing of Townes, in killing of men and women, and leading away Captiues. To ſtay theſe wofull miſeries, if the Heauens had beene ſo benigne, this valiant Captaine intended a voyage to this * our end of the World: and comming to * Bononia, which lieth diuided from the oppoſite tract of Land by a narrow Channell ebbing and flowing with terrible Tides, where the waters are ſeene ſometimes to match the higheſt Mountaine, and againe to ſettle with the leuell of the Plaines, without any harme of Sailers or Paſſage: this Sleue with a gentle courſe hee croſſed, and arriued at * Rutupie, a quiet Roade and Harbour ouer againſt it: from whence after that the Bactauians, the Heruli, Iouij, and Victores (Companies bold and confident in their ſtrengths) were come, he marched towards Lundinium, an ancient Citie, which poſterities afterwards named Auguſta: and hauing ſeuered his Troopes into ſundry parts, he charged vpon thoſe companies of rouing and robbing enemies, euen when they were heauie laden with Booties and ſpoiles, and were driuing away before them both Men and Women bound for their Captiues, beſides much Cattle, and a great Prey. Theſe hee ſoone diſcomfited, and reſtored to the poore diſtreſſed Tributaries their Liberties and Loſſes, beſtowing ſome ſmall parcels thereof among his weary and well-deſeruing Souldiers: and entred the City with exceeding great ioy, in manner of a Petty-triumph, which erewhile was ouer-whelmed with Calamities, but now on the ſudden refreſhed and ſet in perfect ſafety.

(5) Vpon this proſperous ſucceſſe encouraged to greater attempts, hee abode yet doubtfull of the future, caſting with himſelfe many proiects, which poiſed Fortunes Scales alike: but laſtly by certaine Captiues and Fugitiues hee learned that thoſe Companies of ſundry fierce Nations, ſpread ſo farre and diffuſedly vpon the face of the Prouince, could not be vanquiſhed, vnleſſe it were by ſleights and ſtratagemes. By Edicts therefore he firſt proclaimed impunitie to ſuch as had forſaken their Colours, if they would returne; wherby many which had run to the Enemie, or at their owne pleaſures had beene diſperſed into diuers parts, came in, and by their countenance declared their reſolutions in his behalfe. Notwithſtanding, miſtruſting the euent, and penſiue ſtill with cares, hee thought good to call to his aſſiſtance Ciuilis, a man of great vnderſtanding, quicke ſpirit, and withall an vpright Iuſticer, who was to rule Britaine as Deputie, and likewiſe Dulcitius a Captaine, renowned for his skill and deedes of Armes.

(6) After Conſultation with them, hauing gotten courage, and departing from Auguſta with a power of Souldiers, which in his politike induſtrie he had leuied and trained to his hand, hee brought exceeding great ſuccour euery where vnto the troubled and confuſed ſtate of the Britaines, gaining before hand ſuch places in each part, as might giue aduantage to annoy the barbarous Enemie; and enioined the Common Souldiers no ſeruice, whereof himſelfe tooke not the Aſſay with a cheerefull heart: in this ſort performing as well the Offices of an Actiue and hardy Souldier, as the carefull charge of a right-noble Generall, he diſcomfited & put to flight diuers Nations, whom inſolent Pride (fed with ſecurity) had incited and ſet on fire, to inuade the Romans Territories; and ſo reſtored wholly vnto their former ſtate the Cities and Caſtles which had ſuſtained many loſſes, and eſtabliſhed a ſure peace for a long time following.

(7) Now there happened whiles he atchieued theſe exploits, a dangerous matter likely to haue broken out into great miſchiefe, had it not beene quenched in the very beginning of the enterpriſe: for one Valentinus of Valeria Pannonia, a man of a proud ſpirit, firſt Deputy Leiutenant and after preſident, for ſome notable offenſe baniſhed into Britaine, as Frontinus immediately before had beene, as one impatient of reſt, like ſome noiſome wilde Beaſt, vpon a certaine ſwelling pride, roſe vp in commotion againſt Theodoſius, whom hee perceiued to be the only man able to withſtand his wicked deſignes. Howbeit, caſting about many waies, both cloſely and apparantly, as the gale of his vnmeaſurable deſire roſe higher, he ſolicited as well the baniſhed perſons as Souldiers, promiſing (as the time would affoord) rewards to allure and draw them on to ſome actuall attempt. Yet when the day came wherein it ſhould haue beene effected, Theodoſius hauing intelligence thereof, ſurprized Valentinus with ſome few of inward complices, and deliuered them vnto Dulcitius, to be put to death accordingly. But in his militarie skill and policie, (wherein hee was reputed to haue exceeded all men liuing in thoſe daies) geſsing at future dangers, hee inhibited all Inquiſitions to be made touching the reſt of the Conſpirators, leſt ſo generall a feare ſurpriſing at once, and ſpread abroad among many thoſe tempeſtuous troubles of the Prouinces, which were now well allaied, ſhould reuiue againe.

(8) Therefore turning himſelfe from this buſineſſe to the reforming of ſuch enormities as were of moſt conſequence, now that all dangers were quite ouer-blowne, he reedified the Cities, repaired the Gariſon Caſtles, and fortified the Frontiers with ſtanding Watches, and ſtrong Fore-enſes. And thus hauing recouered the Prouince againe which had yeelded ſubiection to the Enemies, he reduced it vnto the priſtine Eſtate, ſo as by his meanes and motion it had againe a lawfull Gouernour appointed, and alſo named it VALENTIA, in honour of Valentinianus the Emperor.

(9) The Areans, a kinde of men (as witneſſeth Amianus) inſtituted by thoſe of ancient times for politicke imploiments, who by little and little were fallen into diſorders and vices, he remooued from their Siations, as being manifeſtly conuicted, for that (induced with the greatneſſe of rewards receiued or promiſed) they had diuers times diſcouered vnto the Barbarous whatſoeuer was done or debated betwixt the Preſident and his Counſell: for indeed their charge was to runne to and fro by long iournies, to intimate and make knowne vnto the Romans Captaines vpon the Marches, what doings and ſtirres were among the Neighbour-Nations; whereby they had great opportunities both to know and reueale the ſecrets of the State.

(10) And thus Theodoſius hauing managed moſt excellently theſe affaires, was ſent for to the Emperours Court; who leauing the Prouince ouer-ioied for their Peace, was no leſſe famous for his many important Victories, then was either Furius Camillus, or Papinius Curſor. And being honourably accompanied and attended vnto the Narrow Seas, with the heartie loue and fauour of all men, departed, and with a gentle gale of winde paſſed ouer, and came to the Princes Campe, where (being receiued with ioy and praiſe) he ſucceeded in the roome of Valens Iouinus, who had the conduct of the Horſemen. For theſe his Martiall deeds ſo happily atchieued, in honour of him there was a Statue erected, reſembling a Man of Armes on Horſebacke, as by Symmachus may be vnderſtood, thus ſpeaking to his ſonne Theodoſius: The Author of your kindred and ſtocke, Captaine Generall both in Africke and Britaine, was (among other ancient Titles) conſecrated by the moſt honourable Order with Statues of Knighthood. And in his commendations, Claudian with full note thus poetically ſang:

Ille Caledonijs poſuit qui Caſtra pruinis,

And Ireland did huge heapes of Scots deplore?

Dreadfull fights, and fearefull Earthquakes. Amian. Marcell. lib.16 cap.14.

(11) Strange and dreadfull were the signes that in the third yeere of this Emperour chanced; as Earthquakes, Inundations, and the like; whereof Marcellinus thus reporteth: A little after the Sunne-rising (saith he) the waighty and steddy masse of the whole Earthly Globe shooke, flashes of lightning very thicke and fierce going before: the Sea also driuen aside, and the waues and billowes so preposterously tumbling and retiring back, that the deepe Gulfes being discouered and laid empty, a man might haue seene sundry sorts of swimming creatures sticking in the mudde: Also the vast Vallies and Rockes, which Nature had set farre away vnder the huge Waters, did now behold the Beames of the Sunne; insomuch that many Ships were bedded fast in the drie ground, and flockes of people straggled at their pleasure in the small remaines of water, to take vp Fishes as the Sea-spoile; when on the sudden the waues disdaining to be thus dispossessed, returned with such violent beating vpon the Ilands and Promontories, which lay farre into the Sea, as that they ouer-flowed, and laid leuell an infinite number of buildings and Cities. And therefore in this furious discord of the Elements, the surface of the world being couered, represented strange, and wonderfull sights: Among which S. Ierome reporteth, that there rained Woollfrom Heauen so perfect and good, that no better grew vpon the Sheepe, the naturall Producer. But to returne.

Gulfes of the Sea laid bare, and many Cities drowned.

Paulus Orosius. S. Ierome. Woll rained from Heauen.

(12) Fraomarius, whom Valentinianus had ordained to be King of the Bucinobantes in Germanie, was made Tribune and Colonell ouer a Regiment of Almains in Britaine, which for number and valour in those daies were renowned; where (no doubt) matter enough was ministred for him to worke vpon. But the death of the Emperour presently following, admits no mention of further discourse: which happened in this manner: The Quadi after many molestations done to the Roman Legions and their Confederates, sent their Ambassadours vnto him, desiring pardon for their former faults committed, and an abolishment of all remembrances thereof: with whom being in earnest conference, suddenly the bloud gushed out of his mouth; and being laid vpon his bed, shortly after died of an Apoplexie, or rather of the Plague, as the blew Markes appearing vpon his dead body gaue coniecture: Nouember the seuenth, of his age fiftie fiue yeeres, hauing raigned eleuen yeeres, eight moneths, and two daies, in the yeere of our Christ three hundred seuenty fiue.

(13) For presence, he was Maiesticall, of bodie fat, his complexion faire, his eies gray, and hauing therwith somwhat a scue cast, his haire shining bright, his ioints strong and well knit: he was a Prince mercifull and louing, and mitigated many Tributes formerly imposed on the Prouinces: a wise Warriour, sterne in countenance, hastie of speech, and chaste of body, a good Iusticer, and impatient of all delaies. But these his Vertues with some Vices were accompanied: for he is taxed with enuie and partialitie, in punishing seuerely the poore Souldier for small offenses, but remissiue to the faults of their Captaines and Leaders, and that was the cause (by Amianus his report) of the troubles in Britaine, the losses in Africke, and the wasting in Illyricum.

Valentinianus his personage and vertues.

(14) His Arian brother Valens suruiuing him, raigned Emperour in the East; by whose sufferance the Barbarous Gothes entred Thracia, which presently proued to be the bane of the Roman World, for that these Gothes (a strange and vnknowne People till then) being forced out of a secret Nooke in Scythia, by the Hog-Backt Hunnes, rushing as an vnresistable Whirle-Winde from those High Mountaines, infested the Coasts about Danubius, and obtained licence from Valens to passe the Riuer Donaw into Thracia, where long in quiet they staied not, but like a violent Floud running with a full currant, they ouer-whelmed all before them, ouercomming the Romans in many Battles, and in one slew the Emperour Valens, with most of his approoued Captaines, and twenty fiue Tribunes that had charge of Regiments, the third part of his Armie hardly escaping vnslaine. Some report that Valens flying the Field, tooke into a house neere Adrianople, whither being pursued by the Enemie, and his Hold fired vpon his head, was therein burned to ashes, after he had sate Emperour fourteene yeeres.

Chapter LI.

Gracianus & Valentinianus Emp.

An. Do. 376.

Amianus Mar. lib. 27 cap. 5. Gracian and Valentinian Emp.

Gracianus, the Eldeſt Sonne of Valentinianus, by his Empreſſe Seuera, was made his fathers Collegue in the Empire in the fourth yeere of his Raigne: notwithſtanding ſix daies after his death, his ſecond Sonne Valentinian, a Childe of Foure yeeres old, by the aduice of the Counſell and generall conſent of the Camp, was alſo ſtiled and proclaimed Emperor. Theſe Brethren liued in much loue, and ruled in the Weſt, as their vncle Valens did in the Eaſt, of whom wee laſt ſpake. And albeit Gracian had cauſe of diſpleaſure, that this his Younger Brother was thus aduanced without his allowance; yet he as a Prince kind and naturall, regarded his Brother exceedingly, and brought him vp in all tender affection, forgetting the wrong offered vnto himſelfe and his owne Mother for Valentinians mothers ſake.

Lib. 30 cap. 12.

Gracian louing to Valentinian.

(2) The Mother of this Valentinian was Iuſtina, a damſell of an admirable feature and exceeding beautie, ſurpaſsing all other women ſo farre, that the Empreſſe her ſelfe fell in loue with her, and vſually conuerſed with her familiarly as her equall, imparting her moſt priuate ſecrets vnto her as her truſtie Counſeller, and often bathing together in the ſame Bath. Neither was her ardent affection contained within the meaſure of womaniſh modeſtie, inſomuch as ſhe refrained not in the hearing of the Emperour (her Huſband) to extoll her incomparable beautie, preferring her far aboue any creature in the World. Whereupon Valentinianus ſo farre affected this Lady, as that he tooke her to his Wife; by whom he had this young Valentinian, and alſo three Daughters, notwithſtanding Seuera was yet liuing.

Iuſtina mother of young Valentinian.

Socrates eccleſ. hiſt. lib. 4 cap. 25.

(3) The ſtormes of the Gothes as a violent tempeſt beating ſtill againſt the Shoares of the Roman Prouinces, cauſed Gracian to beare Sayle toward the ſafeſt Harbour, and to commit the guidance of his ſhippe to the moſt aſſured Pilot: their forces being ſo great, and their outrages ſo terrible, that hee thought it beſt not to aduenture his owne perſon, but to imploy ſome other approoued Captaine. For which exploit, none was held more ſufficient then Theodoſius, the Sonne of that Theodoſius who was ſo famous for his Britiſh Warres, and whoſe life was taken away by Valens the Eaſterne Emperour. Him he made firſt Captaine Generall of the Roman Empire, and immediatly vpon his firſt ſeruice againſt the Gothes, his Fellow Emperor and Auguſtus, allotting him thoſe parts in the Eaſt, that his vncle Valens lately had enioyed.

Valentinianus marrieth Iuſtina, by whom he had young Valentinian.

Theodoſius, Captaine generall of the Roman Empire, and fellow Emperor.

(4) In many Battels, fought to the laſt drop of bloud, this worthy Generall ouercame the Gothes, ſo that their King Athanarius was laſtly inforced to ſue for his Peace, which vpon honourable compoſitions was graunted, and himſelfe in moſt princely manner entertained by Theodoſius in the Imperiall Citie Conſtantinople; where falling ſicke after three moneths, he died, and was both much lamented, and ſumptuouſly buried by the Emperor. Theſe reports cauſed Sapor, the moſt puiſſant King of Perſia, to ſubmit himſelfe vnto Theodoſius, and by his Ambaſſadors, attending his Court, obtained his Amitie. Thus glorioſuly raigning and perfect peace eſtabliſhed, he ordained his young ſonne Arcadius his Fellow Emperor in the Eaſt.

(5) But the affaires in the Weſterne Empire proceeded nothing ſo fortunately: for Gracian a meeke and ſoft ſpirited man, ballanced with Theodoſius, was held without regard; and Valentinian by his Prefect Probus, held both Rome and Italy at his deuotion; onely Gallia obeyed Gracian. For Clemens Maximus borne in Spaine, but deſcended lineally from Conſtantine the Great, by his affability and liberal carriage, had wonne the affections of the Britaines to ſide with him; a man, no doubt, both Valiant and Wiſe, had he held his alleagiance to his Soueraigne Lord. But the time fitting his purpoſes, when the Scots and Picts with their wonted inroads, ſore indamaged the Prouince, he ſet himſelfe for their deliuerance, and therein ſped ſo well, that the Souldiers by conſtraint (as Oroſius ſaith) forced him to aſſume the Imperiall Stile and Purple Robe. And ſo so hasting into Gallia, with all the flower and strength well neer of the Britaines forces, arriued in the mouth of Rhene, vnto whom also the Germans Army ioyned, and now accounting himselfe an absolute Monarch, admitted Victor his sonne, then Cæsar, to be partner of his Empire, whose Stampe therefore with his father we haue here annexed.

(6) Thus Maximus establishing his throne at Triers, Spread his wings (saith Gyldas) the one into Spaine, the other into Italy, and with the terror of his Name, leuied Tributes and Pensions for Souldiers pay, of the most fell and sauage Germans.

Against him Gracianus made his power, but after fiue daies skirmishings was forsaken of his own Souldiers, and so put to flight. And now deiected and destitute of meanes to maintaine his quarrell, hee sent Ambrose (a great Doctor of the Church) his Ambassador vnto Maximus, to intreat for Peace, which in outward shew was granted, but was farre otherwise intended, as the sequell proued. For seeking his death, he did shortly after effect it in this wise: He caused Letters, and reports to be giuen vnto Gracian, that his Empresse was in iourny to visit him, and withall sent forth a Carroche stuffed with Souldiers, and with them a desperate Captaine named Andragathius. Gracian greatly reioycing for his Wifes approach, prepared himselfe to meet Her accordingly, and opening the Litter, thinking to imbrace his Empresse, was by these Ruffins treacherously murthered neere vnto Lyons, when he had raigned fifteene yeeres, and liued twentie nine. Valentinian with his Mother Iustina, fearing the like conspiracies, became supplicants vnto Theodosius in the East against Maximus.

(7) He therefore preparing his forces, marched as farre as Aquileia in Lombardie, where Maximus remained both confident and secure. For hauing fortified the straits of the Mountaines with sufficient Garrisons, and dammed the Hauens with strength of Ships, himselfe and assisters with great boldnesse proceeded against Theodosius, and gaue him a battell before the Citie Syscia in Pannonia, and againe most valiantly receiued him in another, vnder the leading of his brother Marcellus; but in both of them was ouercome. From this last, he secretly retired vnto Aquileia, where of his owne Souldiers he was betraied, and deliuered to Theodosius his pursuer; and by him to the Executioner to be beheaded: of which his vnfortunate, but deserued end, the famous Bishop Martinus Turonensis being in Britaine, did foretell him long before. Andragathius also, the Murtherer of Gracian, whose state was now desperate, cast himselfe headlong into the Sea, and made an end of his wicked life. Victor the sonne of Maximus, made his Cæsar in France, as we haue said, was defeated, taken Prisoner & slaine. This Victory was held so worthy and memorable, that the Romans from thence forward solemnized that day euery yeere as festiuall, saith Procopius.

Andragathius drowneth himselfe.

(8) But these Britaines that had assisted Maximus, as by Writers is recorded, did forcibly inuade Armorica, and there planted themselues: From whence (saith Beda, the Britaines first arriued into this Iland. But surely himselfe is either greatly mistaken, or else we mistake him altogether, and that rather, for that by Cæsar those Coasts that lie vpon the Sea shoares, are called Armorica, and there the Celtes seated, being the Originall of our Inhabitants, as is holden, and so from thence they might spread themselues further into these British Ilands, long before it receiued the name of Little Britaine. The like troubles fell to other Prouinces at the same time, by the intestine Warres of the Empire: for the Gaules were molested by the Frankes; Spaine by the Sueuians; and Africk by the Vandals: the East parts by the Heruli, Ostroges, and Hunnes; Italy by the Lombards, and shortly after by the Gothes.

(9) These troubles in the Prouinces, caused the Emperors to call home their Armies, with Aides of their Allies, & all too little to support their own declining Estates, which now beganne to end of it selfe, and these Emperors raignes to be cut off by their vntimely deaths.

But to returne into the path of our History, from whence (by the Intangled occasions of these foure Emperours raigning together) we haue wandred; let vs remember what occurrents happened vpon the death of Maximus the Tyrant, and hasten to end the greatnesse of the Empire, which in most Prouinces began to end of it selfe. For Valentinian being rid of his feares, vnto which he had beene subiect; and Theodosius of his Collegue, vnto whom hee was enforced; great hope was conceiued of a flourishing Estate, but it brought foorth onely the remaines of their downefall: for the one returning to Constantinople in great Triumph, liued not long after; and the other left peaceably in the Westerne World, was (as you shall heare) soone made away by Conspiracie.

(10) Valentinian remaining at Vienna in France, free from Hostile Enemies, retained in his Court those that sought his life, whereof Arbogastes, a Captaine of a haughty stomacke, politicke, aduenturous, and of great power, but withall of a base Parentage, a stranger and an Infidell, was one; Eugenius a Grammarian, but now bearing Armes, and of great account, was another. These corrupting his Chamberlaines, compounded for his death, which they as wickedly performed, by strangling him in his bedde, giuing it forth that the Emperour had hanged himselfe; which was so confidently auouched, that Prosperus in his Addition to Eusebius writing his death, saith, that it was acted by himselfe, after hee had liued twenty six, and raigned sixteene yeeres, being strangled in the yeere of Grace three hundred eighty foure.

FLAVIVS THEODOSIVS.

CHAPTER LII.

Flau. Theodosius Emp.

An. Do. 392.

WE haue declared in the life of the last preceding Emperour, the Birth and Fortunes, Warres and Victories of this most worthie Theodosius, vntill the death of Maximus the Britaine, (for so most writers terme him) and now onely remaine his latter Acts in Warre and Peace to bee further related.

(2) This Emperour returning from Aquileia in Lombardie vnto Constantinople in the East, long time there staied not, but was drawne againe into the West both to reuenge the death of Valentinian his Fellow-Emperour so trecherously strangled, and also to oppose the proceedings of Eugenius, whose Coine wee haue heere expressed, being one of the Murderers then vsurping that portion of the Empire, sided by Arbogastes the other.

Theodosius goeth against Arbogastes and Eugenius.

Eugenius vsurper.

(3) Theodosius marching with his forces towards the Confines of Italie found the passages stopped at the foot of the Alps, and his Enemies powers farre surmounting his: Therefore a while to deliberate on these businesses, hee pitched his Tents, and there staied. In the meane time Eugenius and Arbogastes his associate had forelaid the Countrey, and hemmed him about in such a strait, that no victuals could bee brought vnto his Campe.

(4) No meanes being now left, but either to cleere the passages, or bee ouerthrowne, hee first became supplicant with Fastings and Teares vnto his God, whom he knew to be the God of Hosts, and whom euer he had serued, and whose aid had hitherto neuer failed him: whereupon boldly incouraging his men, he accepted of the Field. But the Battle furiously begunne, fell so sore against him, that ten thousand of his Souldiers were presently slaine; and the rest despairing ready to flie, himselfe at that instant had beene surprized, had not God turned the heart of Arbitio, a Captaine of his Enemies, suddenly to come to his side, and to rescue him. Theodosius much daunted by these vnfortunate beginnings, yet conceiued better hopes of the following successe, trusting to the vprightnesse of his Cause, and the helpe of his God, which still he implored, till the Heauens were propitious to his earnest desires.

Theodosius praieth to God for victorie.

Sabellic. Ennead. 7 lib. 9.

(5) For suddenly a violent tempest arose, and a raging winde rushed so extreamly on the faces of his Enemies, that they were in no wise able to withstand it, the power thereof beating backe againe their darts into their owne sides; whereas the arrowes shot from the Emperors part, were thereby forced with double strength to pierce through the Rebels Iron plates, whereby a most glorious victory was obtained; and Eugenius taken, who lay grouelling at the Emperors feete, deploring his estate, and crauing his pardon; but euen as hee kneeled with cries and teares, the Souldiers standing by strucke off his Head. And Arbogastes the Author of these euils by flight escaping, two daies after ran himselfe vpon his Sword, and so reuenged on himselfe his owne wicked actions. This victory was atchieued the sixth of September, in the yeere of grace three hundred ninety six, by Socrates account: and was so famous, that besides the Records of Christian Historians, Claudius a Heathen Poet thus eternizeth the same in his Heroick Poeme.

(6) Theodosius thus deliuered, repaired vnto Millan, where worne with yeeres and trauels, shortly after he sickened vnto death. And sending for his Son Honorius, made him Emperor of the West, and to Arcadius gaue the East, wherein hee had before made him his Cæsar. The Prouince of Africa he assigned to the gouernment by one Gyldus in his Sonnes behalfe, and in the Non-age of Arcadius appointed Rufinus for Constantinople, and Stilicho Tutor to young Honorius in Italie, three most worthy men vndoubtedly, had the greatnesse of their spirits beene contained within the lists of their trust and places.

(7) This last named Flauius Stilicho, famous for a long time, and an inward companion with Theodosius, had beene imploied in the Britaines warres against the inroades of the Scots, Vandals, and Picts, and therein had borne himselfe with fortunate successe, as the Poet Claudian implieth, where he bringeth in Britaine thus speaking:

Stilicho imploied in the British Warres.

But this her ioy through the Treaſons of theſe three Gouernours, was ſoone turned into laments and teares, and the whole Empires glory brought to a fatall period, as preſently it will appeare.

Theodoſius his vertues.

(8) This Theodoſius for his Princely parts by all writers is ranked among the very beſt of all the Emperours: And as he is likened to Traian for his feature and perſonage, ſo may he be compared in wiſedome to Marcus Aurelius: In temperance with Antoninus Pius: For his Chriſtian profeſsion and deuotion, with Conſtantine the Great: and for his meeknes, equall to any: Wherof among many other, we haue one example very remarkeable, vpon an offence cõmitted by the Inhabitants of Theſſalonica, hee commanded moſt ſeuere puniſhment to bee inflicted, which was ſo vnaduiſedly executed, that as well the innocent, as the offenders were inuolued therein. He then comming to Millan, would haue entred the Church to haue communicated with other Chriſtians in their ſacred deuotions, which Ambroſe, the great Doctor, and Biſhop of that Sea (though otherwiſe a man of admirable mildneſſe) reſiſted and forbad, in which eſtate the Emperour ſtood for eight moneths continuance: and then with great humility & ſubmiſsion, acknowledgeing his offence was abſolued, and againe receiued into the congregation: For preuenting of the like raſh offences by him committed, he then enacted a Lawe, that thirty daies ſhould paſſe betwixt the ſentence of death, and the execution of the Malefactor: And to ſuppreſſe his haſty choller (whereunto he was much ſubiect) his vſuall manner was to recite the Greeke Alphabet, before hee vttred any ſpeech ſauering of that humour.

Theodoſius vpon his ſubmiſſion, abſolued by the Church.

Theodoſius, his Art to ſuppreſſe anger.

(9) He died Ianuary the ſeuenteenth, the yeere of the worlds happines three hundred ninety fiue: when he had raigned ſeuenteene yeares, and liued ſixty, as Aurelius Victor writeth, with whom he ends his Hiſtory. His firſt wife was Flaccilia, a religious Lady, the Mother of Arcadius and Honorius, by his ſecond wife hee had a daughter named Placidia Galla, firſt married vnto Athaulpus King of the Gothes, and after his death vnto Conſtantine, whom Honorius her brother made Auguſtus and his fellow Emperour.

Atall was the Act of Theodoſius, in his Election of the three foreſaid Protectors, whoſe greatnes carried with a glutted proſperity, grew to a ſurfet after his death in their ambitious thoughts, and was the downefall of the now aged and drooping Empire: firſt Gildus in Africa, nor contented with the title of Comes or Earle, caſt off all ſubiection, and as an abſolute Lord, acknowledged neither Arcadius, nor Honorius for his Soueraigne.

(2) Againſt theſe proceedings, his owne brother Maſtelzerius oppoſed himſelfe, and both in words and acts aſſayed to ſet him in his wonted place of obedience, which by no other means could be brought to paſſe, but by aſſiſtance ſent him from Honorius, with which, though much too weake, he marched againſt the Emperours Enemy, and as Paulus Oroſius writeth more by force of praiers to God, then power of men, in his encounter preuailed, and beheaded Gildus for his Treaſon: But himſelfe becomming mightie, and forgetting that which in others hee remembred, himſelfe vſurped the command of Africa againſt Honorius, caſting off all ſubiectiue obedience, and as a free Prince ruled the Prouince: The Souldiours that had lately aſsiſted the Emperours cauſe, now well perceiuing his aime, leuelled at the Crowne, thought beſt to cut the ſtring before he looſed the ſhaft, and made him ſhorter by the head.

Maſtelzerius ouercometh his brother Gildus.

(3) Ruffinus in Conſtantinople as boldly bare himſelfe, thinking Arcadius both too weake and yong to ſound the depth of his deſignes, whoſe thoughts did alſo worke vpon conceited Soueraignety: he therefore ſecretly ſollicited the Gothes to warre vpon the Empire, that ſo Arcadius might either be ſlaine or in-

But these things thus dangerously complotted by Ruffinus, were as politically preuented by the Emperor, although a Child: for before the Seed of this Treason could bring forth either Bud or Blade it was discouered, and the Author slaine by an Italian Band, his Head (which as some affirme, first tooke breath in Britaine) was aduanced ouer a Gate in Constantinople.

Ruffinus slaine.

(4) Thus Peace obtained by the Deaths of these two Traitors, the Third stood vp with more danger in the west. For Stilicho, Tutor to yong Honorius, thought it not sufficient honour for him to haue his Daughter an Empresse by the Marriage of his Ward; but set at hazard (for himselfe and sonne) his own Conscience, both their Liues, and the fatall ruine of the Now-declining Empire. For first, sowing seditions amongst the Lieutenants of the Prouinces, picked also quarrels in the Emperors Court, Casshiering with disgraces those Gothes that had serued with good proofe of their fidelitie aboue twenty yeeres, since their entertainment by Theodosius. These to reuenge their Wrongs, chose for their Cheiftaine a valiant Gothe named Alaricus, which shortly proued the Scourge of Rome: with whom ioyned the Vandals, Alanes, and Sueuians, who ioyntly with great fury beganne to warre in Austria and Hungarie, increasing their Powers with such Multitudes, that as Paulus Orosius, an Author of that time saith; The World was amazed and stood in feare. For vnto these Colonies resorted two hundred thousand Gothes, more, vnder the leading of Radagasius their King, who together with vnited forces, subdued all Thrasia, Hungary, Austrich, Sclauonia, and Dalmatia, and spoiled all in such manner, that it seemed Diuels and not Men had passed that way, as Saint Ierome (who liued at that time) expresseth: These brute Beasts (saith he) suffered by the wrath of God in this warre, haue laid Cities waste, slaine the People, and left the very Fields bare and desolate, whereof the Prouinces of Thracia, and Sclauonia, with the Country wherein my selfe was borne, beare too true, but lamentable Records.

Hieron. in epist. ad Paul. & Eust.

(5) The Roman Empire thus daily declining, and these fierce Nations making hauock where they came, the Armies in Britaine were put in great feare, lest the Flames of their Neighbours fire might Flash out, and take hold of them also. Therefore prouidently to preuent that danger, they elected one Marcus their Lieutenant for Emperor, yeelding him their obedience some short time, and then finding his defects, immediatly murthered him.

Marcus chosen Emperor.
Marcus murthered.
Sabellicus Enn. 7. lib. 9.

In whose stead they Inthroned one Gracian a Britaine: whose carriage not answering their expectations, they Murthered also, within Foure Moneths after his Royall solemnity.

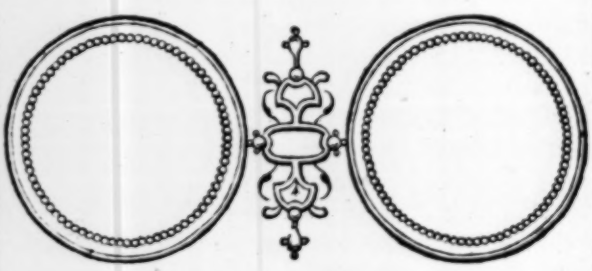
Gracian chosen Emperor.
Gracian murthered.



The features and Imperiall Titles stamped on the Romish Mony of these two Vsurpers, (according to the vsuall manner of the like in Estate) we finde not, neither stands it with credit of our History to faine them at pleasure: therefore till time bring them forth, from the Caues of obscurity wee haue allowed them place onlie by these Circles inserted, that others may supply what presentlie wee want, and accomplish by pencile what we cannot by Presse.

(6) Yet time to Constantine hath bin more fauorable in preseruing his remẽbrance by his minted Moneys, which here with his Story we present to sight. At the fall of these former, no better at all then a Common Souldier, but vpon confidence onely conceiued of his Name, was made Emperor, who with more respect of honour, and liking of his aduancers, bare himselfe better then the others had done. For putting to Sea, and landing at Bologne, he easily induced the Romans forces as farre as the Alps to side with him: Valentia in France hee manfully defended: the Rhine, which long had been neglected, hee fortified with Garrisons: vpon the Alps as well as vpon the Maritime Coasts, where passages were frequented, he built Fortresses: Spaine likewise he held vnder the hand of Constans his Sonne, whom of a Monke hee had made Augustus, & by whose valour subdued all from the Pyrenean Mountaines to the Ocean. Whose Moneys wanting to expresse his Image and Stile, we haue also supplied with another Blanke.

Constantine of a common Souldier made Emperor.
Ann. Do. 41[illegible]

(7) Constantine prospering as wee haue said, sent Letters of excuse vnto Honorius, affirming constantly that he was compelled by the Souldiers to doe what he did: whereby he so pleased the Emperor, that commending his Valor, & holding him fit, he sent him of free gift a Purple Robe. Whereupon this new-growne blade began to bud faire, and at Arles planted his Imperiall Seat, Commanding the Citie to be called Constantina from him, and ordained that the Assemblies of the affaires of Seuen Prouinces should bee therein held. But this his Sunshine of prosperitie was soone ouercast with the Clouds of aduerse fortunes, and his Crowne & Life laid together in the dust. For in Spaine against him was arreared Maximus a Vassall, whose Generall Gerontius intercepting Constans, (his Sonne and Cæsar) at Vienna in France slew him: and Constantine himself within the Walles of Arles, besieged for Foure Moneths, after the Raigne of Foure Yeeres, laid aside his Purple Robe, and entred the Church in Order of Priesthood, surrendering the Citie with his Stile Imperiall, was lastly led into Italy, and there beheaded.

Constans the sonne of Constantine made Augustus. Sabellicus.

Constans slaine.

Constantius beheaded.

(8) From that time Britaine renewed her obedience to Honorius, and the Prouince a while was refreshed by the wisdome and Prowesse of Victorinus her Lieutenant, who often represt the incursions of the Scots

Victorinus Lieutenant in Britaine.

Scots and Picts: whereupon in his praise Rutilius Claudius thus wrote:

Conscius Oceanus virtutum conscia Thule,
Et quaecunque ferox arua Britannus arat.

The Ocean wide and Thule, his vertues witnesse will;
And all the Champian Fields, which Britaines fierce doe till.

(9) But Rome at this time being sore afflicted, and by Alaricus with his Gothes and Vandals presently sacked, Honorius sent for Victorinus with his Army out of Britaine, to the rescue of the Citie, as Claudian signifieth, when he reckoneth vp among other Aides, the British Legion sent thither: whereof the Scots and Picts had soone notice, and (according to their wonted manner) with fire and sword molested their neighbours.

(10) The Britains therfore resolutely engaging themselues into dangers, tooke Armes, and freed their Cities and States from those Barbarous People: by whose example, the rest of their Nation in Armorica, with the Prouinces of Gaulois, deliuered themselues also from their oppressions, and all of them cast out the Roman Presidents, settling a forme of Common-wealth to their owne liking. But these our Britaines growing too weake to withstand the continuall inroades of their Northerne Enemies, humbly besought Honorius for succour; whose returne of comforts consisted only in words, exhorting them by Letters, to stand vpon their owne Guard. But they knowing it was not words which must helpe them, againe deplored their miseries, & so obtained of him the assistance of one Legion, which in their aid droue backe those Assailants into their owne Marches, and fortified againe the Wall betwixt the Frith of Edenburgh vnto Clud: so then departing, left the Britaines to defend themselues; who now, besides the Common Enemies so often mentioned, were much molested, and their Faith corrupted by one Pelagius, by birth a Britaine, by profession a Monke, by leaud doctrine an Heretike, who was brought vp in the famous Monastery of Bangor in Wales, had also trauelled Italie, Sicilia, & Ægypt, for the studie of learning, and grew into great fauour with Paulinus Bishop of Nola, and with S. Augustine also, till his Hereticall Assertions, which had beene by him and his disciple Cœlestius (a Scot secretly taught, and by Saint Ierome discouered) were afterwards condemned by Innocentius the first, Bishop of Rome. But the Arch-heretike returning into Britaine, began againe obstinately to maintaine the same, together with Agricola, one who spread the venome of that Heresie into Forraine parts: whose doctrines were, 1. That Man, without the grace of God, was able to fulfill all the Commandements. 2. That Man in himselfe had Freewill. 3. That the Grace of God was giuen vnto vs according to our merits. 4. That the Iust haue no sinne. 5. That Children are free from Originall sinne. 6. That Adam should haue died, though he had not sinned. And therein also one Timothie most impiously disputed against the Diuine and Humane Natures of Christ. Notwithstanding, at the same time flourished Fastidius, a most learned British Bishop, and Chrysanthus also the Deputie or Vicegerent of Britaine, who with great honor gouerned the affaires of the Church and Common-wealth, and was afterwards (as elsewhere we haue shewed) made Bishop at Constantinople of the Nouatians against his will.

(11) Thus were the affaires of this Land managed vnder these Brethren Emperours; the elder of which, Arcadius, died in peace at Constantinople, leauing his sonne Theodosius, a childe of eight yeeres, to the succession of the Empire, and to the tuition of Hisdigerdus King of Persia; a matter which seemed at first very dangerous, but prooued at the last very profitable. He raigned thirteene yeeres, and died the first of May, the one and thirtieth of his age, the yeere of Christs birth foure hundred and ten. At which time one Iouinus, of an obscure beginning, had raised some Tumults in Gallia, stiled himselfe Emperour, vsurped the Purple Robe, and stamped his Coines with the Title of Victorie, as is seene in one which we heere present.

(12) Against him Honorius made his power, and with his little losse slew the Vpstart in the Field: whereby his fame was more spread in the West, though not so fortunate as his brothers was in the East, after whom hee liued fifteene yeeres, and with whom hee had raigned other thirteene; and he died, saith Paulus Diaconus, of an infirmitie at Rome, in the yeere of grace foure hundred twenty foure, leauing no issue of his body to succeed him in the Empire.

CHAPTER LIIII.

Theodosius 2. Emp. East.

Valentinian 3. Emp. West.

An. Do. 408.

GReat haue been the Wars and ſtrange the Alterations which both here at home, and through the World abroad haue chanced vnto States ſince the firſt attempts of Iulius Cæſar vnto theſe preſent Emperors, Theodoſius the ſecond, and Valentinian the third, his Aſſociate; whoſe Liues and Raignes did conclude the Succeſsions of the Romiſh Monarchs within this Iland of Great Britaine, and threw downe their Triumphall Arches in many other Prouinces, which for long time had been obſequious to Romes Soueraigne Command. So vncertaine is the Glory of this World, and her Seeming Strength ſo liable to Mutabilitie, that the Powers and Periods thereof held in His hand that holdeth the Vniuerſall Ball, are ſuddenly turned from their high-mounted ſite and beauty of the Sun vnto the Downe-fall and darke ſide of the Globe; and either fall againe into the ſmall Circuit of their firſt compaſſe, after they haue expired their Number, Waight, and Meaſure: or elſe with Daniels Image are vtterly extinct and blowne away, as the chaffe from the Summer flower.

Theodoſius & Valentinian the laſt Roman Monarks in Britaine.

Dan. 2. 35.

(2) The continuance of whoſe Eſtates, ſeeme they neuer ſo Great and Durable in Power, Circuit, Defence, and Multitude, hath ſeldome extended much the limit of Fiue hundred yeeres, but that their high and mounted Flames, fall in the aſhes of their owne conſuming decaies, or elſe hath receiued ſome other alteration of Empires encreaſe, as many learned Writers haue obſered in moſt Common-wealths. So was it in the State eſtabliſhed by God himſelfe among his Peculiar People. As from the Promiſe to Abraham, made of Chriſt the Bleſſed Seed and Life of Man (where ceaſed the Worlds formerly-vſed computation from the Ages of Men) vnto the Law deliuered vpon Mount Sinai, declaring condemnation and death, were foure hundred thirty yeeres: from Iſraels departure out of Egypt, when their Common-wealth beganne to be ruled by Iudges, and Gods ſeruice celebrated in the Tabernacle vnder Curtaines vnto the Building of their Glorious Temple erect by King Salomon, were yeeres foure hundred and eighty. From the Annointing of Dauid, the firſt King, ſet vpon Iudahs Throne, vnto the death of Zedechiah the laſt King thereof, ſlaine by Nebuchadnezer, and that Holy Temple conſumed by fire, were yeeres foure hundred & ſeuentie. And other Politike Eſtates haue ſtood much vpon the like Space of time. For the Kingdome of Athens ſet vp by Cecrops the firſt King thereof, vnto Codrus the laſt, when they changed their Monarchie to a Democracie, is ſaid to haue continued foure hundred and ninetie yeeres. The Lacedemonians State from Lycurgus their Law-giuer, vnto Alexander the Great, that ouerthrew it, flouriſhed the ſpace of foure hundred ninety one yeeres. From the expulſion of Romes Kings vnder Tarquinius, vnto the affected Empire in Iulius Cæſar, were foure hundred ninety and nine yeeres. And omitting many others, to come to our ſelues; from Cæſars firſt Inuaſion of Britaine, vnto the daies of this Valentinian the third, wherein the Romans did quite abandon it, were fiue hundred yeeres. From the Saxons intruſions and diuiſion of this Realme into an Heptarchie vnder their Gouernment, vntill the vnited Monarchie made by King Egbert in the yeere eight hundred and nineteene, were yeeres foure hundred ſixty nine. But from thence, vntill their iſſue failed in King Edward Confeſſor, were yeeres only two hundred forty ſeuen. And from the Normans Conqueſt, vnto the death of that moſt ſacred Soueraigne of eternall memorie, Queene Elizabeth, when began againe the name of GREAT BRITAINE, and the Vnion of the whole Iland to be brought into one intire Monarchie, by the rightfull Succeſsion and thrice-happie entrance of our moſt gracious King IAMES, are yeeres fiue hundred thirtie ſix. But of theſe three laſt, we are to ſpeake hereafter; and now returne to finiſh vp the falling Eſtate of the Romans Greatneſſe.

The time between Cecrops his ſetting vp, and Codrus the laſt. Lycurgus, the time betweene him and Alexander the Great. Tarquinius, the time betweene him and Iulius Cæſar. Cæſar, the time betweene his inuaſion of Britaine, and Valentinian the third. Saxons, the time betweene their intruſions and King Egbert. Egbert, the time betweene him and Edward Conf. ſor. Normans, the time betweene their Conqueſt, and the entrance of our gracious Soueraigne King James.

(3) Theodoſius the ſonne of Arcadius beganne his Empire in the yeere of the worlds ſaluation foure hundred and eight, and was gouerned with a ſpeciall protection by the Perſian King during his Minoritie, vnder the charge of Antigonus an excellent man. But now growne to yeeres, and ſome variance happening betwixt him and his Tutor, he was left to the diſpoſe of himſelfe: and his vncle Honorius leauing at his death great troubles vnquenched in the Weſt, the mightieſt Potentates aſſaied to make themſelues Emperours ouer ſeuerall Dominions, and from the richneſſe of the Imperiall Diademe, each one ſought to plucke a Iewell to beautifie his owne Crowne. So the Barbarous Nations out of this one Monarchie began the foundations of many ſucceeding Kingdomes. For in Spaine the Vandals, Sueuians, and Alanes, not contented with their portion therein aſsigned, betooke themſelues to Armes. The Frankes and Burgundians, which had been driuen out of France, reſolued againe to returne. The Gothes, that were Lords of Barcelona, Narbona, and Toloſa, did as the reſt. The Hunnes entred Hungarie. Iohn the Tyrant held Rome: and in Africa, Boniface became a Neuter. Theſe ſtirres mooued Theodoſius to nominate nominate Valentinian his kinsman Emperour in the west; whose raigne and affaires (so farre as they touch Britaine) we will follow, being the last of the Romane Emperours that held out the succession of our British Monarkes.

The diſſipation of the Romane Empire.

Valentinian elected Emperour in the West.

His descent. In Chap. 52. sect. 8.

(4) This Valentinian was the sonne of Constantine, made Augustus, as is said, and of Placidia Galla daughter to the first Theodosius Emperour: which Lady in the sacking of Rome by Alaricus the Gothe, was taken Prisoner, and by him giuen in mariage to his neere kinsman Athaulphus, who afterwards was King of that Nation; and by her sweet demeanour, and prudent meanes, a Peace was concluded betwixt her Husband and her Brother, but with such dislikes to the Gothes, that they presently killed him, and raised one Wallia for their King; who likewise comming to composition with Honorius, deliuered Placidia according to Couenants, whom the Emperour her Brother bestowed in Mariage vpon Constantine his Generall, in regard of his good seruice and Victories by him atchieued.

Placidia Galla her care of Valentinian her sonne. Aspar and Aetius chosen by her.

(5) Shee, with young Valentinian New-made Emperour, being sent into Italie, selected the best approued Captaines to secure her sonnes Estate; whereof Aspar was one, that in Rome slew Iohn the Vsurper, who had there made himselfe Emperour, stamping this his face and stile vpon the currant Money of the State, and by his Tyrannies held his fortunes for fiue yeeres continuance.

Iohn Vsurper.

Aetius likewise, that had beene Gouernour of Spaine, was imploied into Gallia, where the Frankes and Burgundians (vnder the conduct of Clodius their second King) sought to establish (as shortly they did) their Kingdome in that Countrey, giuing it the name of France, according to their owne, by which name they were neuer knowne to Caesar, Strabo, Pliny, Tacitus, Mela, nor Ptolemie; whereby the great blast of their Antiquitie is shewed to be but a puffe of winde.

France not knowne to Caesar by that name.

Britaines sore oppressed with the Scots and Picts.

(6) At this time the Britaines were againe sore oppressed by the Scots and Picts, who hauing notice that the Aides sent by Honorius were returned, passed ouer the Water in their Boats at both the ends of the Wall, and inuaded the Prouince with such force, that they bare downe all before them. The Britaines in this lamentable plight, sent their Ambassadours to Rome, with their Garments rent, and dust vpon their heads, vnto Valentinian the Third, bewailing their most miserable Estates, and crauing his helpe. The Emperour mooued to remorse, sent a Regiment of Souldiers into Britaine, vnder the Command of Gallio of Rauenna, a most valiant man, who hauing put backe the Enemie with the assistance of the Ilanders, gaue some small comforts to the distressed Britaines. But the Burgundians passing the Rhene, and threatning to waste Italy, Aetius was compelled to recall Gallio with his Legion, to secure the Countrey about Paris, whilest himselfe with his, followed the dangerous Enemie.

Britaines sorrowfull Ambassage to Valentinian.

Britaines obtaine some small succour. Gallio sent to aid them.

Burgundians threaten Italie. Gallio recalled, and the Britaines quite forsaken of the Romans.

(7) He now ready to depart for France, told the Britains that it was not for the Romans to take so long and painefull Iournies, neither at that time especially when their own Empire was in danger to be ouer-run. Therefore he willed them thenceforth to stand vpon their Guard, and to prouide for their owne safeties: and to that end, in regard of their good seruices done to the Romans, he taught them the vse of their Armour and Weapons, as also to strengthen their Fortification, and Wall of Turfe, which now they began to build with firme Stone, laid eight foot in thicknesse, and twelue foot in height. This Wall (saith Gildas) they drew in a straight line (at the publike charges of the State) from East to West, and from Sea to Sea, planting Bulwarkes, and raising Turrets, with conuenient spaces distant one from another; which gaue a faire and farre prospect into the Sea. And so the Romans gaue a finall Farewell, meaning neuer to returne againe; and burying part of their Treasures heere in the Earth, whereof much hath beene found, and more is still sought, left Britaine about the yeere of Christ fiue hundred, after the first inuasion thereof made vnder the conduct of Iulius Caesar.

Gildas.

The time of the Romans finall forsaking of their temporal iurisdiction in Britaine.

(8) This vnfortunate Emperour Valentinian lost not only Britaine, but suffred also Africa, France, and Spaine to be plucked from his Empire: and the weakenesse of the Romans power (whose strength consisted most in Forraine Aides, (as Tacitus saith) was left vnable to defend it selfe; when they had bereft this Prouince of all the Flower and Choice of Men, as Gildas in that age complained, saying, Britaine is despoiled of all her armed men, with her militarie fortes: her Rulers (cruell though they were) are wasted, her Garrisons withdrawn, and defense laid open, and an exceeding great number of her stout couragious Souldiers taken from her, to serue the Romans in their warres. With which his sayings the Roman writers themselues agree, and record the Musters and great multitudes of Britaines that haue beene transported by them out of this Iland: as when Trebellius Maximus with his British Forces made strong the Faction against Otho in Germanie: and then also Honorius Flaccus brought thence eight thousand chosen Souldiers to vphold Vitellius in his cause.

Clodius Albinus.

Clodius Albinus banding against Seuerus the Emperour, assuming the Title, and stamping the Moneyes of the Imperiall Estate (as by this here inserted is to be seene, which comming to our hands since his Storie was written, we hold it more acceptable to set heere, though out of place, then to giue it no place at all in this Worke, being so worthy an Antiquitie, and so much concerning the Britaines) vnder whose Banner the Flower of their Cheualrie perished in Battle, when in the Fields of France; and neere vnto Lyons, they spent their bloud in his cause; whereby the sinewes of their owne Countries defense was sore weakened, and laid open to Forraine Inuaders. Constantine the Great also (as Malmesbury noteth) carried hence a great power of British Souldiers with him in his warres, by whose puissance (as he saith) he obtained Triumphant Victories, and the Empire of the whole World: and after assigned them that part of Gallia to inhabit, which was called Armorica, lying westward vpon the Sea Coasts, where they seating themselues, their posteritie was increased, and continueth a Mightie People euen vnto this day.

Constantine transported a great power of Britaines.

Armorica a part of Gallia giuen to the British Souldiers.

(9) This Countrey afterwards (being conquered by Maximus, and his reconciled Enemie Conan Meriadoc, Lord of Denbigh-land, by the proweese of those British Souldiers whom hence hee carried in his quarrell against Valentinian the Emperour) was receiued in free gift of Conan, after the slaughter of Iubates the King, and the name thereof changed to Little Britaine, as being a Colonie or Daughter of this our Iland. The Prouince is large, pleasant, and fruitfull, and containeth in her Circuit nine Bishops Seas, whereof three are called Cornouaille vnto this day, which are Leonensis, *S. I omit to speak of those other Numbers of men sent for out of this Kingdome by the said Conan, whereof our British Historians make mention; besides the sending of Vrsula with Eleuen thousand Virgins to be matched in mariage with these their Country-men, all of them perishing by Sea or by Sword, but none of them returning hither againe; whereby the bane of the Land presently followed, her hopes being cut off, and depriued of wonted Posterities.

(10) This Conquest and Plantation in Armorica, Matthew of Westminster accounteth to haue happened in the yeer of Christ three hundred ninety two. And these Souldiers thus withdrawne, are so recorded by Henry of Huntington his ancient; and Ninius also long before both, reporteth that Maximus gaue manie Countries to these his Britaines, euen frō the Poole which is on the Top of Iupiters Hill, to a Citie called Cantguic, and vnto the Western Mountaines. These (sayeth hee) are the Britaines in Armorica, who neuer returned to this day, in regard whereof Britaine was Conquered by Strange Nations. With whom agreeth Geruasius a Monke of Canturburie, Iohn Anglicus, Ranulphus of Chester, and others. Thither also in the downefall and desperat Estate of the Britaines, many of them fled from the rage of their Enemies, as hee that was borne in Armorica, and liued neerest to that age, euen the Writer of the Life of S. Wingualof the Confessor, doth sufficiently proue. An of-spring (saith he) of the Britaines embarked in Flotes, arriued in this Land, on this side the British Sea: what time as the Barbarous Nation of the Saxons, fierce in Armes, and vnciuill in manners, possessed their Natiue and Mother Soyle, &c.

(11) And lastly, in the cause of that other Constantine, who was elected only for his Name, most of the Flower and Strength of the Britaines were transported into Gallia and Spaine, where in his variable fortunes many of them perished. And Malmesbury writing of these Times, saith, that the Romans had emptied Britaine of all her Flower and Chiualry of Warre, leauing now in her Countries but Halfe-barbarous men, and in her Cities only Epicures, vnfit for seruice. In confirmation whereof, the most learned Cambden out of Antike Inscriptions, and the Booke named Notitia Prouinciarum, hath obserued, that these Companies vnder written serued the Romans in their Warres, and were dispersed here and there in their Prouinces, which also were from time to time euermore supplied out of Britaine.

(12) No maruell is it then if Britaine lay weake, being thus continually exhausted of her strengths, which these approued Records made so apparant, as we need not alleage the doubtfull Story of Irpus of Norway, for the depopulation of the Iland, who is said by subtilty vnder pretence of Kindred, and Honour to be atchieued, to haue gotten an infinite number of Britaines to follow him in his enterprise, which neuer returned againe: or the Booke Triades mentioned by the Author of the Reformed History of Great Britaine, that bringeth an Army hence, consisting in number of one and twenty thousand men, into Aquitaine and Gaul: which, as he saith, was the Aid mentioned by Cæsar, that out of Britaine assisted the Gaules against him. Which may partly seeme to be gathered from Cæsar himselfe, as hath been said: where he affirmeth, that the Britaines and Gaules were gouerned vnder the same King: and is further confirmed by the fashion and Inscriptions of Antique Coines, which wee haue seene stamped in Gold, the Forme round, and Shield-like: Imbossed outward in the Face, and Hollow in the Reuerse; a Forme vnfallible to be of the Britaines Coines, and yet the word Comes is inscribed vpon the Imbossed side, whom we imagine to be the same Gouernor of Artoye in Gallia, whom Cæsar mentioneth.

And whose Riches had drawne the Worlds then-Monarchs to such liking and loue, that no meanes was omitted to attaine the same, nor care neglected to keepe it in their Subiection: which, while it stood a Prouince in their obedience, was held and accounted to be the faireſt flower in their Triumphant Garlands, and of some of their Emperors thought worthy the Residencie of their Imperiall Throne.

BOOKE VII. CHAPTER I.

BRITAINE thus abandoned of all the Romane Garrisons, and emptied of strengths that should haue supported her now downfalling-estate, lay prostrate to confusion and miserable calamities; no lesse burdened with the tumultuous vproares of her owne great men, who stroue for the supreme Gouernment, then of the Barbarous Nations which with continuall incursions made spoile where they came. These times (saith Ninius) were full of feares, and were prolonged with forty yeeres afflictions: wherein Vortigern then King was troubled with the violence of the Romans, the dreads of the Picts and Scots, and the oppositions of Aurelius Ambrosius, who suruiuing his slaine Parents, that had worne the Imperiall Purple Robe, sought their reuenge vpon their wicked Murderer: besides the Intrusions of the Germane Saxons, called in for Friends, but prooued indeed the greatest Enemies. During the conflict of these tempestuous stormes, some small comforts were ministred vnto the Britaines by Bishop German his presence, who from France assisted them against the Pelagian Heresies, and the perillous assaults of the Scots and Picts, who in diuers skirmishes ouercame them.

(2) These dolorous times of Britaines destruction, Gildas the mournfull Historian, who liued not long after, doth declare. As soone as the Romans (saith hee) had left Britaine, and were returning vnto their home, foorthwith hideous multitudes of Scots and Picts came swarming out of their Carroghes, (wherewith they passed the * Scitick Vale) like whole Armies of duskish vermine, which at high noone, when the Sunne is in his greatest heat, began to crawle foorth of their narrow holes an infinite number of hidcous Scots and Picts; which two kindes of People, though in conditions somewhat different, yet they consorted too well in greedie desire of bloud-shed: and hauing intelligence, the associates of Britaine were now returned with vtter disclaime of further assistance, with more confident bold[ness] then euer before, they seize all the Northerne and vttermost part of the Iland, as if it had beene their own inheritance, euen as farre as to the Wall. Against these attempts there were ranged in the high Forts along the Wall, Garrisons of Souldiers, but such as were both slothfull, and also vnseruiceable for Martiall Affaires: which white-liuered Lozels with quaking hearts sate still warding day and night, till their ioints were as benummed and stupid as the stones whereon they sate: insomuch as the naked Enemies did with long hooked Engines plucke from off the wall those miserable Warders, dashing their bodies against the ground. This good yet they got by this their vntimely deaths, that being thus suddenly dispatched out of the world, they escaped the imminent lamentable calamities that their brethren and children shortly felt. To bee short, hauing abandoned their Cities and this high defensiue Wall, once more they betooke themselues to flight, and were dispersed in a more desperate manner then euer before. For the enemie was more hot in pursuit, and more cruell in the slaughter, the wofull Inhabitants being by their Enemies massacred, and rent in peeces like Lambes in the hands of bloudy Butchers, or in the iawes of cruell and sauage Beasts. In these most miserable times, (necessitie so compelling) the poore distressed people forbare not to rob each other of that sustenance, which could helpe them but for a very small season: and so their hostile oppressions were increased by their domesticke vexations, for that the whole Countrey by these continuall direptions, was vtterly depriued of the staffe of foode, hauing nothing left to prolong their life, but that only what they got in hunting. Whereupon, about the thirtie nine yeere of Theodosius, and of Christ foure hundred fortie six, the distressed Remaines of the down-cast Britaines addressed their missiue Letters to Aetius, whom Gildas calleth Agitius, President of Gallia, in most lamentable manner, and thus inscribed.

afflicted by famine and mortalitie, which at this present extreamly rageth in our Land. And putting him in mind that it much importeth the Maiesty of the Roman Empire to protect and succour their Prouince, seeing it had now stood vpon the point of fiue hundred yeers vnder their obedience, whose strength of Souldiers taken from thence to serue their Emperors in their Wars else-where, was now decaied, and their wealths wasted by maintaining their many Legions in their own Land and abroad: All this notwithstanding the Romans either would not, or could not relieue, hauing enough to doe to vphold their owne; but returned them againe with heauy hearts into the hands of their most cruell Enemies, who now knowing themselues free from the Romans interceptions, as a violent floud brake thorow the Prouince, and bare downe all before them; the Inhabitants flying like chased Deere, some taking ouer Seas into Britany in France; some to South-wales, North-wales, Cornwall, and parts of Deuonshire, leauing the best of the Land to the will of their Persecutors, and much of their Treasures hid in the ground, which neuer after they inioyed.

(4) But the greeuous Famine still increasing, though it had this woful issue with some, that it made them yeeld themselues into the Enemies bloudy hands (onely in hope to gaine a little sustenance of food for the present) and for many yeeres after left lamentable tokens (saith Beda) of great desolations wrought by that dearth: yet with those other which were of more noble and resolute spirits it produced a better effect; insomuch as frō out of the Mountains, Caues, and thicke woods, they assailed their enemies, reposing their trust not in Man, but in God, whose help is then most at hand, when mans helpe faileth. These in many skirmishes gaue them the ouerthrow with much slaughter, and that for many yeeres together, when they made their incursions for booties and spoile; which caused these Rauening Irish to returne home; and the Picts a while rested from further molestation. Notwithstanding the Britaines returned not from their owne wickednesse, growing strong now daily in repressing the Enemie, but stronger in their owne sinnes and ciuill dissensions. By meanes whereof, though a surcease of Hostile Warres was imbraced, and the skarres of famine cleerly skinned vp, yet another sore as dangerous as either, secretly bred, and shortly brake forth. For the Land being free from the Enemies wastes, yeelded such plenty and abundance of all things, as the like before no age had seene; and therewithall such riot and excesse, that the peoples sins grew to a plentiful haruest, as by the words of Gyldas is apparant.

Great sins among the Britaines.

(5) Certainly it is heard (saith he) that there is such fornication, as the like is not among the Gentiles. Truth with the maintainers thereof is hated: Lies with the Forgers thereof highly esteemed. Euill is entertained for good, leaudnesse respected more then vprightnesse, darknesse desired before the bright Sunne, and Satan accepted for an Angell of light: Kings then were anointed, not according to Gods liking, but such as excelled others in cruelue; and as cruelly againe by their anointers were they murdered, not for any demerit, but that they might aduance others more sauage then the former. If hee were milde, or inclining to truth, the darts of hatred were on euery side leuelled against him, as the onely Subuerter of the Britaines Estate. What was pleasing or displeasing to God, was all one with them, sauing that the better things commonly wrought most discontent: so that rightly the saying of the Prophet, which was denounced vnto the people in old time, might bee applied to our Countrey: Yee lawlesse and corrupt children haue forsaken the Lord, and prouoked vnto wrath the holy one of Israel. Why should ye be smitten any more, still multiplying iniquitie? Euery head is sicke, and euery heart is heauy: from the sole of the foot vnto the crowne of the head, there is nothing sound therein. Thus did they all things that were contrary to their safetie, as if that medicine which was bestowed by that truest Physitian of all, was needlesse for the world. And not onely the prophaner sort did this, but also the selected flocke of the Lord, and the Shepheards thereof, who ought to haue giuen example to the whole people. To speake of drunkennesse, numbers of them lay senseless and weltring in wine, swelling with pride, contention, and griping enuie, putting no difference in iudgement betweene good and euill: insomuch that it seemeth contempt was powred forth both vpon Princes and people: and all of them seduced by vanities, wandred in errors and by-paths, not lead in the right way. When God therefore was minded to purge his Familie, and to recure them thus infected with the corruptions of sinnes, by heare-say only of Tribulation, the winged flight of an often-tried rumour pierced the attentiue eares of all men, giuing notice of their ancient Enemies, ready to arriue, and fully minded to destroy them vtterly, and to inhabit (as earst they did) the whole Countrey from one end to another. Yet all this could not reclaime them, but like vnto mad horses, which taking the bit fast betwixt their teeth, runne away with their Riders, so these leauing the way which leadeth (narrow though it bee) vnto saluation, ranne at randome in the wide way of all wickednesse, which leadeth directly to death. Whiles therefore (as Salomon saith) the stubborne seruant will not bee amended with words, he is scourged for a foole, and feeleth not the whip: for loe, a pestilent contagion fell heauily vpon this foolish people, which (though the enemies sword was gone) in short space destroied such multitudes of them, that the liuing were not able to bury the dead. Neither yet also were they thereby bettered, that the saying of the Prophet Esay in them might be fulfilled: God called them to mourning, to baldnesse, and sacke-cloth: but behold, they fell to killing of calues, and to slaying of Rammes; loe, they went to eating and drinking, and said withall, Let vs eat and drinke, for to morrow wee shall die. And indeed the time now drew neere, wherein their iniquities (like as those in times past of the Amorites) should come to the fulnesse. And euen at that instant the like measure beganne to bee heaped vpon the Britaines.

(6) For the common enemie now inuading the Southerne parts, was entred as farre as Stamford vpon the Riuer Welland; whom to resist, the Britaines assembled together, and hauing experience what ciuill iarres had formerly done, they iointly vnite their meanes and powers, and with one consent elect a King to manage these affaires, which was Vortigerne, by birth extracted from the British Line, nobly descended, had not his many vices blemished the same. The British Historie saith, that hee was Earle of Cornwall, and of great command in the daies of Constantine their King, whose simplicitie hee much abused, and whom lastly hee caused to be murdered by the Guard of his Person, the Scots and Picts by him so placed, and to that end instigated: whom neuertheless with death hee seuerely punished, to auoid further suspition. In whose reuenge, these fierce Nations so assaulted his Dominions with rape and spoile, that hee was forced for further assistance to send for these Saxons to his aid. Whether thus, or otherwise, most true it is, the Saxons were sent for, and of hoped Friends, became the tried Enemies to the Britaines and their Estates, as out of Gildas their Historian wee shall anon declare.

(7) The occasion and maner of this their inuiting and comming, is set downe by a Countryman of their owne Witichindus, a Writer of good antiquity, who thus relateth the circumstance thereof. Britaine (saith he) by Vespasian the Emperour, long since being reduced among the Roman Prouinces, and held in their subiection, stood them in no small stead: but their Legions abandoned, and destitute (as it seemeth) *determining the downfall, became soone assaulted by their neighbour Nations the Northerne Borderers. For the people of Rome after that the Emperor * Martiall was slaine by his Souldiers, being tired out with forraine wars, were not able to assist their friends with supply of accustomed aides. And yet had they built a mighty peece of worke for the defence of the Country, reaching betweene the confines from Sea to Sea, where it was thought that the Enemies would assaile the Inhabitants left in the Land. But no difficulty it was for them so fiercely bent, and euer ready to make war (especially where they dealt with a Nation feebled and left vnable to make resistance) to destroy the* Britaines. The Britaines Embaſſage and ſpeech to the Saxons.

"Moſt noble Saxons, the poore and diſtreſſed "Brets, outworne and tired by the many incurſions "of their enemies, hearing the fame of thoſe victories "which you haue moſt valiantly obtained, haue ſent "vs Suppliants vnto you, crauing that you would "not deny them your helpe and ſuccour. A large "and ſpacious Land they haue, plentifull and abun-"dant in all things, which wee yeeld wholly to bee at "your deuotion and command. Hitherto wee haue "liued freely vnder the patronage and protection of "the Romans, next vnto whom wee know not any "more powerfull then your ſelues, and therefore we "ſeeke for refuge vnder the wings of your valour. So "that we may by your puiſſance be ſuperiour of our "enemies, whatſoeuer ſeruice you ſhall impoſe vpon "vs, that will we willingly abide.

To this petition the Peeres and Nobles of the Saxons briefly made anſwer in this wiſe.

The Saxons answere to the Petition of the Britaines.

"Know yee that the Saxons will bee faſt friends "vnto the Brets, and ready at all times both to "aſsiſt them in their neceſsitie, and alſo to procure "their wealth: with ioy therefore returne yee Am-"baſſadors, and with this wiſhed-for tidings make "your Countrey-men glad. Heereupon (according to promiſe) an Armie ſent into Britaine, and ioifully receiued, which in ſhort time freed the Land frō the ſpoiling enemies, & recouered the country vnto the behoof of the Inhabitants.

Saxons good ſeruice at their firſt comming.

(8) But how true this laſt clauſe is, may appeare out of the ancient Gildas, who thus recordeth it: To repreſſe (ſaith hee) many Inuaſions of thoſe their ancient enemies, which with cruell ſlaughters and booties continually afflicted them, the Britaines fell to conſult vpon ſome conuenient courſe therein to be taken. Laſtly, all the Counſellers, together with the proud Tyrant, being blinded in iudgement, deuiſed ſuch a protection, as in the end prooued their Countries deſtruction; namely, that thoſe fierce Saxons, a people ſauage and of hatefull name, odious both to God and man, ſhould be let into this Iland, as it were wolues into ſheepe-folds, to repulſe (forſooth) the Northerne Nations; then which proiect doubtleſſe nothing was euer more pernicious and vnhappie vnto this Land. O ſenſes ſenſleſſe and plunged into deepeſt miſts of errour! O deſperate dulneſſe, and blinde blockiſhneſſe of minde! Thoſe whom in abſence were feared more then death, now of their owne accord are inuited by theſe Princes of Ægypt (if I may ſo ſay, thus ſottiſhly counſelling their Pharao) to come and reſt with them vnder one roofe. Preſently out of the Denne of that barbarous Lioneſſe ruſhed foorth a kennell of her whelpes, in three long Veſſels, called in their Language Cyulæ, carried vnder full ſaile, and with ominous preſages fore-prophecying that for 300. yeeres they ſhould poſſeſſe that Land vnto which they then directed their courſe, and for halfe of that ſpace, (viz. one hundred and fiftie yeeres) they ſhould waſte and depopulate the ſame. Theſe being put on ſhore firſt in the Eaſt part of the Iland, and that by Commandement of this vnfortunate Tyrant, there ſet faſt their terrible pawes, pretending to the Ilanders, defenſe of their Countrey, but more truly intending the deſtruction of them. The foreſaid Lioneſſe finding that her firſt troupe of whelpes ſped ſo well, ſends againe a greater Rabble of the ſame Litter, which heere arriued in Flotes, bringing with them ſome other Aſſociates of baſtardly and vnnoble brood. And theſe beginnings, the ſlips of iniquitie, and the roots of bitterneſſe, (an accurſed plantation well befitting our demerits) haue ſprung vp, and put foorth in our ſoile their haughtie boughes and ſpreading branches. This barbarous Nation thus admitted, profeſsing themſelues our Souldiers, and ſuch as would endure all hazards (ſo they fained) in defenſe for their good Hoſts, firſt they craued ſupplie of victuals only; which being giuen them, for ſome time ſtopped (as we may ſay) the Dogs mouth: howbeit, afterward they complaine that their wages was not bountifully enough paid, deuiſing of purpoſe colourable occaſions of quarrell, and threatning that vnleſſe they might haue more munificent entertainment, they would with the breach of couenant ſpoile and waſte the whole Iland. And without further delay, they ſecond theſe threats with deeds (for our Sinnes, the cauſe of deſerued reuenge, were ſtill nouriſhed) and the fire kindled Eaſtward, was ſet a flaming by theſe ſacrilegious men from Sea to Sea, ceaſing not to conſume all the Cities and Countries bordering thereabout, vntill ſuch time as burning welneere all the Inland Soile of the Iland, it licked (as it were) with the red tongue of the flame the very Weſterne Ocean it ſelfe. In this violent inuaſion, comparable to that of the Aſſyrians againſt the Land of Iſrael in old times, is hiſtorically fulfilled alſo in vs that which the Prophet by way of ſorrowfull lamentation vttereth: They haue ſet fire vpon thy holy places, and haue burned the dwelling place of thy name, euen vnto the ground. And againe: O God the Heathen are come into thine heritage, thy holy Temple haue they defiled: for all the Fortifications demoliſhed with their Engines, and the Inhabitants together with the Biſhops of the Church, and alſo the Prieſts and people, with gluttering ſwords and crackling flames, were all at once laid along vpon the ground, yea and (which was a moſt lamentable ſpectacle) the ſtately Turrets, high mounted Walles, and the ſacred Altars, lay all tumbling together (all purpled with the broken and bloudy Quarters and goared Carcaſes mixed as in a horrible wine-preſſe. Neither were there any other Sepulchers abroad, ſaue the ruines of buildings, and the bowels of wilde beaſts and birds.

(9) During this moſt woſull, deſperate, and tempeſtuous ſeaſon (ſaith the mournfull Hiſtorian) ſome poore Remaines of Britaines being found in the Mountains, were ſlaine by whole heapes: others pined by famine, came and yeelded themſelues vnto their enemies, vpon compoſition to ſerue them as Bond-ſlaues for euer, ſo they might not bee ſlaughtered out of hand: which granted, was reputed a moſt high and eſpeciall grace. Others went ouer Seas into Strange Lands, ſinging vnder their ſpread Sailes with a lamentable and mourning note, that of the Pſalmiſt: Thou haſt giuen vs, O Lord, as Sheepe to bee deuoured, and haſt ſcattered vs among the Heathen. Yet others remained ſtill in their owne Countrey (albeit in fearefull eſtate, and continually ſuſpecting hazard) committing their liues and ſafetie to the high ſteepe Hilles, to craggie Mountaines naturally intrenched, to thick growne Woods and Forreſts, yea and to the Rockes of the Sea.

In which time you ſee they were moſt cruelly purſued with all calamities of warre, and laſtly betraied by them in whom ſo much truſt was repoſed, as mournfull Gildas hath rufully declared.

THE SAXONS ORIGINALL.

CHAPTER II.

AS times decaied Ruines haue ſtopped the Paſſage of thoſe ſmall Springs iſſued from the firſt fountaine of Nations beginnings, and haue diuerted their ſtreames far from any ſure Courſe, or certaine known Heads; ſo the originall parent, place, and name of our Engliſh-Saxons, haue bin writtē with a pen of ſlight touch vpon the leaues of obliuion, or elſe recorded in thoſe obſcure Roules, that as yet lie bound vp in the Office of Times forgetfulneſſe: whereby it reſts doubtfull from what root theſe branches firſt ſprang; ſome bringing them from Aſia, ſome from Africa, ſome from Macedon, ſome from Denmarke, and ſome without all likelihood from Britaine it ſelfe.

Saxons, the vncertainetie from whence they came.

Occa Scarlenſis a Friſlander borne, affirmeth theſe Saxons to come of Saxo a Prince of India, who with his two brethren were baniſhed by lot to ſeeke their deſtinies abroad, their owne Countries being peſtered with ouer many people at home. Theſe (ſaith he) following Alexander the Great into Greece, became Progenitors to their Countries, that from them receiued their of-ſprings and names: as that from Friſo the eldeſt, his Friſlanders deſcended; from Saxo the ſecond, the Saxons vpon the Riuer Albis; and from Eruno the yongeſt, the Inhabitants of the Dukedome of Brunſwic. And of this opinion alſo Sufridus Petri ſeemeth to be. Crantzius doth deriue them from the Catti in Germany, and the Phrygians a Region in Aſia; to omit others, who would bring them from Saxo the brother of Vandale.

(2) F. Albinus a learned Author, doth thinke the Saxons to bee deſcended from Saca, a people in Aſia, and that afterward in proceſſe of time they came to be called Saxons; as if it were written Sax-ſones, as much to ſay as The ſonnes of the Saca. To this opinion Maſter Henry Ferrers, a Gentleman of ancient deſcent, great reading, and a iudicious Antiquary agreeth; whoſe iudgement for my particular, I haue alwaies honoured, and from the Progeny of his Engliſh Monarchs haue taken my principall proceeding in theſe Saxon Succeſſors.

(3) As touching the ancient place of their abode, Ptolomie the Alexandrian placeth the people Saſones in the Inner Scythia, betwixt the Mountaines Alani & Tapuri; and Amianus Marcellinus ſiteth the Saca (no doubt the very ſame) a fierce and ſauage Nation, to inhabit ouergrowne places, commodious onely for cattell, at the foote of the Mountaines Aſcanimia and Comedus, neere vnto which the Citie Alexandria, Tribatra and Drepſa were adioyning, and are ſo ſet by Ptolemie. Neither is it leſſe probable that our Saxons deſcended from theſe Saca in Aſia, then the Germans from thoſe Germans in Perſia, of whom Herodotus writeth. And Ioſeph Scaliger, a renowned Author, ſheweth, that theſe words fader, moder, brader, tutcher, band, and ſuch like, are at this day found in the Perſian tongue in the ſame ſenſe, as we vſe Father, Mother, Brother, Daughter, and Bound, &c. a great inducement (as ſome thinke) for the Saxons originall from thoſe parts; though in my opinion the Latine, Pater, Mater, Frater, haue no leſſe affinitie of ſound, and in all likelihood were the Primitiues to theſe of ours. Of theſe Saca, Strabo writeth that they made inuaſions into Countries lying farre off, as namely Armenia, where they left the memory of their ſucceſſe in a part of that Country, by calling it Sacacena, after their owne name.

In which place they were firſt knowne by the name of the Saxons. And here alſo they among themſelues beganne firſt to be diſtinguiſhed into other Tribes, as Holt-Saxons (for ſo Verſtegan, out of their old Chronicle, ſaith they were called) for their keeping in the Woods: but more properly (wee may ſay) into Saxons, Angles, and Iutes. From hence afterwards they departed, and paſsing ouer the Riuer Elbe, diuided themſelues into two Companies; whereof the one taking into the vpper parts of Germany, by little and little intruded themſelues into the ancient Seat of the Sueuians, which now of them is called Weſtphalia and Saxonie: and the other incroched vpon Friſeland and Holland (then called Batauia) with the reſt of thoſe Countries that lie along the German Seas.

(5) The time wherein theſe Saxons ſhould thus infeſt Germany, by Occa Scarlenſis verdict, is as ancient as great Alexander: others account it long after, in the raigne of Tiberius. But before Ptolomie we finde them not mentioned by any Author, who flouriſhed in the daies of Antoninus Pius, about the yeere from Chriſts Natiuity 140. And moſt certaine it is by Eutropius and Beda, that before the yeere three hundred, when Diocleſian ſwaied the Roman Scepter, the Saxons out of Cimbrica Cherſoneſus ſore offended the coaſts of Britaine and France, with their many piracies, and were fearfull euen to the Romans themſelues. Theſe multiplying in number and ſtrength, ſeated in the Maritime tract of Iutland, Sleſwick, Holſatia, Ditmarſe, Breme, Oldenburgh, all Friſland and Holland: and indeed, according to the Teſtimonie of Fabius Quæſtor, Wholly all the Sea coaſts from the riuer Rhene vnto the Citie Donia, which now is commonly called the Denmarc; and with him Henry of Erfurd affirmeth Saxon-land to ſtretch from the Riuer Albis vnto the Rhene; the bounds of no one people of all the Germans extending any way ſo far, ſaith he.

Juſtus Lipſius and Engelhuſius deriuation of the Name Saxon.

(8) Iuſtus Lipſius coniectureth, and Engelhuſius affirmeth (as Verſtegan ſaith) that the name Saxon, tooke the appellation from the Faſhion of the weapon that vſuallie they wore; which was a Crooked Bowing Sword, ſomewhat like vnto a Sithe, with the edge on the contrarie ſide, called by the Netherlanders, a Saiſen, and by themſelues Seaxen, and the ſhorter of like faſhion for hand-weapons, Seaxes; ſuch as were thoſe that were hid vnder their Garments in the Maſſacre of the Britiſh Nobilitie vpon Salisbury Plaine, when Hengiſt gaue the watch-word, Nem eour Seaxes, that is, Take you Swords: three of which Kniues Argent, in a Field Gules, were borne by Erkenwyne King of the Eaſt-Saxons, vpon his ſhield of Armes, as ſome of our Heralds haue imblazed. And that their Name was ſo giuen them from their Weapons, ſome allege their accuſtomed manner in wearing thereof, which vſually was to truſſe the ſame ouerthwart their backes when they went foorth to battle; whereby notice was taken, and that name attributed vnto them, as the like hath been vpon like occaſion vnto others: for ſo in Aſia the Scythians were named for their skill in ſhooting; in France the Picards for their long Pikes vſed in fight; and in Ireland the Galloglaſſes, which bare the Pollax as their principall weapon: and of latter times, vpon leſſe occaſions haue Surnames growne both to particular men, as alſo to whole Societies; which may appeare in ſuch as hauing vowed their voiage and ſeruice for Ieruſalem, wore continually vpon their backes a red Croſſe, whereby the name Croſſe-backe, or in old Engliſh, Crouch-backe, was to them attributed: in which ranke, Edmund Earle of Lancaſter (ſecond ſonne to King Henry the third) was a principall, and thereby got that name, which he could not claw off from his backe euer ſince. So likewiſe thoſe men who entred that Religion of Monaſticall life, wore vſually vpon the outſide of their Garments the ſigne of a Croſſe, whereby that Order was diſtinguiſhed and noted from others by the name of Crouched or Croſſed-Friers. But whence or howſoeuer the name aroſe, among all the Germans there were none in reputation for militarie deeds comparable vnto theſe Saxons: neither had any aduentured by Sea and Land ſo farre to purchaſe renowne and praiſe, or perhaps (and that more likely) to ſupply their owne wants; ranging often from place to place, as men alwaies ready to enter any action: and in Germanie to this day a great Dukedome retaineth from them the name of Saxonie.

(9) The Gutæ (no doubt the Iutæ) Ptolomie likewiſe placeth in the Iland Scandia, lying very neere the Coaſts of Germanie, vpon whoſe vttermoſt Promontorie (as ſaith an ancient Manuſcript) the Iutes did for certaine inhabite, which vnto this day of the Danes is called Iutland. Theſe Iutes, Gutes, Getes, or Gothes (or as Beda calles them) Vites, gaue names to thoſe parts of Britaine which they inhabited, as to this day the Ile of Wight beareth their impreſsion. This variety of names we will no further inforce, then that theſe Gothes were not the ſame that had paſſed Iſter by Pontus Euxinus, and ouer-ranne Europe, who were alſo called the Getæ by Iohn Maior. Their name, as Verſtegan will haue it, was taken from their agilitie, or ſwiftneſſe of foot: and ſome of them (as Sebaſtian Munſter declareth) went and inhabited among the Mountaines that diuide Germanie from Italie, whereupon their name grew to be called the Hill-Vites, which are now the Heluetians.

(10) The Angles (by Fabius Quæſtor Ethelwardus, an ancient Writer, and a Noble Perſon of the Saxons Royall Bloud) are brought from Ould-Anglia, a Portion lying betwixt the Countries of the Saxons and the Giots, as he writeth them, whoſe chiefe Towne was by them called Sleſwie, and of the Danes, Haithby: but (more particularly) it lay betwixt the Citie Flemburge and the Riuer Sly, which Country by Albertus Crantzius is called Anglia. From hence (ſaith Henricus Rantzouius) the Saxons, who were alſo called the Angle-Saxons, went to aid the Britaines. And at this day there is a little Prouince in the Kingdome of Dania, named Angell, beneath the Citie Flemburge, which Lindebergus calleth Little Anglia. Their ſite notwithſtanding is placed by moſt Authours in weſtphalia, where the Citie Engern ſtandeth, and where Tacitus and Ptolomy rangeth them among the Sueuians; which in their times might very well be. Others would haue them in Pomerania, where the Towne Engloen doth ſomewhat ſound their name: ſo doe Engelheim, Engleburg, and Englerute, places in Germanie, beare witneſſe, and are prints of their footing among the Longobards and Sueuians. But the moſt glorious remembrance of that their name hath beene for theſe many ages in this Kingdome of England: though Saxo Grammaticus (as erſt we touched, Lib. 5. Cap. 2) will needs haue Anglia named from Angul the ſonne of Humblus, and Giant-like brother of Danus the firſt King of Denmarke. But Albertus Crantzius being offended at his folly, telles him that England had the name of Britaine many hundred yeeres after that Angul was dead. Others there are that deriue the name England from the manner of this Ilands ſituation, being narrow in the Weſt and North, for that Eng in the ancient Teutonik Tongue, as well as in the moderne, doth ſignifie Narrow, Strait, or a Nooke; and to that purpoſe doe produce this verſe of a Portugals alluſion:

Or that of Goropius, from the Angle or Fiſhing-hooke, becauſe, ſaith he, they hooked all things to themſelues, and might verie well therefore be called Good Anglers: a very meane conceit in ſooth. But howſoeuer, moſt certaine it is that theſe Angles ſtole the name of this bleſſed Iland from their elder brethren the Saxons (as Iacob did the birth-right from Eſau) and called it after their owne; as wee ſhall further ſhew when our Hiſtorie hath gotten to the age of the Saxons Monarchie.

THE MANNERS AND CVSTOMES OF THE ANCIENT SAXONS.

CHAPTER III.

THeſe Germans, and among them the Catti and Sueuians, (our Anceſtors according to Albertus Crantzius) were a people (ſaith Tacitus) well ſet, ſterne of countenance, tall of ſtature, gray eied, and of a firie aſpect, and their haire yellow. Vnto whom, Witichindus the Monke addeth and ſaith, that They were faire of complexion, cheerfull of countenance, very comely of ſtature, and their limbes to their bodies well proportioned; bold of courage, hardy in fight, and very ambitious of glory: for which parts (ſaith he) the Franks had them in great admiration, and wondered at their new and ſtrange attire, their armour and their buſhie lockes of haire, that from their heads ouer-ſpread their ſhoulders, but aboue all, at their conſtant reſolution and valiant courage. Their heads and beards they ſuffer (ſaith Tacitus) to grow at length, and neuer put off that vowed ornament and bond of valour, vntill they haue ſlaine an Enemie: but then vpon blood and ſpoile, they vncouer their forehead, and ſay they haue paied backe the price of their birth, and thinke themſelues worthy of their Country and parents. Their curled locks (ſaith he) they binde vp in knots, and ſtanding on end, tie it in the crowne only, that is the harmleſſe care they haue of beautie, to ſeeme more terrible to the Enemy. And by Sidonius Apollinaris his teſtimony, they vſed to ſhaue off the haire of their heads, reſeruing onely a tuft in the crowne, about which they wore a hoope or plate of copper, which cauſed the haire to ſtand vpright, as by theſe his verſes appeareth.

There doe we ſee the Saxons clad in blew,
Bold on the Sea, but fearefull now on land:

(2) And that they were indeede bold vpon the Seas, Ægyſippus witneſſeth. The Saxons (ſaith hee) a moſt valorous kinde of men, excell all others in Piracies. In imitation of whom, Iſidore affirmeth, that for their valour and nimblenes in ſeruice they had their name. A people (ſaith he) ſtout, hardie, and moſt valiant, and farre out-ſtripping all others in Piracies, ſeemed more fearfull to liue on Land then at Sea. Whoſe intruſions and ſudden violence both France and Britaine with great dammages felt: for in Gallia they ſeized into their poſſeſsion the Country of * Baiocaſſes, as is to be ſeene in Gregorius Turonenſis, who thence termeth them Saxones Baiocaſsions: and in Britaine an Office of Charge was inſtituted to defend the Coaſts from their irruptions, the Captaine whereof was commonly called the Count or Earle of the Saxon Shoare: of whoſe Piracies and ſauage Cruelties, let vs heare Sidonius in his Epiſtle to Numantius complaine: So many Rowers as you ſee (ſaith he) ſo many Arch-Pirates thinke you behold, they all of them together ſo command, obey, teach and learne, to rob and ſteale. There is no enemie ſo cruell as this, that ſetteth vpon others at vnawares, and as occaſion ſerues, as warily ſlips himſelfe away. Hee ſetteth at nought ſuch as encounter him: hee bringeth to nought thoſe that take no heed of him: whom he courſeth, he ſurely ouertaketh: when he flieth, he is ſure to eſcape. To this ſeruice, Shipwrackes inure him, they terrifie him not. Be there a Tempeſt vp, the ſame ſerueth them, and to aſſaile others. They neuer weigh Ancour vpon the enemies Coaſts, but with a reſolution againe to returne: and their manner is to kill euery tenth Captiue with a lingring and dolorous torment: for to ſuch Vowes they binde themſelues, and with ſuch Sacrifices they diſcharge their Vowes againe, being indeed not ſo much purified by ſuch Sacrifices, as polluted with Sacrilege: and the bloudy and abominable Murderers thinke it a religious thing, rather to torment a Priſoner vnto death, then to ſet him free for a Ranſome.

The homely fashion of the ancient Saxon women in their attire. Paul. Diacon.

The Man and Womans attire differd in nothing, saith he, saving that the women vse linnen Garments trimmed and interlaced with purple, and without sleeues, their armes bare, and bosomes naked and vncouered. Yet Paulus Diaconus speaking of the Longobards, comparing them to the Saxons, saith that their Cassockes were large and worne loose, most of linnen, trimmed and set out with very broad Gards or welts purfleet, and embrodered with sundry colours, and the richer sort with Pearles: their haire bound vp in a copper hoope, stood in tufts vpon the crowne, the rest curled and falling downe vpon their shoulders: their beards they kept still vncut, till they had killed an enemie; and for another note of ignominie, they wore an Iron Ring, as a signe of bondage, till they had cast it from them by the Conquest of a Man. Great Kniues, or rather broad bending Swords, they trussed vpon little Shields thwart their backes, from which (as we shewed) Engelhusius auoucheth they had their appellation. Hee that abandoned or lost this shield in battle (saith Tacitus) was debarred from their publike Sacrifices and Assemblies, the greatest disgrace that could be; for very shame and griefe whereof, many, many times hanged themselues. And vpon these Shields their manner was to lift vp their new elected Generall, and with acclamations so to carrie him thorow their Campe.

(4) For Warres, the Germans by Tacitus are reputed the best, who for two hundred and ten yeeres held tack with the Romans. Not the Samnites (saith he) not the Carthagenians, not the Spaniards, or the Gallois, no not the Parthians haue so much troubled vs: for what can the East obiect against vs, saving the death of Crassus, when he had defeated Pacorus, before trodden downe by Ventidius? But the Germans hauing either slaine or taken Carbo, and Cassius, and Scaurus Aurelius, and Seruilius Cepio, and M. Manlius, haue defeated also fiue Consulare Armies, and Varus with three Legions in Caesars time. Neither haue C. Marius in Italie, or Iulius in Gallia, Drusus or Nero, and Germanicus molested them at home in their Country, but to their more smart. And yet these Saxons among those valiant Germans were accounted the best for courage of minde, strength of body, and enduring of trauell, as Zosimus saith. Terrible also they were, and full of agilitie, by the report of Orosius: and for their sudden inuasions, most feared of the Romans, saith Marcellinus.

(5) Their fashion was to goe foorth singing to the Warres, (or rather they especially are said to march to battle, whereas others are said to goe) carrying before them certaine Images taken out of their consecrated Woods. Their manner was before they ioined Battle, to trie by single Combat (therein arming one of their own against some captiued enemie) what successe was to be expected: and this they kept as a Law vnuiolate, that none might presume to beare Armes before hee was solemnly admitted, where in a frequent Assemblie a Shield was giuen him by his Parents or Kindred: and this was the pledge (as it were) of his first honour, he being till then reputed but a particular of a Familie, but thence-forward a member of the Common-wealth. They are very sensible, wise, and considerate in their seruice, in preferring choice Captaines, in following their Leaders, in obseruing their rankes, in taking the aduantage and benefit of the day, and intrenching in the night, holding Fortune euer doubtfull, but valour alwaies certaine. Their weapons, as testifieth Ioannes Pomarius, were long Speares, broad Swords, and the Crosbow: these they held in such esteeme, that with a horse furnished, Shield, Sword, and Launce, their Virgins were receiued in mariage, accounting them for the greatest bonds, and the very Patron-Gods of Matrimony: which custome might well bee taken from their neighbours the ancient Saracens, whose Maidens vsually presented to their husbands a Tent and a Speare, in way of Dowrie at the entrance of their Nuptials. And among these Germans those Martiall habiliaments were in such vse, that they did meet neither at Feasts nor in Councell, but in their Armour.

A strange diuersitie* (saith he) that the same men should so much loue sloth, and hate quietnesse. It is with them a great shame for their Prince to be ouercome in Valour; but for any one to returne aliue from that Battell wherein the Prince is slaine; a perpetuall infamie and reproach. And that their resolutions were euer noble, and their corage not daunted in distresse or bondage, it well appeared by a whole band of them taken by Symachus, and designed for the Romans pastime of Sword-plaiers, who the same morning that this spectacle was expected, strangled themselues rather then they would incurre such infamie and baseneſſe, as to make others pastime with the ignominious vsage of their owne persons.

(6) Their Lawes were seuere, and vices not laughed at, and good Customes of greater authority among them, then elsewhere were good Lawes; no temporising for fauor, nor vsury for gaine; but bounteous in hospitality, and liberall in gifts, accounting both due to bee giuen and receiued, yea and that without thanks: no Nation freer from adulterie, or punishing that sinne more seuerely. For the woman offending, hauing first her haire cut off, was turned starke naked out of her Husbands house, and that in presence of her owne kindred; thence she was scourged with whips thorow the Towne, without regard of birth, beauty, age or wealth, and neuer after could finde another Husband. Those that were vnnaturally leaud of their bodies, their manner was to drowne them in filthy mud, and to couer them with hurdles. Yea and greater punishments then these the Pagan-Saxons executed vpon such offenders, as by the Epistle of Boniface an English-man, Arch-bishop of Magunce, which he wrote vnto Ethelbald King of the Mercians, in reproouing his adulterous life, is manifest. For (saith hee) in the ancient Country of the Saxons (where there was no knowledge of God) if either a Maid in her fathers house, or one hauing a husband, became a whore, shee should bee strangled with her owne hands closed to her mouth, and the Corrupter should bee hanged vpon the Pit wherein she was buried. If shee were not so vsed, then her Garments being cut away downe from the Girdle-steed, the chaste Matrons did scourge and whip her, and did pricke her with kniues, and so was she sent from Towne to Towne, where other fresh and new scourges did meet and torment her vnto death.

And their seuere Lawes a long time remaining in the daies of Christianitie, doe declare with what rigor (without regard of person) they both examined and punished this offense: whereof that of Queene Emma, the mother of King Edward the Confessor, is a sufficient example, who being accused for incontinencie of body with Alwyn Bishop of Winchester, was inioined to passe ouer nine Plough-share Irons glowing red hot, she being blind-fold and bare-footed; by which triall shee is said to haue acquitted her selfe, insomuch that hauing passed them all before shee knew it, cried and said; O good Lord, when shall I come to the place of my purgation? This punishment beginning in these Pagans, and continuing vnto the yeere 750. Stephen the Second, and most pontificall Pope of Rome, did vtterlie abolish, as too seuere and ouer-rigorous for Christians to vndergoe.

Iſis likewiſe with them was a Goddeſſe of great account, ſo was Eoſter, vnto whom they ſacrificed in the moneth of April; whence it commeth (ſaith Beda) that they called Aprill Eoſter-Moneth: and we ſtill name the feaſt of the Reſurrection, Eaſter. The Images of all theſe they ſtill bare before them in battle, reputing no ſmall confidence in their aides: and yet (ſaith Tacitus) they thought it vnbeſeeming to paint their Gods in the ſhape of men; hauing euen by Nature doubtleſſe written in their hearts, a regard to that demaund of the Lord: To whom will ye liken me that I ſhould be like him, ſaith the holie one Iehoua? They gaue great heede alſo to the neighing of their Horſes, and to the flight and ſinging of Birds, as ominous fore-ſhewers of future euents.

(8) Theſe Superſtitions, Ethelward euen in his daies complained of: That they had infected the Danes, Normans and Sueuians, with the worſhip of this God Wooden; vnto whom thoſe barbarous Nations offered ſacrifices, that they might be victorious where they fought. And as Crantz. recordeth, Herald the firſt of that name, and Norwaies King, was ſo farre ouergone, that he ſacrificed two of his Sonnes vnto his Idols, that he might obtaine a tempeſt to diſperſe, and put backe the Armado, which Herald King of Denmarke had prepared againſt him.

This generall defection of Gods true worſhip, Adam Bremenſis maketh mention of in this manner: In a Temple, ſaith he, *called in their vulgar and natiue ſpeech Vbſola, which is made altogether of Gold, the people worſhip the Statues of three Gods, in ſuch manner, as that Thor the mightieſt of them hath only a Throne or Bed: on either hand of him Woodan and Friſco hold their places. And thus much they ſignifie: * Thor, ſay they, beareth rule in the Aire, and gouerneth the Thunder and Lightning, Windes, Showres, Faire weather, Corne, and Fruits of the Earth. The ſecond, which is Woodan, that is, ſtronger, maketh Warres, and miniſtreth manly valour againſt Enemies. The third is Friſco, beſtowing largely vpon mortall men, peace and pleaſure, whoſe Image they deuiſe and pourtray with a great virile member. Woodan they engraue armed, like as we vſe to cut and expreſſe Mars.*

(9) Their controuerſies and doubtfull matters were decided by drawing of Lots, which they euer made of ſome fruit-bearing tree, and was performed after this manner: If there were publike cauſe, the Prieſt; if priuate, the Goodman of the houſe, or worthieſt in the company, tooke thoſe ſlitted ſlips, diſtinguiſhed with certaine markes that had beene ſcattered at hap hazzard vpon a white garment: and after praiers and inuocation on their God, with eies fixed vpon heauen, and three times lifting the ſame lots aloft, gaue their interpretations thereof according to the markes therein inſcribed; which was receiued and beleeued for a moſt ſure Oracle: as the like was obſerued vpon other occaſions, both by the inſpections of Beaſts intrals, and ſingings of Birds, after the accuſtomed maner of other Gentiles, that doted vpon the augurations for things of future ſucceſſe.

Tacit. in deſcrip. Germ.

(10) For the generall gouernment of their Countrey they ordayned twelue Noblemen choſen from among others, for their worthines and ſufficiency: Theſe in the time of peace rode their ſeuerall circuits to ſee iuſtice and good cuſtomes obſerued, and they often of courſe at appointed times met together, to conſult and giue order in publike affaires: but euer in time of warre one of theſe twelue was choſen to be King, and ſo to remaine ſo long onely as the warres laſted: and that being ended, his name and dignitie of King alſo ceaſed, becomming againe as before. And this cuſtome continued among them, vntill their wars with the Emperour Charles the Great: at which time Wittekind, one of the twelue aforeſaid, a Nobleman of Angria in Weſtphalia, bore ouer the reſt the name and authoritie of King; and he being afterward, by means of the ſaid Emperour, conuerted to the faith of Chriſt, had by him his mutable Title of King turned into the enduring ſtile and honour of Duke: and the eleuen others were in like manner by the ſaid Emperour aduanced to the honourable Titles of Earles and Lords, with eſtabliſhment for the continuall remaining of theſe Titles and Dignities vnto them and their heires. Of whoſe deſcents are ſince iſſued the greateſt Princes at this preſent in Germanie. But though they obſerued this ſaid forme of gouernment elſewhere, yet heere in Britaine it was otherwiſe, as heereafter will appeare.

(11) And thus much out of my poore readings, I haue obſerued of the originall beginnings, the names, maners, and cuſtomes, of our ancient Progenitors, the worthy Saxons, without either amplyfying or impayring their glory: who being of all the Germans ſo much deuouted to warre, as that their only fame therein was many times ſufficieut to daunt the Enemy, were thought vpon by the downe-caſt Britaines as the fitteſt to ſupport their ruiued Eſtate, of whoſe Entrance Conqueſts, and Kingdomes, wee are now next addreſſed to ſpeake.

THE

CHAPTER IIII.

An.Do.450. WHen the ſtate of Britaine was miſerablie torne by the calamities of ciuill Diſſenſions, Famine, Death, and Robberies, the Romans returned, their owne Strength decaied, and their Afflictions daily augmented by their wonted Enemies the Scots and Picts, no hope was left to their deſpairing hearts, that of themſelues they were able to defend themſelues: and therefore (as wee haue ſhewed) they called to their aid the Saxons, a Nation fierce and valorous, who to the number of nine thouſand, vnder the Conduct of Hengiſt and Horſa, two brethren, entred Britaine at Ebsfleet in the Ile of Thanet, in the raigne of Theodoſius the ſecond, and of Valentinian the third, Emperors of the Eaſt and Weſt, about the yeere of Grace 450. Receiued they were with great ioy as Angels from Heauen, and ſaluted with ſongs after the accuſtomed manner of the Britaines, who appointed them the Iland Thanet for their habitation.

(2) Theſe Saxons in ſhort time made proofe of their Manhood. For ouercomming the Enemie euen in Scotland it ſelfe, ſeated themſelues in ſome part thereof; ſo that their Conqueſt ſeemed abſolute, and the Britaines freed from their former aſſaults. Peace thus ſetled, and the Inhabitants freed, a friendly Compoſition was made betwixt theſe Nations, wherein the Saxons vndertook to maintaine the Field, and the Britaines to ſuſtaine the Charge. In which league they aboad ſome certaine time, ſaith *Witichindus, making vſe in a ciuill ſort of the Brets friendſhip: but ſo ſoone as they perceiued the Country large, the ſoile fertile, and the hands of the Inhabitants ſlow to practiſe feats of Armes: and further conſidering with themſelues, that themſelues and the greateſt part of the Saxons had no certaine place of aboad, they found fault with their pay and want of victuals, making that their quarrell, as both too meane, and too little for their high deſerts, threatning withall, as vnkind Gheſts, that ſhortly they would reckon without their Hoſts: and thereupon ſending ouer for more of their Nation, entred peace with the Scots & Picts, who all together roſe againſt the poore Brets.

Hengiſt had the whole poſſeſſion of Kent.

(3) And Hengiſt, that by the gift of Vortigern had got the whole poſſeſſion of Kent, ſent for more ſupply of Saxons vnto his ayde, pretending imployments of their ſeruice in other parts, but indeede to make ſtrong his owne deſignes: and theſe ſwarming daylie ouer into Britaine got the ſtrength of munition and command of military affaires without impeach: For the King holding himſelfe now ſure from all interceptions, gaue his immoderate ſenſes ſcope to nouriſh more freely their ſenſuall pleaſures, and committed more audaciouſly thoſe vices, vnto which his owne corrupt nature was naturally addicted. This Hengiſt ſoone perceiued, and to adde more matter fit for flame, fed ſtill the humors of this vicious King, outwardly ſhewing his care and readineſſe for the Lands defence, his counſell and loue to the Nobles in eſtate, and his courteous carriage to the Commons in generall; but to the King an ouerſeeming dilligence, and ſeruile obedience: by all which, ere it was long, he gaue fire to the traine, that blew vp the foundations of the Britiſh policie.

John Stow. Hengiſt feaſteth the King.

(4) For feaſting the King in the Caſtell of Tonnge, commanded his daughter, a Lady of paſsing beautie, to attend the banquet, whoſe excellent feature and ſeemely behauiour, blew the ſparkes of deſire ſo right into Vortigerns wanton eie, that they preſently kindled a flame in his laſciuious heart: for in the midſt of his cups, Rowena (ſo was the damoſell called) with a low reuerence and pleaſing grace, ſaluted the King with a cup of gold full of ſweet wine, incharming it with theſe words in her language; Waes heal hlaforo Cyning, which is in our Engliſh, Be of health Lord King: he demãding the meaning, would be taught to anſwer to her owne vnderſtanding, and ſaid, Dpinc heal, that is, Drinke health; whereof when hee had pledged her (as we ſpeake) this bowle infected his ſenſes with no leſſe ſottiſhneſſe, then that of Belus is ſaid to doe Dido, when Cupid plaid the childe Aſcanius betwixt Æneas and her. And brought more bale to the Land, then afterwards did that which was preſented to King Iohn at Swinſted Abbey by Simon the poiſoning Monke: for notwithſtanding that hee had a Queene then liuing, (himſelfe not young, hauing ſonnes at mans eſtate, in profeſsion a Chriſtian, whoſe Religion alloweth neither polygamie nor adulterie) did importunate Hengiſt that Rowena might be his wife: which at firſt with ſome ſhew of excuſe and vnworthineſſe of perſon, was denied, but laſtly conſented vnto, and the Nuptials performed. And now Fortune caſting occaſion daily into Hengiſts lap, hee gaue his aſpiring thoughts no reſt, till hee had got the Crowne from Vortigerns head, and ſeized all vnder the Saxons power.

Hee growne now into high fauour with the King, by the mariage of Rowena, and feared of the Nobility for his ſtrength and policie, bare himſelfe great among all, and his ſupplies daily arriuing, peſtred (if it not plagued) moſt parts of this Iland. For ſaith Ninius and Beda, the riches of Britaine, and the fertilitie of the ſoile, were ſuch motiues to their couetous and aſpiring mindes, that where they got footing, there they kept ſtanding, and picked occaſions where they were too ſtrong. Among thē that were ſent for, by the aduice of Hengiſt, two principall Captaines, Octa and Ebiſſa were chiefe, who being embarked in forty Pinnaces, ſailed about the Picts Coaſts, waſting the Iles that were called the Orcades, and got many Countries from them beyond the Frith, whereby a further terrour was ſtricken into the Britaines hearts.

(8) The Nobilitie perceiuing what was in worke ing, and the marke whereat Hengiſt ſet his eie to aime, complained to the King of their dangerous eſtate, ſhewing themſelues agreeued to bee diſpoſſeſſed of Offices and Charge, (as Guorong the Earle or Lieutenant of Kent, by Hengiſt had beene) the Land peſtred with ſtrangers, that ſought their ſubuerſion; reprouing him much for his match with that Infidel Rowena, his owne careleſſe gouernment and adulterous life, and in ſuch manner, that Vodine Archbiſhop of London, a man of great ſanctitie, feared not to tell him that therby he had indangered both his ſoule and Crowne; which words by Vortigern were ſo digeſted, that ſhortlie it coſt the good Archbiſhop his life. But hee ſtill continuing in his laſciuious and careleſſe idleneſſe, was laſtly taught by wofull experience, what miſerie wilfull raſhneſſe and neglected gouernment do bring: for the Britaines his ſubiects no longer would be thus abuſed, to ſee themſelues wouen into greater danger by ſhew of defenſe, then they formerly had beene by the hoſtilitie of the enemie; but forthwith diſclaimed their obedience to the King, when he had raigned the ſpace of ſix yeeres, and choſe for their Gouernour his ſonne young Vortimer.

(9) His Sonne he was indeed by nature, but not his in conditions, who (beſides the quarrell of his Queene mother for Rowenas ſake reiected) bare an inward loue to his natiue Country, and an outward hate to the ſtrangers that daily ſought the ſubuerſion thereof, and preſently encountred with them in a pitched Battell neere vnto Ailsford in Kent, wherein Catigern and Horſa, brethren to Vortimer and Hengiſt, in ſingle fight hand to hand ſlew each other.

(10) Three other Battles after this with variable ſucceſſe were fought betwixt the Britaines and the Saxons, one at Craford, another at Weppeds-fleet, and the third vpon Colmore; in which laſt the Britaines bare themſelues ſo valiantly, that the Saxons were driuen into the Iſle of Tanet (if not ouer the ſeas) ſo that ſmall hope reſted for them ſo long as this valiant Vortimer liued, who had diſpoſſeſſed them of all their footing in the Continent, and often aſſailed them in Tanet, as Fabian ſaith. After this Victorie long hee liued not, but was made away by poiſon through the meanes of Rowena the mother of all this miſchiefe, when he had ſate King the ſpace of foure yeeres; and the father againe reeſtabliſhed.

(11) Vortigern now was no ſooner reſtored, but that Hengiſt had notice thereof, who was then in building a Caſtle at Leiden in Holland, as their Annales doe witneſſe, and Iohn Douſa in his verſes ſpecifie: where leauing all (as it were) at randome, returned to follow his fortunes further in Britaine, and with a mighty Armie of his Saxons thought to land without impeachment: but the Britaines growne bold by their former victories, and their bloud not cooled ſince it was heat in fight, admoniſhed their reeſtabliſhed King, who with them went to withſtand his ariuage. When Hengiſt therefore perceiued their courage, and knew their hatreds to him and his Saxons, hee ſought by ſmooth words to gaine the ſhoare; and by ſome ſtratageme, his wiſhed deſire: therefore pretending only to viſit his daughter, yea and to rid the Land of her, if ſo he might haue leaue of the King and them; and therefore deſired a conference in friendly manner: after which, his Saxons ſhould depart the Land, and reſt the like friends to the Britaines as they were when firſt they came in.

(12) This motion ſeemed reaſonable to the Nobilitie, and the place and time appointed, which was the firſt of May, and vpon the Plaine of Ambrij, now called Salisbury: whither vpon equall tearmes (as was thought) each partie repaired, and a while conferred with friendly ſemblances; but in the end the Saxons vrging their wrongs, fel from words vnto blowes, the watch-word firſt giuen by Hengiſt their Leader. The Britaines meant ſimply, and ware no weapons, according to couenāts: but the Saxons vnder their long Caſſocks had ſhort Skeines hid, with which, no ſooner the words, Nemeowr Seaxes, were pronounced, but that each ſlew him with whom he conferred, by which treaſon the Britaines loſt three hundred of their diſarmed Nobilitie, onely Eldol Duke of Gloceſter, as Randulph Higden declareth, with a Stake gotten from the hedge, ſlew ſcuenteene Saxons. The King they tooke priſoner; for whoſe ranſome, the Countries of Kent, Suſſex, Suffolke, and Northfolke, were deliuered vnto theſe Infidels, who ſhortly defiled the beauty of Chriſtianitie with their Paganiſme and heatheniſh cruelties. Then (ſaith Beda) the fire of Gods vengeance was kindled by theſe wicked Conquerors, and raged firſt vpon thoſe Countries next adioyning, and afterwards from the Eaſt Sea vnto the Weſt, without reſiſtance made to quench the ſame, publike and priuate houſes were ouerthrowne and laied leuell with the ground, Prieſts were ſlaine ſtanding at the Altars, and Biſhops with their flocks were murthered; neither was there any to bury the dead. And theſe are the times whereof we ſpake, and wherein the miſerable Britaines abandoned the Land or hid themſelues in caues, where in they either periſhed for hunger, or redeemed their liues with perpetuall ſlauery.

Theſe pillars of Gods truth, after they had powred forth praiers, and conuicted the Heretikes, lead an Armie of Britaines againſt the Picts and Saxons, and gained the victorie; after which (like vnto people that drew on Gods vengeance and their owne deſtructions) they fell to robberies and rapine, one Citie banding againſt another, and all laid waſte by the Saxons and themſelues. This Caſtle moſt of our Writers haue ſaid to bee in South-Wales, vpon a rockie and ſolitarie mountaine called Breigh, or after others Cloaric, in the Weſt of that Prouince, not farre from Radnor, and neere vnto the Riuer Gnant: but the inhabitants of North-Wales report (by the reports of their anceſtors) that in old Bethkelert was that Caſtle, which Vortigern built, and is yet called Embris, from Merlin Embris, as they affirme. And ſurely (beſides the craggie and ſolitarineſſe of the place, which ſeemed to mee rather an entrance into the ſhadow of death, then to be the Palace or Court of a King) the Riuer Llynterrenny mooueth much, by which Fauſtus his ſonne, begotten of his own daughter Rowena, is ſaid to ſpend his life in continuall praiers.

This Ambroſius (ſaith Beda) was a gentle natured man, which only of all the bloud of the Romans remained then aliue, his parents being ſlaine, which had borne the name of the King of the Countrey. Hee with his brother Vter, commonly called Pendragon, returning out of Britain Armorica, where they had remained from the Tyrannie of Vortigerne, landed at Totneſſe in the Weſt of this Iland; vnto whom reſorted great Troopes of Britaines.

(16) Next, following the common Enemie, hee gaue battle to the Saxons on the North of Humber, at a place called Maesbell, wherein Hengiſt was diſcomfited, and in flight taken by Earle Edol of Gloceſter, and beheaded at Cunningsborrow, ſaith he of Monmouth. Howbeit, Matthew of Weſtminſter maketh him fight another battle vpon the Riuer Dun, in Anno 489. wherein, ſaith he, Hengiſt was taken. And Polydore ſaith, that in the ſame battle Hengiſt at the firſt anſet was ſlaine, with many of his Germans: the fame of whoſe victorie (ſaith he) is had in memorie with the Inhabitants of thoſe parts euen vnto this day. Yet Gildas, Beda, and Ethelward, Writers of thoſe ancient times, and two of them Saxons, mention not the death of Hengiſt, neither this great victorie of the Britaines. With whom alſo Florentius the Monke of Worceſter agreeth. Howſoeuer, ſure it is, had not the diuine power of God otherwiſe determined, the waning eſtate of Britaine doubtleſſe had recouered her former ſtrength; both by the praiers of Biſhop Germain, the proweſſe of this laſt ſpoken of Ambroſius, the valorous attempts of Vter Pendragon, and the worthy induſtries of the Chriſtian King Arthur. But the Britaines ſtrength daily decreaſing, and new ſupplies of theſe Saxons daily arriuing, brought the one in deſpaire to enioy their owne right, and the other to triumph in their intruſions of wrongs. For continually incroaching forward, and inlarging their limits whereſoeuer they came, droue the inhabitants before them from their wonted poſſeſſions, & ſeated themſelues in the ſouthern and beſt part of the Land, laying the ſtones (as it were) of thoſe foundations, whereupon in ſhort time they raiſed their moſt glorious buildings.

(17) For euery ſeuerall Captaine or Commander accounting that part his owne, wherein he firſt entred or made conqueſt of, with full reſolution determined to keepe what he had got, and (as an abſolute King) commanded his Prouince, whereby the Land became burdened with ſeuen of them at the firſt: as Hengiſt of Kent; Ella, of thoſe parts now called Suſſex and Surrey; Cherdik, of the Weſt; Erchenwin, of the Eaſt; Ida of the North; Crida, of the Middle-land; Vffa, the parts now Middleſex and Eſſex: which Kingdomes thus begunne and erected, ſtood not long vnſhaken by ciuill diſſenſions among themſelues, each King enuying his equals greatneſſe, and ſeeking to inlarge his owne Dominions vpon the next. In which combuſtions, few or none of them came to the graue in due time, but were either ſlaine in warres, or treacherouſly murdered in peace, or elſe inforced to ſheare himſelfe a Monke, and reſigne his Crowne to another. To ſpeake of all theſe together, I hold would bring too great a confuſion to our Hiſtorie, and a needleſſe ſurcharge to the Readers memorie: To auoid which, I will briefly ſet downe the Conqueſts, Circuits, Acts, and Deſcents, that in euery ſeuerall Kingdome happened while they ſtood in their Heptarchie, before they were vnited to an abſolute Monarchie; and then (according to my prefixed purpoſe) continue the ſucceſſion of GREAT BRITAINES Monarchs.

The Saxons often at diſſenſion among themſelues.

(18) For albeit the Land was diuided into 7. ſeuerall Kingdomes, and each of them carrying a ſoueraigne command within his owne limits, yet one of them euer ſeemed to be ſupreme of the reſt; and that Prince who had the greateſt power or ſucceſſe in his warres, was euer accounted and called The King of the Engliſhmen, as Venerable Beda in the fifth Chapter of his ſecond Booke, and Hiſtorie of England, euer termeth them.

The mightieſt of the Saxon Kings alwaies King of the Engliſhmen.

(19) Such therfore as held the reſt vnder, either by Armes or alliance, in amitie or ſubiection, ſwaied the whole Monarchy, and were acknowledged as Supremes in power ouer the reſt, which ſucceeded not euer in the ſame Familie, neither continued in one and the ſame Kingdome without reuerſement, but were carried vpon the Flouds and Ebbes of variable ſucceſſe, or as deſtinie pleaſed to alter the chance: wherof each of them (ſauing the Eaſt-Saxons only) did attaine to the height of that gouernment, as to the hauen of their wiſhed deſires. See therefore (if you pleaſe) a generall view of the whole, and afterwards the ſeuerall Hiſtories of euery Kingdome apart, before wee enter into the Succeſſion of the Engliſh-Saxons Monarchs.

Onely the Eaſt-Saxons intruded not on their neighbours dominions.

THE KINGDOME OF KENT BEGVN BY HENGIST THE SAXON, WITH THE SVCCESSION OF THEIR KINGS, THEIR ISSVES AND RAIGNES.

CHAPTER V.

1. An.Do.455. Kent in the daies of Iulius Cæsar the Seat of foure Kings.

KEnt, the first Dominion of the Saxons Heptarchie, was formerly in the daies of Iulius Cæsar, the Seat of foure seueral petty Kings, yet neuer called a Kingdome, before that Hengist, the first Saxon Captaine, in fauour of his Daughter Rowena, got it by the gift of King Vortigern, about the yeere of Grace 455. and in the seuenth yeere after his first arriuage, heere he first laid the foundation of those fortunes which the Saxons his Nation in this Land afterwards attained vnto: for hauing possessed the same with Victorie and Wealth the space of thirty one yeeres, (some adde three more) he left it in peace to his sonne Eske; and the rest of the Iland so weakened by his meanes, that others of his Nation were shortly planted in other parts thereof. It contained the Continent that lieth betwixt our East-Ocean and the Riuer Thames, being bounded vpon the West with Sussex and Surrey.

Hengist his raign and death.

Of Hengist see more in the succession of the English Monarchy, cap. 12.

2. An.Do.488. Petrus Albinus. Eske the second King of Kent. Retained prisoner in Yorke.

ESke, the second King of Kent, is reported to bee the second sonne of King Hengist, who accompanying his father into this Iland, made proofe of his great valour in all his Battles fought against the Britaines, and in one of them (as Geffrey of Monmouth reporteth) being taken prisoner, was for a time retained in Yorke, but thence escaping, hee aided his father in the Battle of Crekynford; and after his decease, succeeded him in the Kingdome of Kent, from whom those Inhabitants (saith Beda) were called Eskings, amongst whom he peaceably raigned about twentie yeeres, and died in the yeere of our Lord 512.

His raigne and death. Beda hist. Angl. lib. 2. cap. 5.

3. An.Do.512. Octa his raigne.

OCta the sonne of Eske began his raigne ouer his Fathers Dominions, the yeere of Christs Incarnation 512. and raigned twenty two yeeres, without mention of any memorable Act.

4. An.Do.532. Florent Wigorn. Imerik the sonne of Eske. Imerik his children.

IMerik, the sonne of Eske, and the fourth King of Kent, raigned twenty fiue yeeres, saith Stowe; twentie nine, saith Sauil in his Table collected from our English Writers. He had issue, Ethelbert the first Christian King of Kent, and a daughter named Rikell, maried to Sledda the second King of the East-Saxons, the mother of Sebert and Segebald.

5. An.Do.561. Ethelbert the sonne of Imerik.

EThelbert, the sonne of Imerik, in the yeere of grace 561. succeeded him in the Kingdome of Kent, who by reason of his young yeeres, was sore molested by his neighbour Princes, that sought to inlarge their Prouinces vpon him: for now the Saxons hauing made full Conquest of the Britaines, fell at variance among themselues, taking all occasions to supplant each other, as Conquerours commonly can endure no equals, and prosperitie euer is looked at with an enuious eie; whereupon Cheulin King of the West-Saxons, proud of his victorious successes ouer the Britaines, beganne to disdaine all amitie with his owne neighbour Saxons, inuaded the Territories of this young Prince, and in a set Battle slew Oslaue and Cnebban, two of his Dukes, discomfited the King, and wonne the day. This field was fought at Wiphandun, in the yeere of our Redemption 567. and is noted to bee the first Battle betwixt the Saxons themselues since their first entrance into Britaine.

Cheulin inuadeth his Territories.

But young Ethelbert growne vnto yeeres, repaired his losses with the inlargement of his Kingdome to the banks of Humber, and was the fifth Monarch of the Englishmen, as after we shall heare. His first Wife was Berta, the daughter of Chilperik, King of France, by whom he had Edbald, Ethelburg, and Edburg: a second Wife he had vnworthy of name, for her incestuous and abominable act, in matching her selfe in marriage with her Husbands Sonne, A sinne (saith the Apostle) not to be named among the Gentiles. Of this King, as also of all the rest that attained vnto the glorie, to bee enstiled (per excellentiam) the Soueraigne Kings of the Englishmen, I purpose to bee sparing in their particular Kingdomes, and to reserue the larger relation of their Acts, Matches, Issues, and continuance, to the times of their seuerall Monarchies, whereby a more historicall course may be carried, through the successions of the English-Saxon Monarches, and a needlesse repetition of the same things auoided, which otherwise of necessitie would follow. Hee raigned in great glory fiftie six yeeres, and was the First Saxon King that receiued and established the Gospell. He died the foure and twentieth day of Februarie, the yeere of Christ 616. after he had raigned 56. yeeres, and was buried at Canterbury, with this inscription vpon his Tombe:

Ethelbert the fifth Monarch of the Englishmen. His first wife, and children by her. In the life of Saint Werburg. His second wife.

6. An.Do.617. Beda hist. eccles. Ang. lib. 2. cap. 5. Edbald, his father dead, refused the doctrine of Christ. He married his Mother in Law.

EDbald, the sonne of King Ethelbert, in the yeere of Christ 617. assumed the Gouernment of Kent; who no sooner, saith Beda, had gotten from vnder the awe of his father, but he refused to entertaine the Doctrine of Christ, and so polluted himselfe with the foule sinne of fornication, as that hee married his Mother in Law, the late Wife to his owne Father: which two hainous faults gaue his subiects both occasion and impunity to returne to their former idolatry, who vnder his Father, for fauour, or for feare, had yeelded to the Lawes of the Christian Faith. the scourge of God & vengeance from Heauen wanted not to the punishment of this vnfaithfull King: for he was plagued for a season with often phrensie of minde, and raging fury of an vncleane Spirit; but by Laurence Archbishop of Canturbury, he was at length conuerted from his Idolatry and incestuous Matrimony, and being baptized, indeuoured to maintaine the state of the Gospell. He married Emme, the daughter of Theodebert, King of Austrasie, now Lorrayne, by whom he had issue a Daughter named Enswith, who died a Virgin at Fulkestone, a Religious House in Kent of her Fathers foundation; and two Sonnes, whereof Ermenred the elder died before his Father, and left issue Dompnena, who was married to a Mercian Prince; Ermenberg that died a vailed Virgin, Ermengith a mention; Ethelred and Ethelbert, both murthered by their Cosin-german, King Egbert. His younger Sonne was Ercombert that succeeded him in the Kingdome. This Edbald built a Chapell within the Monasterie of Saint Peter and Paul at Canturbury, in honour of Mary the blessed Mother of God, endowing that Church with sufficient maintenance; wherein, after the continuance of twentyfoure yeeres raigne, he was buried neere to King Ethelbert his Father, Anno 640.

ERrcombert, the Son of Edbald by Emme his Wife, succeeded his Father in the Kingdome of Kent, in the yeere of grace 641. He was a vertuous, religious, and Christian King: for the Temples of the Heathen Idols he suppressed, and commanded the fast of Lent to bee obserued. His Wife was Sexburg, the daughter of Anna King of the East-Angles, by whom he had issue Egbert and Lothair, both Kings of Kent after him; Ermenhild, Wife to Wolfere King of Mercia, and Erkengode a professed Nunne in the Monastery of Saint Brigets in France; where she died, and was interred in the Church of Saint Stephen. In his daies the state of the Church growing to a well setled forme of gouernment, the Prouince of Kent was diuided into Parishes by Honorius the Archbishop, as testifie the Records of Christ-Church in Canturbury. This King hauing raigned twenty foure yeeres and odde moneths, died in the yeere of our Lord 664.

EEgbert, the elder Sonne of King Ercombert, in the nonage of his yong Nephewes, Ethelred and Ethelbert, (the sonnes of his Vncle Ermenred) obtained the Rule of Kent, and had not their murther much blemished his peaceable Gouernment, hee might well haue held place with the worthiest of those Kings: but thirsting after an absolute soueraigntie, and fearing lest his owne power should diminish by their growths and rightfull successions, he set his mind on that bloudy, traiterous, and vnnaturall attempt, and with the assistance of one Thurne, found fit place and opportunitie to worke that diuelliish designe, casting their bodies into a Riuer, that so their Murthers might not be knowne. But God (saith Malmesbury) that searcheth the heart, reueiled the act, by casting vp their bodies on the shore, and to the open view of the next Inhabitants, who with great reuerence there buried them, and built a small Chapel ouer their Monument, whose bones afterwards were remoued, and new interred in the Abby of Ramsey in Hantshire. The Lady Dompnena their Sister, and next Heire to the Crowne, that was married to Merwald, a Prince of West-Mercia, and borne him foure Children, founded the Abbey of Minster in Kent: Wherein, saith Stowe, she became the first Abbesse her selfe, and Mildrith her daughter succeeded her therein, saith Capgraue. This King in great quietnesse raigned nine yeeres, and died in the yeere of grace 673. in the moneth of Iuly: leauing issue Edrik and Wigtred, both Kings of Kent, succeeding after Lothaire.

LOthaire the brother of Egbert, by strong hand obtained the gouernment of Kent. For notwithstanding Egbert left issue Edrik and Wigtred, (as is said) yet Lothaire taking the aduantage of their minorities, and the example of his brothers intrusions, made himselfe King against his, as he had done against the Sonnes of Ermenred, but did not inioy the same with the like peace as he had done. For not onely Ethelred the Mercian warred strongly against him, but also Edrik, by the assistance of the South-Saxons cõtinually sought to recouer his right, whereby the peace of the Kentish was much molested: and lastly, in a bloudy battell was Lothaire shot thorow with a dart, whereof he died, vnder his Chirurgeons hand, the sixth day of February, in the yeere of Christ 685. after hee had raigned eleuen yeeres and seuen moneths. The punishment of the Murther committed by his brother Egbert, was on him repaied, saith Malmsbury, who derided and made iests at the laments for young Ethelred and Ethelbert, that were by the people held and accounted Martyrs. His body was buried with his Predecessors, Kings of Kent, in the Monastery of S. Peter and Paul in Canturbury, Anno 685.

To meet these, the Kentish assembled, and getting the aduantage, burned Mollo to death: in whose reuenge Ceadwalla persisted, and wasted the most part of that Prouince before he departed: so that after for six yeeres continuance no King raigned in Kent, but the Country lay exposed to the tyrannies of oppressors.

He entred his Kingdome the yeere of Mans Redemption 693. the eleuenth of Nouember, and two hundred and fiue yeeres, after the death of Hengist the first Saxon. But now the heauenlie prouidence determining to bring againe together that which the Saxons had diuided, raiſed from exile little Egbert, to make him the Great Monarch of the Engliſh-men. His firſt wars were againſt Bernulfe King of Mercia, and his ſecond againſt this Baldred, King of Kent, whom in Battle he vanquiſhed, and forced him out of his Kingdome, after he had ſate on that princelie Throne the ſpace of eighteene yeeres. This Baldred is ſaid to haue fled ouer Thames, and to leaue Kent to the will of his Conquerour, whither againe he neuer returned, neither yet was heard of after his ouerthrow. The limits of this kingdome.

THE Kingdome of the South-Saxons, containing the Countries of Suſſex and Surrey, had on the Eaſt ſide Kent; on the South, the Sea and Ile of Wight; vpon the Weſt, Hant-ſhire, and the North ſide inuerged with the riuer Thames. This Kingdome was erected by Ella a Saxon-Captaine, that in the ſecond yeere of Hengiſts entrance, as ſome ſay, brought a ſupply of his Saxons into Britaine, with whom came his three ſonnes, Kymen, Plenching, and Ciſſa, theſe landing at a place which from Kymen was afterwards called Kymeniſhore, and diſcomfiting the Inhabitants, that made reſiſtance, became himſelfe King of thoſe Southerne parts. But doubtleſſe there are many opinions of this mans firſt entrance and new erected eſtate: for ſome (as M.Sauile in his Table) ſet it in the ſecond yeere of Hengiſts firſt arriuall, Anno 452.

CHAPTER VII.

The VVeſt-Saxons the firſt that brought the Heptarchy to a Monarchy.

THe Kingdome of the Weſt-Saxons, though in time later then the two former, yet in circuit and fame ſurmounted them both; whoſe Monarch was the Maull that firſt brake the Scepters of the other ſix Kingdoms in ſunder, and made one Crowne of theſe their ſeuerall Diadems, more glorious then they all, and that firſt worne vpon Egbert the Weſt-Saxons heads, and the Scepter ſwaied in his Imperiall hand; vntill whoſe time and perſon wee will continue the ſucceſsion of their Kings, beginning with Cherdik that firſt made it a Kingdome, and briefly ſhew their Acts, whileſt it ſo ſtood in the Saxons Heptarchie.

Florent. Wigor.

2. An. Do. 495. The time when Cherdik entred into Britaine.

THis Cherdik is ſaid to haue brought a ſecond ſupply of Saxons forces into Britaine, in the yeere of our Lord 495. and fifth of the Monarchy of King Ella: his landing being at a place on that occaſion called Chederik-ſhore, who with his ſonne Kenrik, was encountred countred by the Britaines, vnder the conduct of Natanleod a Britiſh Prince, whoſe Country was then called after his name; whom he ſlew in Battell, with fiue thouſand more of his Britaines: the fortune of which field gaue reſolutions and hopes of better ſucceſſe; it was fought neere vnto a Brooke vpon that euent called Cherdiks-ford, now by contraction Chard-ford. Heereupon eſtabliſhing his new erected Kingdome, (which contained Cornwal, Deuonſhire, Dorſetſhire, Somerſetſhire, Wiltſhire, Hantſhire, and Barkſhire,) he inlarged the ſame with the conqueſt of the Ile of wight, the gouernment whereof was by him giuen to Stuffe and Withgar his Nephewes, which later ſlew the Britaines there inhabiting, and named the place of his victory Withgarbirg, aſſuming the name of King, and was buried at his Citie Withgar, in the ſame Ile. About ſeuen yeeres after Cherdiks entrance, Portha Saxon, with his two Sonnes, Megla and Beda, landed in the Weſt, at the place from him called Porteſmouth, whoſe aid with Kent and Suſſex, aſsiſted Cherdik in his Conqueſts. His raigne is ſet to be thirty three yeeres; and his death in the yeere of grace fiue hundred thirtie fiue: hauing had two ſonnes, Kenrik and Chelwolf, the one of which died before his Father; and the other ſucceeded him in his Kingdome. Chelwolf had iſſue Cuthgils, whoſe ſonne was Kenfridd, and his ſonne Kenſy, the Father of King Eskwin, who was the Succeſſor of King Kenwalk, and predeceſſor of King Kentwin, in the Kingdome of the Weſt-Saxons.

KEnrik, the eldeſt Sonne of King Cherdik, hauing formerly made proofe of his proweſſe in the aſsiſtance of his Father, was after his death alſo verie fortunate in obtaining two victories ouer the Britaines; the one at Searesberige, and the other at Beranbrig; whoſe raigne beginning Anno 534. continued twenty ſix yeers; ending in the yeere of our Redemption, fiue hundred ſixty. He had iſſue three Sonnes, of which Cheaulin the eldeſt ſucceeded him in his kingdome; Cuthwolfe the ſecond aſsiſted his Brother in his Warres, and was partaker with him of his victories, who died Anno 672. leauing iſſue one onely Sonne, named Chell, or Cearlike, who proued nothing ſo vertuous and dutifull a ſubiect as his Father had beene: for he roſe in rebellion againſt his Vncle, and by ſtrong hand expelled him his kingdome.

The third Sonne of King Kenrik was Cuth, famous in his iſſue, though mentionleſſe for action in himſelfe: for hee had three ſonnes, of which Chelwolf the eldeſt, was King of the Weſt Saxons (as ſhalbe declared) Chell the ſecond, was father to Kingils the ſixt (and firſt Chriſtian) King of the Weſt Saxons, and Grandfather to Kenwall and Kenwin, the ſeuenth and ninth Kings of that Kingdome: and Ched the yongeſt, was father of Kenbert, Grandfather to Chedwall the moſt renowned King of the Weſt Saxons; of whom we are preſentlie to ſpeake, and of them all in the ſucceſsion of the Engliſh Saxons Monarchs: and now to returne againe to the iſſue of King Kenrik.

CHeaulin his firſt ſonne, entred vpon the gouernement ouer the Weſt-Saxons Anno 561. and euen at the firſt began to diſturbe the quiet peace of his neighbour Prouinces, taking aduantage at the young yeeres of Ethelbert, who was made King of Kent in the ſame yeere that Cheaulin was, whom he diſcomfited, and ſlew his two Captaines, Duke Oſlane and Duke Cnebba, at Wibbandune, as we haue ſaid. Other Victories he obtained ouer the Britaines, both at Bedford, Deorham, Gloceſter, Cirenceſter, and Bathanceſter. But the fortunes of warres being alwaies variable, at length his ſucceſſe altered, and at VVannes ditche in VViltſhire he was ouerthrowne, and diſpoſſeſſed of his kingdome by Cealrik his brother Cuthwolfs ſonne, when he had raigned thirty three yeeres. Hee had iſſue, Cuth and Cuthwin: the former ſerued valiantly in the warres vnder his father at Wimbledon in Surrey, where King Ethelbert of Kent was chaſed, and his ſouldiers ſlaine: and with the like valour and victorie hee fought at Fethanleygh againſt the Britaines, notwithſtanding that therein he loſt his life, the yeere of our Lord 585. and the fiue and twentieth of his fathers raigne. Cuthwin his younger brother ſuruiued his father, but ſucceeded not in his Kingdome, being then (by reaſon of his young yeeres) vnable to recouer his right. He had two ſonnes, Kenhald and Cuth, the latter of which was father to Chelwald, whoſe ſon Kenred had iſſue, Ine the eleuenth King of the Weſt-Saxons, and Ingils his brother, whoſe ſonne was Eoppa the father of Eaſa, whoſe ſonne was Alkenmud, the father of Egbert the eighteenth King of the Weſt-Saxons, who reduced the Saxons diuided Heptarchie into an abſolute Monarchie.

But hee wading thorow theſe troubles, harried the Prouince of the South-Saxons with inuaſions and calamities, in the proſecution whereof he died, leauing the purſuit of his warres and poſſeſsion of his kingdome to Kingils his Nephew, that immediately ſucceeded him, after he had raigned the ſpace of fourteene yeeres.

His firſt attempts were againſt the Kentiſh-Saxons, in reuenge of his coſen Molloes death, whoſe wrath Withred pacified by the paiment of thirty thouſand Markes, ſaith William of Malmesbury. In the yeere of Grace ſeuen hundred and eight, and twenty one of his owne raigne (as Matthew of Weſtminſter hath obſerued) he fought with the Britaines vnder their Captaine Gerent, whom he victorioufly ſubdued: and in his twenty ſixth yeere, againſt Cheolred King of Mercia, with doubtfull victorie, at the place then called Wodenesbury: and in his thirty ſixth, inuaded the South-Saxons with ſuch ſucceſſe, that hee reduced the ſame Kingdome into a Prouince, and annexed it in ſubiection to the Weſt-Saxons: and manifeſting his good deſires both to the adminiſtration of Iuſtice, and the aduancement of Diuine Pietie, he ordained many good Lawes for the amendment of manners in his people, which are yet extant written in the Saxon Tongue, and tranſlated into Latine by the learned *M. Hee instituted also a certaine yeerely paiment to the See of Rome, enioining euery one of his subiects that possessed in his house of one kinde of goods to the value of twenty pence, that he should pay a penny to the Pope yeerely vpon Lammas day: which at first was contributed vnder the name of The Kings Almes, but afterwards was called and challenged by the name of Peter-pence. At length, by the instigation and earnest perswasion of Ethelburga his Queene, hee renounced the glittering glorie of his present and princely estate, wherein hee had in great prosperitie raigned thirty seuen yeeres and odde moneths; and professing a voluntarie pouertie, (so great was the zeale, and so little the knowledge of that age) went to Rome, where in the habit of a Religious Man he ended his life in poore estate; and Ethelburga his wife became a vailed Nunne, and was made Abbesse of Barking neere London, wherein she ended her life. He began his raigne the same yeere that King Edbert did his ouer the Kingdome of Kent, and with him was terrified by the dreadfull appearance of two Blazing Starres: of whose Acts, no other mention is recorded, sauing that at his entrance into regall estate, Oswald a Norman of the West-Saxons bloud, emulated his glorie, and troubled the quiet peace of his prosperous beginning: but not able to winne fortune to fauour his proceedings, he quite abandoned his natiue Country, and so left Ethelard to rule the Kingdome in peace, who therein quietly raigned the space of foureteene yeeres, without any mention of wife or issue.

The peace of this King was molested by his owne subiect, an Earle named Adelme, who boldly encountred his Soueraigne in Battle, and fought it out euen to the point of victorie; but failing thereof, and forced to flie, his life was pardoned. And hee made Generall against the Mercian Edilbald, Cuthreds ancient foe, wherein by his valiant prowesse, with the flight and discomfiture of the Enemie, hee made a worthie amends for guerdon of his life, and was euer after held in great fauour and honour. This King raigned in great fame and victories the space of fourteene yeers, and died in the yeere of our Lords Pasion 753. Hee had issue one onely son, whose name was Kenrik, a valiant young Prince, who in the ninth yeere of his Fathers raigne was seditiously slaine in his Armie, for bearing himselfe (as it may seeme) ouer-rigorous towards the Souldiers.

Sigebert obtaining the Principalitie of the West-Saxons, raigned therein no long time, and that without all honour or fame. His parentage is obscure and vnknowne, but his vices are made apparant and manifest; for hee wallowing in all sensuall pleasures, added exactions and cruelties vpon his Subiects, setting aside all lawes and rules of true pietie: from which vicious life, when hee was louingly admonished by his most faithfull Counsellor a worthy Earle called Cumbra, so farre was his minde from abandoning his impious courses, as that he caused this Noble Personage to be cruelly slaine; whereupon the rest of the Peeres seeing their State and liues were euery day in danger, and the common subiects, whose Lawes were thus violated, being incensed into furie, they rebelliously rose vp in Armes against him, and would acknowledge him no longer their Soueraigne. Sigebert, by nature as fearefull as he was audacious vnto vice, fledde into the woods as his only safeguard, where like a forlorne person he wandred in the day, and in caues and dennes lodged in the night, till lastly he was met with by a Swine-heard that was seruant to Cumbra, and of him knowne to be Sigebert, was presently slaine in reuenge of his masters death, in the wood that was then called Andreads Wald, when hee had raigned not fully two yeeres.

He founded the Cathedrall Church of S. Andrewes at Wels, which afterwards was an Episcopall See, and in great honour raigned for the space of twenty foure yeeres; but then Fortune turning her face away from him, the rest of his raigne did not sute to that which was spent: for he giuing himselfe to pleasure and securitie, banished Kineard, the brother of his Predecessor Sigebert; who dissembling his wrong, gaue place vnto time, and occasion being offered, made his vse thereof. For Kenwulfe comming to Merton, to visit his Paramore, was there set vpon and slaine; and his body conueied and buried at Winchester, after hee had raigned twenty nine yeeres, leauing no memoriall either of Wife or Children.

Brithic, lineally descended from Cherdik the first King of the West-Saxons, a man of a soft and quiet disposition, succeeded Kenwulfe in that Principalitie, in the yeere of Christs Incarnation 784. It afterward chanced, that shee preparing poison to make an end of one of the Kings Minions, wrought thereby (though vnwittingly) the Kings death: for he by tasting the confection, ended his life, after hee had raigned the space of sixteene yeeres. Wherein, she fearing the iust reuenge of his subiects, fled into France, & by Charles then King, was so courteously entertained, as that for her great beauty there was offered her the choice of him or his sonne. But she in her youthfull and lustfull humor, choosing the sonne, was debarred from both, and thrust into a Monastery, in the habit (not the affection of a Nunne) where not long after she abused her body by committing of adultery, and was shortly expelled, and in beggerly misery ended her life, as by manie that so saw her, we haue beard it reported, saith Asserius mine Author. THE EAST-SAXONS KINGDOME,
THE CIRCVIT, SVCCESSIONS OF THEIR KINGS, THEIR ISSVES, AND KINGDOMES CONTINVANCE.

CHAPTER VIII.

The ſite of this Kingdome.

THe ſite of the East-Saxons Kingdom, was the Country of Eſſex, Middleſex, and part of Hartfordſhire, and the Circuit ſo far as the Dioceſſe of London now extendeth. It was bounded on the East with the Ocean; on the South with the Thames; on the West with the Colne; and on the North with the Riuer Stowre. The Kings thereof claime their deſcent from Prince Woden, not as all the reſt of the Saxon Kings, but onely by a collaterall line; and Erchenwine became the firſt King, which neuertheleſſe he held as Feodarie to the Kings of Kent. For which cauſe, it ſeemeth that Malmsbury mentioneth him not in the Catalogue of thoſe Kings, but maketh his ſonne Sledda the firſt, and tenth in deſcent from Woden.

This Sledda died about the yeere of our Redemption 596. and left iſſue by his wife Queene Ricula, Sebert, who ſucceeded him in the Kingdome, and Segebald his brother whoſe Sons afterward were Kings of that Prouince.

Et ego Rex Æthelbert ita firmiter concedo tibi Præſuli Mileto poteſtatem eius habendi & poſſidendi, vt in perpetuum in Monaſterij vtilitate permaneat, &c.* And that this was the Temple of Diana, ſome haue further confirmed vnto vs by the incredible number of Oxe-heads there digged vp in the daies of King Edward the Firſt, when the eaſt-end of that Church was enlarged; which were ſuppoſed to be of thoſe Beaſts that were there ſacrificed to this Goddeſſe Diana. Theſe Kings likewiſe founded the Church of *S. Northumberland how diuided at first.

THis Kingdome of Northumberland consisted at first of two distinct Prouinces; whereof the one was called Deira, and the other Bernicia, and were gouerned sometimes by their Kings seuerally, and sometimes vnder one, as successe of warre, or other casualties incident did afford. The royall descents of whose Kings are brought by Florentius both from the Fourth and Fifth Sonnes of Prince Woden, after this manner. Ella, vnder whom the Kingdome of Deira beganne, was the sonne of Iffi, who was the sonne of Wuskfrea, the sonne of Wilgils, the sonne of Westorwalchna, the sonne of Seomel, the sonne of Suearta, the sonne of Sæpugell, the sonne of Seabald, the sonne of Siggeot, the sonne of Suebdeg, the sonne of Siggar, the sonne of Weadeg, the fourth sonne of Woden. And the descent of Ida, the raiser of the Bernicians kingdome, is brought from Bealdeag the fifth sonne of Woden; for Bealdeag was father to Brand, whose sonnes were Beorn and Freodegar, the latter of which twaine was the progenitour of Cherdik the first West-Saxon King: and his brother Beorn begat another Beorn also, and hee Wegbrand the father of Ingebrand, whose sonne was Alusa, the father of Angengeal, and this mans sonne Ingengeat, the father of Æthelbright, whose sonne Oesa begat Eoppa the father of this Ida, the first King of Bernicia.

These Saxon Captaines Ella and Ida, about sixtie yeeres after the death of King Hengist, changed the title of this Prouince from a Dukedome to a Kingdome. For Hengist hauing giuen the possession of those North parts vnto Otho his Brother, and to Ebusain his sonne, their Successors held it, with many hostile irruptions the space of 99. yeeres. But now the Britaines subiected, and no resistance made, those Captaines diuide the Prouince into two parts, intituling either by the name of a Kingdome; the first Deira, was possessed by Ella, which stretched from Tyne, to the Riuer Humber; and the second Bernicia, enioyed by Ida, whose Continent lay betwixt the Tyne and the Frith of Edenborough. These together contained the Counties of Westmerland, Cumberland, Northumberland, Yorkeshire, Lancaster, and Durham, and was bounded on the West with the Irish Seas, on the North with the Wall of Seuerus, on the East with the German Ocean, and on the South with the Riuers Mersey and Humber. Ida, saith Malmsbury, raigned fourteene yeeres: and Ella by Matthew of Westminster, is said to succeed him for thirty yeeres. The issue of Ida legitimate, as Huntington recordeth, were Adda, Bealrik, Thedrik, Ethelrik, Osmer, and Thedred; illegitimate, Oga, Ecca, Oswald, Ailrik, Sogoe, and Sogother. These (saith Matthew of Westminster) arriued at Flemisburke with forty Ships, and assisted their Father in manie of his enterprises. The issue of Ella, by Florentius his record, were Acca, Wife of Ethelfrid, King of Bernicia, and mother to the most Christian Oswald, Monarch of the Englishmen, and Edwine the Monarch and first Christian King of Northumberland. Ida is said to beginne his raigne Anno 547. And Ella in the yeere 559. No other particulars ascribed vnto either, besides the building of Bamburge Castell.

The storie of Edwines banishment.

the root of like honour, hee assembled a great and strong Armie against him, and at the place called Degsaston strooke Battle with him, wherein notwithstanding he was ouerthrowne, and his Scots discomfited, yet with such losse to King Ethelfrid, that Theobald his brother, with the part of the Armie whereof he was Generall, were all vanquished and destroied. This battle went so sore against the Scotish Britaines, that (saith Beda) no King of that Nation durst attempt to meet the English in the Field for a long time after. And the fortune of the day did so much augment both his fame, and also his haughty spirit, that presently he reenforced his power against the Britaines, that were at * Cair-legion, where of them hee made a most lamentable slaughter, and that not only of the Souldiers prepared for fight, but also of those religious and harmlesse Monks, there assembled for praier.

These Monks were of the Monastery of Bangor in North-wales, famous for antiquity, forme of discipline and spacious circuit. It was situated in the fruitfull valley now called the English Mailor; and vpon the Banckes of the Riuer Dee, where it extended it selfe as in the circuit of a walled Citie, containing within it the quantitie of a mile and a halfe of ground: two of whose Gates may at this day easilie be discerned, the one of them called Port Hogen, lying by North; and the other Port Clais, situate on the South; the Riuer Dee hauing now changed his Channell, runneth thorow the middest betwixt both the Gates, which stand asunder fiue hundred paces. This Monasterie, saith Clarivalentius, was the Mother of all others in the World; who in memory of the * Seuen Churches of Asia, did distribute into seuen portions their Monks, euery one numbring three hundred soules, and all of them (as Beda saith) liuing by the labour of their own hands. Many of these assembling at Cair-legion, to assist their Brethren Britaines with their supplications vnto God against this Ethelfrid, surnamed the Wilde, and his fierce Souldiers the Infidell Saxons; with three daies fasts spent their time in continuall praiers. But King Ethelfrid beholding their maner, demanded the cause; and vnderstanding that they called for assistance of their God against him and his Army, set first vpon their Guarder Brockmal, a man of Armes, who to saue his own life, left all theirs to the sword, wherein perished one thousand and two hundred Christian Monks, besides the discomfiture of the Britaines Host. Many of these were interred in their owne Monasteries, whose bodies, saith Leyland, haue been found in the memory of man, in the rotten weedes wherein they were slaine. But as his fame increased daily abroad, so were his feares augmented continually at home. For Edwine the sonne of Ella, and third King of Deira, a gallant young Prince, and newly seated in his Fathers Kingdome, wrought many suspicions in Ethelfrids head; and though he was brother to his Wife Acca, yet the neerenesse of that alliance, no whit diminished his iealous conceits, whom therefore by priuie conspiracies and apparant pursuits hee so daily molested, that he was forced to saue his life by auoiding the Country, and tossed in exile from place to place, was lastly receiued and succoured by Redwald, King of the East-Angles, who in his quarrel forthwith assembled his forces, and meeting Ethelfrid in the field, slew him neere the Riuer Idle, after hee had raigned twenty three yeeres, in the yeere of Christ his Incarnation 617. He had issue by his Wife Acca, (the daughter of Ella) Eanfrith King of Bernicia, Oslafe, and Oswald King of Northumberland, Oslake, and Offa, with two Daughters canonized for Saints, Oswith and Ebba the Nunne; as also by his Concubine, Oswy, the tenth Monarch of the Englishmen.

EDwine thus raised by the helpe of King Redwald, returned to his Country, and was of the Inhabitants made King of Northumberland, and afterward Monarch of the Englishmen; as in their succession shall be declared. Beda (somewhat too much addicted to fabulous miracles) of him reporteth this storie: That whilest hee lay banished in King Redwalds Court, Ethelfrid instigated his receiuer, by promises to take away his life; or if he refused, threatned him warres: for feare whereof, Redwald, partly inclining to this wicked purpose, reuealed the same to the Queene his wife; which a friend of Edwins hearing, told him of his danger, and wished him to flie. Edwine thus perplexed, with troubled thoughts in the dead of the night, sate solitary vnder a tree in dumps, musing what was best to be done; to suspect and flie from Redwald, that had honoured him so much, he held it a wrong; and to thinke himselfe safe in other Prouinces against so powerfull pursuers, he thought it was vaine. Thus distracted in casting what way might be safest, suddenly approched a man vnto him, vtterly vnknowne, who after salutation, demanded the cause why hee sate at so vnseasonable a time, in so vncouth a place, and pensiue manner? Edwine thinking him to be his death's-man, resolutely answered; It nothing concerned him at all, either to aske, or to know his estate. Oh Edwine (said he) thinke not but that I know thy sorrow, and the cause of thy sitting thus vpon that stone; thy death is pretended, and euen at hand: but what wouldest thou giue to rid thee of that danger, and to make King Redwald thy assured preseruer? Any thing, quoth Edwine, which is in my power. But what shall be his reward (said the other) that shall set thee vpon the throne of thy Kingdome, and that with such glory, as none of thy Progenitors euer attained vnto? I would bee thankfull to that man, said Edwine, in all things, and at all times, as reason required, and of right I ought. But tell me Edwine, said he, what if the same man shew thee a more safe way to preserue the life of thy soule, then either thou at this present knowest, or any of thy Parents euer heard of; wilt thou consent and imbrace his counsell? Yea, said Edwine, God forbid that I should not bee ruled by him, that thus should free me from this present danger, set me vpon the throne of a Kingdome, and after these great fauours, should also teach mee the way to an eternall life. Vpon this answere, laying his right hand on Edwines head, he said vnto him; When these things shall in order come to passe, then call to minde this time, and what thou hast promised, and so vanished from his presence. The young Prince thus left betwixt hope and despaire, his friend that had forewarned him of his death, came hastily to him with a more cheerfull countenance, Come in Edwine (quoth he) and surcease thy cares, for the Queene hath not onely changed Redwalds mind to saue thy life, but he also hath granted to maintaine thy right against Ethelfrid thine enemy. Which shortly he did, and slew him, as we haue said.

Edwine thus placed vpon the Princely Throne, his first Wife Queenburg being dead in his exile, receiued in marriage Ethelburga, surnamed Tace, (a fit name for a woman) the Daughter of King Ethelbert, and Sister to Edbald King of Kent, a most chaste and vertuous Christian Lady, whose teacher was Paulinus, and both of them Gods instruments for the Conuersion of the Northumbrians to the imbracement of Christian Religion. But because we shall haue occasion to speake of this Edwine as he was Monarch of the Englishmen, we will reserue his Acts, Issues, and Raigne, to bee further related in the course of his Succession. Hee was slaine in battell against Cadwall King of the Britaines and Penda King of the Mercians, when he had prosperously raigned seuenteene yeeres, the twelfth of October, Anno 633. and was buried in Saint Peters Church at Streanshall, after called Whitby. Vpon whose death, the Kingdome of Northumberland was againe diuided.

Egbert, the ſonne of Eata, who was brother to King Kenred, ſucceeded his vncle Ceolnulph in the Kingdome of Northumberland, and ruled the ſame with the like peace and pietie, the time of twenty yeeres; and then following his example, alſo forſooke the world, and ſhore himſelfe a Monke, as diuers other Kings in thoſe daies had done, whereof Simon Dunelmenſis writeth, and noteth their number to bee eight: as Inas King of the Weſt-Saxons, Ethelred and Kenred Kings of Mercia, Sigebert King of the Eaſt-Angles, Sebbi and Offa Kings of the Eaſt-Saxons, and Ceolnulph and this Egbert Kings of the Northumbrians. Theſe forſaking the world (as they tooke it) left the Charge that God vpon them had impoſed, whoſe authoritie in earth they ſwaied, and wherein they might much more haue aduanced Gods glory and Chriſts Goſpel, then for a more eaſie and priuate life, not warranted by his word, but rather diſliked, and perhaps foreſhewed by thoſe heauenly creatures the Sunne and Moone, which in thoſe daies were fearefully darkned, and for a time ſeemed to haue loſt their light: for Anno 733. 18. Calend. Septemb. the Sunne ſuffred ſo great an Eclipſe, that the earth ſeemed to bee ouer-ſhadowed as with ſack-cloth. And Anno 756. 8. Calend. Decemb. the Moone being in her full, appeared both darke and bloudy; for a Starre (though there be none lower then the Moone) ſeemed to follow her, and to depriue her of light: but paſsing before her, ſhee againe recouered her former brightneſſe. This King Egbert had a brother that bore the ſame name, and was inſtalled Arch-biſhop of Yorke, where he erected a beautifull Librarie (a worke well befitting a Noble Prelate) and plentifully ſtored it with an infinite number of learned bookes. His ſonne was Oſwulph, that ſucceeded in the Kingdome. Wil.Malmeſ. Eclipſes of the Sun and Moone. His ſonne.

Edilwald or Mollo was then made King of Northumberland, and with great valiancie defended his Subiects. Alured, the murderer of his Lord and Maſter, beganne his raigne ouer the kingdome of Northumberland, the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation ſeuen hundred ſixty fiue, and continued the ſame with ſuch diſlikes, that hee laſtly was expelled out of the Prouince by his own ſubiects, & enforced to abandon the ſame. He was the ſon of Tunwin, the ſon of Bieghan, the ſon of Boſa, the ſon of Ailrick, the naturall ſon of Ida, the firſt King of Bernicia. And the ſonnes of this Alured were Oſred, afterwards King of Northumberland, and Alhnud, ſlaine by the Danes, and canonized a Saint. 20. Ethelred, the ſonne of Mollo, was aduanced to the Regiment of Northumberland, and in the fifth yeere of his raigne, was driuen out of the ſame by Edelbald and Herebert, two Dukes that warred againſt him; who hauing diſcomfited and ſlaine his Generall and ſouldiers in a fierce battel, ſo weakened the hopes of King Ethelred, that he fled his Country, and left the Kingdome in a miſerable eſtate, through the diſſenſions of thoſe ambitious Princes. 21. An.Do.774. Ethelred. Matth.Weſt.

Alfwald the brother of the foreſaid King Alered aſpiring to the Soueraignty of the Northumbrians, ruled the ſame in great Iuſtice, to his worthy commendations: notwithſtanding the wickednes of his people was ſuch, that without all guilt he was traiterouſly murthered by the conſpiracie of Siga, 23. Sept. the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation, ſeuen hundred eightie eight, after he had raigned eleuen yeeres, and his body buried at Hexham. Ethelred the ſonne of Mollo, reuoked from exile wherein he had liued the ſpace of twelue yeeres, was againe reſtored to the Crowne; but he minding the iniuries that his Lords had formerly done him, ſought the reuenge by their deaths, as alſo to eſtabliſh his Throne the ſurer, ſlew Alfus and Alfwin, the ſons of Alfwald, as wee haue ſaid, the right heires to the Crowne, and inticing Oſred the former depoſed King into his danger, commanded him to be put to death at Cumburge, the fourteenth of September, and yeere of Chriſt ſeuen hundred ninety two. And to ſtrengthen himſelfe the more againſt all his oppoſites, the ſame yeere he married Lady Elfled, the ſecond Daughter to great Offa King of Mercia, forſaking his former Wife without any iuſt cauſe giuen on her part. Theſe things ſate ſo neere the hearts of his ſubiects, that after ſeuen yeeres from his ſecond eſtabliſhment, they rebelliouſly roſe in Armes, and at Cobre miſerably ſlew him the eighteenth day of Aprill, the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 794. Randul.Higden in Polychro. His raigne. His death.

After whoſe death, the Northumbrians were ſore moleſted with many intruders, or rather Tyrants, that banded for the ſoueraignty the ſpace of thirty yeeres. The firſt whereof was Oſwald, that held the title of King only twenty eight daies, & then was forced to ſaue his life by flight vnto the King of the Picts. Next, Ardulfe a Duke, reuoked from exile: then Alfwold, Eandred, Ethelred, Readulph, Osbert, and Elle, ſlaine by the Danes in Yorke at a place, frō Elle his ſlaughter called to this day Elle-Croſſe, and the Kingdome yeelded to the protection of Egbert King of the Weſt-Saxons, who was now become Englands firſt abſolute Monarch, (as holding all the reſt of the Kings no longer for his Aſſociates, but his ſubiects) in the yeere nine hundred twentie ſix, after it had ſtood in forme of a Kingdome three hundred ſeuenty nine yeeres, and was made a Prouince, and ioined with the reſt vnto the Engliſh Monarchie. 24. Oſwald King twenty daies.

CHAPTER X.

Mercia.

THis Kingdome of Mercia contained more Counties, and the skirts of that royall Tent were ſpread with a wider compaſſe then any of the reſt in the Saxons Heptarchie: for in the middeſt of the Iland this Kingdome was ſeated, and from the verge of Northumberland touched ſome part of Middleſex, which was the poſſeſsion of the Eaſt-Saxons: the North thereof was bounded with Humber and Merſey; the Eaſt was incloſed with the German Ocean; the Weſt extended to Seuerne and Dee; and the South part neerely touched the Riuer of Thames; containing the Counties now known by theſe names, of Cheſhire, Darby-ſhire, Nottingham, Stafford, and Shrop-ſhire, Northampton, Leiceſter, Lincolne, Huntington, and Rutland-ſhires; Warwicke, Worceſter, Oxford, and Gloceſter-ſhires; Buckingham, Bedford, and part of Hertford-ſhire.

The limits of it.

The firſt raiſer of that Title and name of a Kingdome, was Crida, the ſonne of Kenwald, who was the ſonne of Cnebba, the ſonne of Icbell, the ſonne of Eomer, the ſonne of Engengeate, the ſonne of Offa, the ſonne of Weremund, the ſonne of Withleg, the ſonne of Waga, the ſonne of Wethelgeate, the third of the fiue ſonnes of Prince Woden. This man, without more fame of his further acts, is ſaid to haue raigned the ſpace of ten yeeres, and to haue died Anno 594. His iſſue was Wibba that ſucceeded him in his Kingdome, and a daughter named Quenburge, matched in mariage with Edwin afterwards King of Northumberland, with whom ſhe liued in the Court of King Redwald in the time of his troubles, and died before him in that his baniſhment. She bore him two ſonnes, Oſfrid and Edfride, as in the ſucceſsion of Edwins Monarchy ſhall be ſhewed: notwithſtanding Beda reporteth this Quenburge to be daughter of Ceorle the third King of Mercia, and grand-child to this firſt Crida.

PEnda, the ſonne of Wibba, beganne his raigne ouer the Mercians the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation ſix hundred twenty ſix, & continued the ſame the ſpace of thirty yeeres. He was a man violent in action, and mercileſſe in condition, cruell and vnſatiate of blood: he ſhooke the Cities, and diſturbed the borders of the Saxon-Kings, more then any other in that Heptarchy before him had done. Againſt Kingils and Quincheline, Kings together of the Weſt-Saxons, he ioined battell neere vnto the Citie Cirencheſter, where both the parties fought it out to the vtmoſt, with the effuſion of much Saxons bloud: but thoſe comming to concord, he with Cadwallo King of the Britaines, ſlew in battell Edwine and Oſwald, Kings of Northumberland, Sigebert, Egfrid, and Anna, Kings of the Eaſt-Angles, and forced Kenwald King of the Weſt-Saxons out of his Country, in quarrell of his Siſter. Of theſe his proſperities he became ſo proud, that hee thought nothing impoſsible for his atchieuement; and therefore threatning the deſtruction of the Northumbers, prepared his Army for that expedition. Oſwy then raigning King of that Country, proffered great ſummes of mony, and moſt precious Iewels to purchaſe his peace: which being refuſed, and the battell ioined, more by the hand of God, then power of man, this Tyrant was ſlaine, and his whole Army diſcomfited. His Wife was Kmſwith, and iſſue by her Peada, who after him was King: Vulfere and Ethelred, both Monarchs of the Engliſh; Merkthel, a man famous for his great holineſſe, and Merwald that gouerned ſome part of Mercia, whoſe Wife was Edburga, the foundreſſe of Minſter in Tanet, and daughter to Egbert King of Kent; by whom he had iſſue Mereſin, a man of noted deuotion, Milbury, and Mildgith, both holy Virgins, and Mildrith alſo Abbeſſe of Tanet, all foure canonized for Saints. The daughters of King Penda, were Kineburg, the Wife of Alkfrid, King of Northumberland, afterward a Votareſſe in Kinesburg Abby, and Kineſwith, who maried Offa King of the Eaſt-Angles, and became alſo a Nunne with her ſiſter Kineburgh.

But Robert de Swapham (an Author of good antiquity, who ſaw the ſtones of that foundation to be ſo huge, as that eight yoke of Oxen could hardly draw one of them) ſaith, that Peada was brought to his end by the practiſe of his Mother, and not of his Wife; as in theſe his words is manifeſt. Peada (ſaith he) laid the foundation of a Monaſtery at Medeſhamſted, in the Giruians or Fen-Country, which he could not finiſh, for that by the wicked practiſe of his Mother, hee was made away. Whereby this blot is taken from this Chriſtian Lady, and brands the face of her that moſt deſerueth it. Berthulf vpon the like compoſition of Tribute, and in the like termes of ſubiection to the weſt-Saxons ſoueraignetie, held the kingdome of Mercia as a Subſtitute, and without any notable reports of his Acts, ſo raigned the ſpace of thirteene yeeres. At this time the Sea-rouers out of Denmarke, that had often infeſted this Iland with their many Inuaſions, got the head ſo ſtrong, and wing ſo farre, euen to the middle part thereof, (as this of Mercia was) that they filled with terror the hearts of the Inhabitants, and ſtained the ſoile with the bloud of their ſides, which in a moſt barbarous crueltie daily they ſhed; whoſe rage was ſo great, and mindes ſo vnſatiable, that Berthulf was enforced to forſake the Country, and in a more priuate eſtate to ſecure his owne life. He had a ſonne named Berefred, who was the cauſer of Saint Wyſtans martyrdome.

Wrdred, the laſt Mercian King, was thereunto deputed by Ethelwolfe the Weſt-Saxon Monarch, as a ſhield of defence againſt the raging Danes, that made deſolations where they came. In continuall imploiments againſt them he ſpent his time, and that with ſuch noble reſolutions and manhood, that Ethelwolfe held him worthy of his alliance, and made him his ſonne in law, by giuing him Lady Ethelſwith his daughter to Wife, the marriage being ſolemnized at Chipnham in Wiltſhire, with great eſtate. This Burdred with Ethelwolfe, warred againſt the Britaines with victorie, and he with Alured compelled the Danes vnder the conduct of Hungar and Vbba, to diſlodge from Nottingham, and depart the Prouince. Yet laſtly, after twenty two yeeres raigne, hee was ſo ouerlaid with their daily ſupplies, that three of their Kings (as our Writers terme them) whoſe names were Godrun, Eſketell, and Ammond, wintred at * Ripindon, and ſore waſted his Kingdome.

CHAPTER XI.

The circuit of this Province.

THE Counties (as we now call them) that were subiect to this East-Angles Kingdome, were Suffolke, Norfolke, Cambridge-shire, and the Ile of Ely. The bounds whereof were limitted in this manner: the East and North sides were confined by the Ocean; the West, with Saint Edmunds Ditch, and the South altogether with Essex, and some part of Hertfordshire.

1 An.Do.575. The first King of the East-Angles. Beda hist. Angl. lib.2.cap.15.

The first raiser of the title and State of this Kingdome, was a Saxon Captaine named Vffa, about the yeere of Christs incarnation fiue hundred seuentie fiue, whose renowne was such, that he gaue name not onely to that his aspired Dominion, but also from him, the Subiects thereof were a long time after called Vffines: though lastly, it was reduced into the name and Kingdom of the East-Angles. This Vffa (as Florentius the Monke of Worcester hath laid downe) was the sonne of Withelin, and he the sonne of Hrippus, the sonne of Rothmund, the sonne of Trigils, the sonne of Titmon, the sonne of Caser, the second sonne of Prince woden. His raigne is accounted only seuen yeeres, without any mention of further matter, worthy the recording, and his death to haue hapned in the yeare fiue hundred eighty one.

Titulus, the second King of the East-Angles, and only sonne of Vffa that is read of, beganne his raigne the yeere of Christs Incarnation, fiue hundred eighty three, & continued the same for the space of twenty yeeres. And although the Writers of these times haue made no further mention of his Acts, yet may we well suppose that his daies were not altogether so quietly spent, both in the infancy of that newly erected kingdom, and when such wars were commenced for the obtaining the whole Iland. His issue was Redwald, that immediatly succeeded him, & from whom other Kings of that kingdom were lineally descēded.

3 An.Do.593. Beda hist. Ang. lib.2.ca.5. The third King of this Kingdom. Cap.9.Sect.7.

Redwald, the greatest of all the East-Angles Kings, succeeded his father Titulus in the Dominions of the East-Angles, and Ethelbert of Kent in the Monarchie of the Saxons. He receiued and succoured in his Court Edwyne with his wife in their Exiles, and assisted him against Ethelfrid King of Northumberland, that sought his life, as before wee haue shewed, and hereafter in the succession of his Monarchy wee shal haue further occasion. Hee raigned Monarch eight yeeres, and King of the East-Angles thirty one (by the account and computation of the Table annexed to Malmesbury, and others of our English Writers) and died the yeare of our Saluation six hundred twenty three.

See more of him in Chap. 18. His raigne.

4 An.Do.624 The fourth King of this Kingdom.

Erpenwald, the younger sonne of King Redwald, (Reynhere his elder brother being slaine in battle by Ethelfred, in the quarrell of distressed Edwine) succeeded his Father in the Kingdom of the East-Angles, the yeer of our Lord God six hundred twenty foure. He was the first King of that Prouince, that publikely professed the Christian Faith, which hee receiued at the friendly motion and zealous exhortation of King Edwine of Northumberland; but so much to the discontentment & grudge of the people, as thereupon they presently entred into conspiracy to practise his death, which a Pagā Ruffian named Richebert, not long after most traiterously executed. His raigne is placed in the foresaid Table of our Writers, (as it is compared with the other Kings of those times) to extend twelue yeeres; after whose death, those people returned to their wonted Idolatrie, and for three yeeres continuance embraced their former Gentility, from which they were reclaimed by Sigebert his brother in law, who succeeded him in his Throne, hee hauing no issue, to whom it might be left.

France, brought the light of the Gospell into his Dominions, and by the assistance of Felix Bishop of Dunwich, for a more firme plantation thereof, built a Schoole for the education of children, appointing them Schoole-masters and Teachers after the maner of the Kentish-men; who are * supposed to haue at that time the Liberall Sciences professed among them, in their Metropolitane City Canterbury, which was the paterne (saith that Countries Perambulator) that this Sigebert followed in the erection of his; but whether at Cambridge or elsewhere, hee leaueth for Doctor Caius of Cambridge, and M. Key of Oxford, to be disputed of. And indeed Beda assigneth not the place for this foundation, nor once nameth Cambridge, vnlesse you will say, that out of the ruines of Granteceſter, an ancient Citie decaied in his daies, the same arose, and whereof hee maketh mention in his fourth Booke, vpon this occasion as followeth.

Queene Etheldred (saith he) that had been a Virgin, wife to Egfrid King of Northumberland the tearme of twelue yeeres, and Abbesse of Ely for seuen more, for her reputed holinesse after her death and buriall, was thought worthy by Queene Sexburg her sister (who had beene wife to Ercombert King of Kent, and succeeded her Abbesse in the same Monasterie) to bee remooued out of her wooden Tombe & meane place of buriall, into the Church and richer Monument: but for want of stone, which was scarce in those parts, certaine brethren were sent to find out some for that vse, who comming to Granteceſter, a little City left desolate and vninhabited, found by the walles a Tomb of white marble verie faire, and couered with a like stone. This they thought to be found not without miracle, and therefore most fit to intombe her corps, which accordingly they did. But that this had beene the place of Sigeberts Schoole, hee mentioneth not. But whether by him or no, wee know it now the other Vniuersity of England, a seed-plot of all diuine and humane Literature, and one of those springs whence issue the wholesome waters that doe bedewe both the Church & Common-wealth, both, famous for the Arts, for Buildings, and Reuenewes, as their like is not to be found in Europe (saith Peter Martyr) and that most truely. But to returne: Sigebert being wearied with the waighty affairs of this world, laid the burden thereof vpon Egricke his kinsman, and shore himselfe a Monk in the Abby of Cumbreburge, which himselfe had built, & wherein he liued, vntill that wicked Penda, the Mercian King, with his heathenish cruelty molested the peace of the East-Angles; who after long resistance, finding themselues too weake, besought Sigebert, for the better incouragement of their souldiers, to shew himselfe in field; which when he refused, by constraint (saith Beda) they drew him forth, where in the midst of them hee was slaine in battle, vsing no other weapon for defence, sauing only a white wand; when hee had raigned onely three yeeres, and left no issue to suruiue him, that is any where recorded.

Egricke, cosin to King Sigebert, and by him made King, as wee haue said, was sore molested by the continuall inuasions of Penda, the cruell King of Mercia; who lastlie in a set battle slew him with Sigebert, about the yeere of Christ his incarnation sixe hũdred fifty two. And when himself had raigned 4. yeers, deceased, without mentiõ either of wife or child, that is read of, further to reuiue his memory to posterities.

Anna succeeded King Egricke in the Kingdome of the East-Angles, the yeere of grace six hundred fortie two, as the next in bloud to Erpinwald, beeing the sonne of Guido, saith Beda, the sonne of Eni, saith Malmsbury, who was brother to great Redwald; and both of them the sons of Titulus, the second King of that Prouince. This King, as the other two former had done, felt the fury of raging Penda, with his mercilesse Mercians, that sore assaulted his Territories with rapine and spoile. To withstand whose further proceedings, King Anna drew the strength of his East-Angles against them, and encountred Penda in a great and mortall battle, wherein they were all discomfited and himselfe among them slaine, when hee had raigned in continuall trouble the space of thirteene yeeres. His issue were many, and those of great holinesse or sanctity of life. Whereof Ferminus the eldest, and heire apparant, was slaine by Penda in the same battle with his Father, and was with him buried in Blidribrugh, now Blibrugh, but afterwards remoued to S. Edmondsbury. His other sonne was Erkenwald, Abbat of Chertside, and Bishoppe of London, that lieth buried in the South Ile, aboue the Quire in S. Pauls Church, where to this day remaineth a memoriall of him. His daughters were these; Etheldrid the eldest, was first married vnto a Nobleman, whom Beda nameth Tonbert, Gouernor of the Fenny Countries of Nothfolke, Huntington, Lincolne, and Cambridge-shires: and after his death remaining a virgin, she was remarried to Egfrid King of Northumberland, with whom likewise she liued in perfect virginity the space of twelue yeeres, notwithstanding his intreaty and allurements to the contrary. From whom, lastly, she was released, and had licence to depart his Court, vnto the Abbey of Coldinghã, where first she was vailed a Nunne vnder Abbesse Ebba, and thence departing, she liued at Ely, and became her selfe Abbesse thereof, wherein lastly she died, and was interred; remembred vnto posterities by the name of S. Audrie. His second daughter was Sexburg, who married Ercombert, King of Kent, vnto whom she bare two sons, and two daughters, as we in that Kingdomes succession haue shewed: after whose death, shee tooke the habit of a Nunne, and succeeded her sister Etheldrid, Abbesse of Ely, wherin she died and was interred: and their yongest sister Withgith, was likewise a Menchion with them in the same Monastery, and all of them canonized for Saints. Ethilburge his third daughter was made Abbesse of Berking, neere London, built by her brother Bishop Erkinwald, wherein she liued, and lastly died. A naturall daughter likewise he had, whose name was Edelburg, that with Sedrido the daughter of his wife, were both of them professed Nunnes, and succeeded each other Abbesses in the Monastery of S. Brigges in France. Such a reputed holinesse was it held in those daies, not only to be separated from the accompanying with men, wherunto women by God were created, but also to abandon the Country of their natiuity, and as strangers in forraine Lands, to spend the continuance of their liues.

Ethelherd, the brother of Anna, the yere of Christs Incarnation six hundred fifty foure, was made King of the East-Angles: the which it seemeth he had attempted in the raigne of his brother, for that hee had assisted Penda in his warres against him; and was the motiue (saith Beda) of the warres against Oswin King of Northumberland, wherin siding with the heathen Penda, he was worthily slaine, the fifteenth day of Nouember, when he had raigned onely two yeeres, leauing his name to the blot of infamy, and his Crowne to be possessed by his younger brother. His wife was Hereswith sister of Hilda, the famous learned Abbesse of Streanshale, and great grand-childe to Edwyne King of Northumberland, who bare vnto him Aldulfe, Elswoolfe, and Beorne, all three succeeding Edilwald in the Kingdome of the East-Angles.

Edelwald the brother of Ethelherd entred his gouernment of the East-Angles the yere of our Lord six hundred fifty sixe, and continued the same the space of nine yeeres, without either mention of any other memorable act: from whom (as is supposed) issued Ethelred that succeeded King after Beorne.

Aldulfe, the eldest sonne of Ethelherd and Queene Hereswith, after the death of his vncle King Edelwald, obtained the Kingdome of the East-Angles, and therein raigned without any honour or honourable action by him performed: onely his name and time of his raigne, which was nineteene yeres, is left of him by Writers: and affordeth no further relation of vs here to be inserted, besides his Coine here set.

Ethelred, after the death of his cosen Beorne, succeeded him in the Kingdome of the East-Angles, issuing (as is supposed) from King Edelwald the brother of Ethelherd, and of Anna, both of them Kings in that Prouince. His raigne by writers is said to bee fiftie two yeeres, which notwithstanding was passed ouer without any memorable note: for albeit that his gouernment was long, and the declining Heptarchie not vnlikely to haue ministred matters of remembrance to posterities, yet is the same passed ouer by the silence of our Writers, and no further mention made of him, besides the education of his yonger sonne Ethelbert, who proued a most worthy King. His wife, and the mother of this vertuous sonne, was Leofrun, saith the Writer of his life, without further mention of her parentage, or other issue. 14. An.D. 749. Ethelbert the fourteenth King.

Ethelbert, the sonne of King Ethelred, after his Fathers death was ordained King of the East-Angles, whose daies of youth were spent in learning and deeds of charity, and the whole time of his gouernement in continuall tranquillity; for hee is recorded to be a Prince religious and charitable, sober, profound and wise in counsell. This King being incited by Offa the Mercian (that still thirsted after greatnesse) to marie Elfryd his daughter, a Lady of great beautie, came vpon that purpose to Offa his Court, then seated at Sutton Wallis in the County of Hereford and was by him there cruelly murdered at the instigation of Quendrid his vnkind (intended) mother in law, no other occasion ministred, but the greatnes of his Port, that much in her eyes ouer-heighted her husbands. His Bride-bed the graue was first at Merden, north from Sutton vpon the Riuer Lug. But afterwards vpon repentance, Offa remoued it vnto Hereford; ouer whom, Milfrid an vnder King of the Mercians built a most faire Church in memoriall of him, which yet beares his name, and is the Cathedral of that See. His Bride, Lady Elfrid, much lamenting his contriued murther, withdrew her self to Crowland in the Fennes, and there vowed chastitie all the daies of her life; notwithstanding some affirme that shee was wife to King Kenwolfe, the successor of her brother Egfrid. This King raigned the space of forty fiue yeeres, as is set in the Table of our English Writers, and died the yeare of Christs incarnation seuen hundred ninety three, the eighteenth day of May, and his Kingdome intruded vpon by the Mercians, hauing had neither wife nor children, that Historians make mention of: after whose death the Kingdom of the East-Angles was brought to decay, both by the Mercians, West-Saxons, and them of Kent; so that by means of their violence, that Prouince was destitute of her owne Gouernours, the space of seuenty seuen yeeres, vntill lastly the assaults of the Danes, a new-come Guest and most dangerous Enemie, caused the other Kings to stand vpon their Guards, and rather to defend what they already had gotten, then to seeke inlargement, to the hazard of all: at which time, it is said one Offa, to whom the right of that Crowne belonged, vpon a religious deuotion, tooke his pilgrimage to the Sepulchre of Christ, and visiting in his way a kinsman of his, whose name was Alkmund, at the Citie Norhenberge in Saxonie, there made his will, wherin hee adopted young Edmund his heire, the son of Alkmond: and accomplishing his volage, in his return died at the Port Saint George, from whence hee sent young Edmund his King, and therwith ordained him King of the East-Angles. Alkmund a Prince of great power in those parts, maintained his sons rightfull election, and with a sufficient power sent him to claime the kingdome. These landing in the East of England, at a place called Maydenboure, built a roiall Tower, which hee named, and to this day is called, Hunstantone, situated vpon the North-west point of Norfolke, that beareth likewise his owne name.

Offa heire to the Crowne, adopteth Edmund the sonne of Alkmond.

Edmund thus arriued, was as willingly receiued and by the East-Angles made their king; in whose time Hungar and Hubba, two Danish Captains, with an innumerable multitude of Heathen Danes, entred the Land at the mouth of Humber, and from thence inuaded Nottingham, Yorke and Northumberland, where (without respect of age or sex) they laid all wast, and left the Land whence they departed like to a desolate Wildernesse. From thence they came with the like furie into Edmunds territories, and sacked Thetford a frequent City in those daies: but he not able to withstand their violence, fled into his Castle at Framingham, wherein hee was of them besieged; and lastly, taken (saith Abba Floriacensis) in a village then called Heglisdune, of a wood bearing the same name, or rather yeelded himselfe to their torments, to saue more Christian bloud; for it is recorded, that because of his most constant Faith and Profession, those Pagans first beat him with bats, then scourged him with whips, he still calling vpon the name of Iesus; for rage whereof, they bound him to a stake, and with their arrowes shot him to death; and cutting off his head, contemptuously threw it into a bush, after he had raigned ouer the East-Angles the space of sixteene yeeres, hauing had neither wife nor issue that is read of. His body and head, after the Danes were departed, were buried at the same roiall Towne, as Abbo terms it, where Sigebert the East-Anglean King, and one of his predecessors, at his establishing of Christianity, built a Church, and where afterwards (in honour of him) was built another most spatious, and of a wonderfull frame of Timber, and the name of the Towne, vpon the occasion of his burial, called vnto this day, Saint Edmondsbury. This Church and place, Suenus the Pagan Danish King in impiety and fury burned to ashes. But when his sonne Canute had made conquest of this Land, and gotten possession of the English Crowne, terrified and affrighted (as saith the Legend) with a vision of the seeming Saint Edmund, in a religious deuotion to expiate his Fathers sacrilege, built it anew most sumptuously, enriched this place with Charters & Gifts, and offred his owne Crowne vpon the Martyrs Tombe. After the death of this Edmund the East-Angles Country was possessed by the Danes, & so continued about some fifty yeers, vntil that Edward surnamed the Elder, expulsed these Danes, and ioined that kingdome a Prouince to the West-Saxons, after it had stood three hundred fifty three yeeres.

CHAPTER XII.

Hitherto the Saxons Heptarchy.

NOw as we haue ſpoken of euery ſeuerall Saxon King, that attained vnto, and held poſſeſsion of any part in the East & South of this Iland, vntill ſuch time as their Crownes were worne by their Conquerors, and the ſeuenfold diuided Heptarchy, vnited into an abſolute Monarchy: ſo by order of Hiſtory it is required, that their oppoſers (the Britains) ſo long as they kept their ground, and ſtood in defence of their owne rightful inheritance, ſhould be ſhewed: who with as great a diſdaine, and valorous reſiſtance, vnder-went the yoake of the Saxons ſubiections, as their ancient Anceſtors had endeauoured to cleere themſelues from the chaines of the Romans captiuity. And vntill God and deſtinie withdrew from them the hand of defence, they mated the Saxons in all their deſignes. For albeit that the Romans had robbed the Land of her ſtrength, and the aſpired Vortigern, called in theſe Strangers for his defence: yet their purpoſes being wiſely perceiued, the execution therof was as preſently practiſed, and as eagerly purſued, whileſt the pillars (that ſupported the frame of their gouerment) ſtood vpon their owne Baſes. But the ground-work failing, and thoſe props not many, the waight of all, fell vpon ſome few, whoſe acts and manly reſiſtance (Chriſt aſsiſting) ſhall further bee related, as time ſhall bring them to the yeeres of their aduentures, and carry our Hiſtory thorow the affaires of their times. Meane while, as we haue recorded the names of their Anceſtors, and worthy forerunners, the reſiſters of the Romans: ſo now if you pleaſe, behold the Catalogue of their Kings, from the foreſaid Vortigern (the firſt ſubdued by theſe Saxons) vnto Cadwallader the laſt of thoſe Britiſh Princes; who left to them his Land, and went himſelf to Rome: whoſe times & ſtories, according to thoſe Guids that lead vs, wee wil declare, referring the credit thereof to our Britiſh Hiſtorians; againſt whom howſoeuer ſome exceptions are, and may be iuſtly taken, yet are they not altogether to be caſt off, in the affaires of theſe enſuing Princes, eſpecially Gyldas and Ninius, who liued in, and preſently after the times of thoſe reſisters. Neither is it to be doubted, but that many others there were of that Nation, no leſſe carefull for tranſferring the remembrance of their Anceſtors actions to poſteritie, (no Nation liuing being more zealouſly deuoted in that kinde,) though their writings haue in Times ruines beene buried, and their remembrances preſerued onely by perpetuitie of traditions. and although wee haue ſhewed the ancient Coines of the Britaines, and obſerued a ſeries thorow the Romanes ſucceſsion: yet be not offended, that I leaue onely Blanks for theſe latter Princes, as alſo the firſt Saxons, wanting the Monies of their owne ſeuerall Mintes.

Vortigern the firſt and Cadwallader the laſt reſiſter of the Saxons.

Such therfore as I haue found of any Kings ſtamp, raigning whileſt the Land was diuided and enioied amongſt them, I haue in the margent of their remembrances affixed, with the Armes attributed to euery ſeuerall kingdome: and hence will obſerue the ſame order, without any inuention or fained inſcription: which howſoeuer wee want to furniſh their ſucceſsions, yet this am I ſure of, no Nation in Europe can ſhew the like, or can come to ſo true a ſeries of their Soueraignes Coines, as England is able at this day to doe.

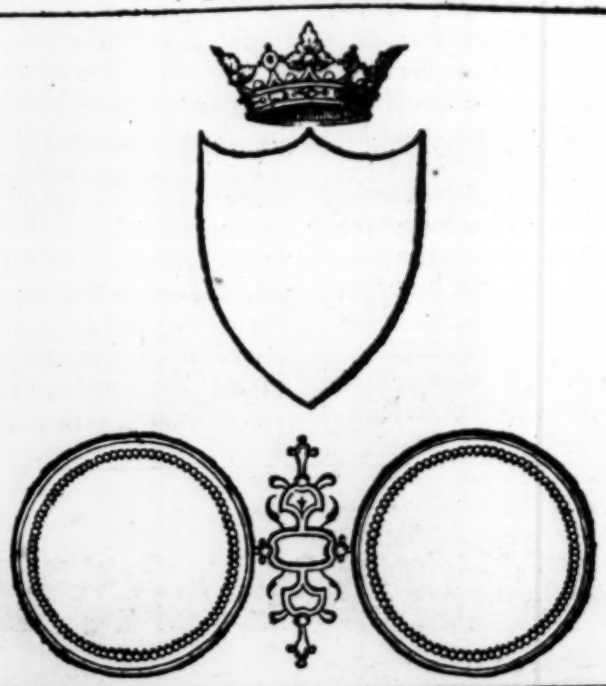
VORTIGERN. 1.



VOrtigern among the many moleſtatiõs of the Scots and Picts, was ordained the ſupreme Gouernor of theſe affaires; and to that end, with the Britaines full conſent was elected their King. For as touching that Monkiſh

Monkish Conſtantine, the ſonne of Conſtantius, who is ſaid to be the brother of Aldreomus, King of Little Britaine in France, ſent for and made King by theſe Britaines, whoſe ſimplicitie this Vortigern is ſaid to abuſe, and laſtly to cauſe his murther and death; I rather thinke the ſtorie to be the ſame that happened aboue fortie yeeres before, in the daies of Honorius the Emperor; when Conſtantius among other Conſpirators, was raiſed vpon a hopefull expectation conceiued in his name.

This Conſtantius indeed had a ſonne that bare his name, a man of a ſoft ſpirit, and no deepe reach, and therefore in his youth was made a Monke. But his Father riſen to his aſpiring honour, created him firſt his Ceſar, and next Auguſtus, till Fortune turned thoſe ſmiles into frownes, and ſtained their purple robes in both their own blouds. For not only the ſame names induceth this doubt, but the place, which was Wincheſter, and Abbey Amphibilus, where this Imperiall Monke was ſhorne, doth not a little confirme the ſame; the remaines of which Colledge, by that ſtrong and thicke wall ſtanding to this day at the Weſt gate of that Cathedrall Church, doth not a little confirme. But wanting better directions to our proceedings, we muſt follow for theſe times men of latter yeeres, and not without ſome ſuſpect of vncertaintie. The rather, for that the Saxons as then the chiefe Actors in this Land, haue purpoſely concealed all Victors and victories againſt themſelues; neither but ſparingly haue recorded their owne.

Saxons haue concealed all victories againſt themſelues.

This Vortigern, howſoeuer attaining the Crowne, was ouer-awed (ſaith Ninius) by the Picts & Scots, ſtood in feare of the Roman forces, and dread much the returne of Aurelius Ambroſius, with his brother Vter, ſurnamed Pendragon: and therefore wanting ſtrength of his owne to maintaine his ſtanding, ſent for the Saxons, as wee haue ſaid. He (ſaith the Britiſh Story) was Earle of Cornwall, of an honourable Familie and noble deſcent, his Lady euery way anſwerable to both; by whom hee had three ſonnes, Vortimer, Catigern, and Paſcentius. His ſecond wife, or rather Concubine, (hauing caſt off this firſt) was Rowena, the daughter of Hengiſt, which Pagan mariage prooued not only the bane of the Land, but ſo ruinated the Church of Chriſtianity, that a Prouinciall Councell of the Britaines was aſſembled in Ann. 470. to repaire thoſe things that this mariage had decaied.

By this Heathen Damoſell he had a daughter, who (againſt the law of God and Nature) was his third wife, that Kings (as he pretended, to excuſe his inceſt) might be deſcended from the right iſſue of Kings, vpon whom he begot his ſad lamenting ſonne Fauſtus, a vertuous Impe of thoſe impious parents, that ſpent his life in a ſolitarie place neere to the Riuer Llynterreny, as wee haue ſaid; who abandoning the companie of men, among thoſe mountaines ſerued God in continuall teares and praiers, for remiſsion of the fault committed in his inceſtuous generation, for the recalling of his parents to a better life, and for the reſtitution of his Country to her former libertie.

His third wife was his owne daughter.

Fauſtus the ſonne of Vortigern by his third wife.

This Vortigern raigned firſt ſixteene yeeres, and then depoſed for his fauours to the Saxons, was retained in durance all the raigne of Vortimer his ſonne, after whoſe death reeſtabliſhed, but oppreſſed by his Saxons, and purſued by Aurelius, he withdrew himſelfe into Wales, and among thoſe vaſt mountaines built a Caſtle by Merlins direction, wherof we haue ſpoken, and more we would ſpeake, were thoſe fantaſticke fictions vnderſet with any props of likelihood or truth, which Rand. of Cheſter in his daies vtterly reiected.

Vortimer, the eldeſt ſon of King Vortigern, through the abuſe of his fathers gouernment, for which he was depoſed by his owne ſubiects, was erected King of the Britaines the yeere from Chriſts birth 454. a man of great valour, which altogether hee imploied for the redreſſe of his Countrey, according to the teſtimonie of William Malmesbury, whoſe words are theſe: Vortimer (ſaith hee) thinking not good to diſſemble the matter, for that hee ſaw himſelfe and Countrie daily ſurpriſed by the craft of the Engliſh, ſet his full purpoſe to driue them out, and from the ſeuenth yeere after their firſt entrance, for twenty yeeres continuance fought many Battles with them, and foure of them with great puiſſance in open field; in the firſt whereof, they departed with like fortune, and loſſe of the Generals brethren Horſa and Catigern: in the other three the Britaines went away with victorie, and ſo long vntill Vortimer was taken away by fatall death.

Huntington, Monmouth, Randulphus, and Fabian, name both the places and ſucceſſe of thoſe Battles: The firſt was in Kent, and vpon the Plaine neere vnto Ailsford, where the memoriall of Catigern to this day remaineth; & Horſted doth as yet reliſh of Horſa there interred. The ſecond Battle was fought likewiſe in Kent at Crocanford, now Craford, where many periſhed as well Britaines as Saxons. The third was at Wepped Fleet, with great loſſe to the Britaines: and the fourth vpon Calmore, where many of the Saxons, after long and ſore fight, were ſlaine, and more drowned in flight, and laſtly driuen into the Ile of Thanet, their firſt firſt aſsigned habitation, (if not ouer the Seas) ſo that ſmall hope reſted for them ſo long as this valiant Vortimer liued, who had now diſpoſſeſſed them of all their footing in the Continent, and often aſſailed them in the Ile of Tannet likewiſe, as Fabian confidently affirmeth.

Vortimer made away by Rowena.

But deſtiny going forward for the downfall of Britaine, remooued theſe rubbes out of her way: for Rowena, the mother of the Britaines miſchiefe, and the maintainer of the Saxons reſidence, found the meanes to make this worthy Vortimer away, and by poiſon cauſed the end of his life, after hee had valiantly raigned the ſpace of foure yeeres; all which time, by the teſtimonie of an old Chronicle that Fabian had ſeene, Vortigern the father remained in durance, and vnder aſsigned Keepers in the Citie Caerlegion, now Cheſter, and ſo demeaned himſelfe towards his ſonne (then his Soueraigne) in dutifull obedience and faithfull counſell, that hee wonne againe the hearts of the Britaines, and was againe re-eſtabliſhed their King.

Vortigern reeſtabliſhed King.

It is recorded by Ninius, that after his laſt victorie ouer the Saxons, he cauſed his Monument to be erected at the entrance into Tanet, and in the ſame place of that great ouerthrow, which by the ſaid Author is called Lapis Tituli, of vs the Stonar, where for certaine it ſeemes hath been an hauen. In this Monument hee commanded his body to be buried, to the further terror of the Saxons, that in beholding this his Trophy, their ſpirits might bee daunted at the remembrance of their great ouerthrow. As Scipio Africanus conceited the like, who commanded his Sepulchre to be ſo ſet, that it might ouerlooke Africa, ſuppoſing that his very Tombe would be a terror to the Carthaginians. But how that deſire of Vortimer was performed, I finde not, but rather the contrary: for an old Manuſcript I haue, that cõfidently affirmeth him to be buried in London: yet others from Ninius the diſciple of Eluodugus, hold the place to bee Lincolne. But howſouer his graue is forgotten, yet let this bee remembred, that Sigebertus hath written of him, that is, After he had vanquiſhed the Saxons (ſaith he) whoſe drift was not onely to ouer-runne the Land with violence, but alſo to erect their owne Lawes without clemencie, he reſtored the Chriſtian Religion then ſorely decaied, and new built the Churches that thoſe enemies had deſtroied.

AVRELIVS AMBROSIVS. 3.

3. An. Do. 466. The third reſiſter of the Saxons.

Aurelius Ambroſius, verily deſcended of that Conſtantine who in the fourth Conſulſhip of Theodoſius the younger, was elected here in Britaine, onely in hope of his luckie name, ſucceeded Vortigern the Father in the Gouernment of Britaine, and Vortimer the ſonne, in affection and defence of his Country. He with Vter (ſaith Geffrey Monmouth) when their brother Conſtantine was murthered by Vortigern, fled into France, where they remained the yeeres of his firſt raigne; whoſe returne (as we haue heard from Ninius) he greatly feared, and whoſe force at his laſt he felt to his ſmart. For hauing againe reſumed his Crowne, he liued in his old ſinnes, and ſuffered the Saxons to be Lords of his Land: to preuent which (ſaith Beda from Gyldas) the Britaines by little and little beganne to take ſtrength, and with ſome courage to come forth of their Caues, who with one vniforme conſent, called to God for his heauenly helpe. They had (ſaith he) for their Captaine a Roman called Ambroſius Aurelianus, a gentle natured man, which onely of all the bloud of the Romans remained then aliue, his parents being ſlaine, which bore the name of King of the Country. This man being their Leader, prouoked the Victors to the fight, and through Gods aſsiſtance atchieued the victory. From that day forward now the Britaines, now the Saxons did preuaile, vntill the yeere that Bathe was beſieged, which was fortie foure yeeres after their firſt comming into the Iland.

Geffrey Gaxton, Polych.

His firſt expedition (as our Britiſh Hiſtorians report) was againſt Vortigern, and his Caſtle in Wales, wherein that inceſtuous King was conſumed to aſhes by lightning from heauen, as we haue ſaid: and then following the Saxons, made toward Yorke, & at Maesbel beyond Humber, encountering Hengiſt, became his Victor: vnto whoſe mercy (ſay they) his ſonne Octa yeelded himſelfe, and obtained in free gift the Country in Gallaway in Scotland for him and his Saxons. But theſe his affaires thus proſpering againſt the common Enemie, was enuied at by Paſcentius, the youngeſt ſon of King Vortigern, who not able either to mate the Saxons, or after his Brethrens deaths to recouer the Kingdome to himſelfe, ambitiouſly ſought to prefer his baſe humor before the recouery of his Countries libertie, which then lay gored in her owne bloud. For hauing gotten the aid of Gillamare King of Ireland, whether hee had fled vpon the death of his Father, and now returned into the weſt of Wales, firſt indammaged the Citie of S. Dauids, and thence proceeded with fire and ſword. Aurelius then ſicke in the Citie of Wincheſter, ſent his brother Vter to withſtand his force, who ſlew both Paſcentius and the Iriſh King his partaker, in a ſet & ſore battell fought betwixt them. But before this battell, Paſcentius had ſent a Saxon, whoſe name was Eopa, in ſhew a Britaine, and in habit a Phyſitian, to miniſter poiſon in ſtead of phyſicke, which according was effected with Ambroſius his death.

manner and forme in our draught of Wiltshire wee haue inserted. The matter being Stones of a great and huge bignesse, so that some of them containe twelue tunne in waight, and twenty eight foote or more in length, their breadth seuen, and compasse sixteene. These are set in the ground of a good depth, and stand in a round circle by two and two, hauing a third stone somewhat of lesse quantitie laid gate-wise ouerthwart on their toppes, fastned with tenons and mortaises, the one into the other; which to some seeme so dangerous, as they may not safely be passed vnder, the rather for that many of them are fallen downe, and the rest suspected of no sure foundation: notwithstanding, at my being there, I neither saw cause of such feare, nor vncertaintie in accounting of their numbers, as is said to be. The stones are gray, but not marbled, wherein great holes are beaten euen by force of weather, that serue for Rauens and other birds to build in, and bring foorth their young. The groun d-plot containeth about three hundred foot in compasse, in forme almost round, or rather like vnto a horse-shooe, with an entrance in vpon the east-side. Three rowes of stones seeme formerly to haue beene pitched, the largest outwards, and the least inwards; many whereof are now fallen downe: but those that stand, shew so faire an aspect, and that so farre off, that they seeme to the beholders to bee some Fortresse or strong Castle. A Trench also is about them, which hath beene much deeper; and vpon the plaines adioining, many round copped hilles, without any such trench, (as it were cast vp out of the earth) stand like great hay-cockes in a plaine meadow: In these, and thereabouts, by digging haue beene found peeces of ancient fashioned armour, with the bones of men, whose bodies were thus couered with earth that was brought thither by their wel-willers and friends, euen in their head-peeces; a token of loue that then was vsed, as some imagine.

The description of the Monument of Stanhenge.

Ancient fashioned Armor found at Stanhenge.

This Trophey, Aurelius Ambrosius (in memoriall of the Britaines massacre) erected, and is worthily accounted for one of the Wonders of this Iland, and are in the verses of Alexander Netham called The Giants Daunce, wherein this Ambrosius was interred after hee had raigned thirtie two yeeres, and wherof the towne Ambresbury beares the name. Others report, that the Britaines erected this most stately Sepulcher ouer the body of Ambrosius there slaine by the sword of his enemies; that his Countries loue, in such a costly peece of worke, might remaine vnto posterities in this, the Altar of his vertue and manhood: for Paulus Diaconus saith, that this man, in succouring his decaied Countrie, tooke vpon him the Imperiall Robe, and against the violent rage of those German enemies, oft times ouerthrew their puissant armies, but was lastly slaine by them vpon the Plaines of Salesburie. I cannot with silence let passe the ridiculous reports of the bringing of the Stones out of Africke into Ireland, and from thence, vnder the conduct of Vter the brother of Ambrosius, vnto this Plain, by the industrious meanes of Merlin, surnamed Ambrose, borne in the ancient City Merdhyn, and as Humfrey Lhuyd saith, of a noble virgin, whose father, for his skill in the Mathematicks, and wonderfull knowledge in all other kinde of learning, was by the rude common people reputed to be the sonne of an Incubus, or a male Diuell, which in the similitude and likenesse of men doe vse carnally to companie with women. But how this may agree with his diuine mouth, that telles vs the Spirits haue neither flesh nor bones; and the whole Scriptures, that man is carnally begotten, conceiued and born, I leaue for others further to dispute. Only I know, that such begettings as Merlines is reported to bee, without father, and Simon Magus also, that before him would needs be the sonne of a Virgin, doe not a little contradict our Christian Profession, who acknowledge onely the conception of Christ to be conceiued without the seed of man, or of sinne. But to our purpose: Ambrosius Aurelius (by Panuinius accounted the last Emperour of the British bloud) is said to raigne in Britaine thirty two yeeres, and to die in that of Christs Incarnation foure hundred ninety seuen.

VTER PENDRAGON. 4

An. Do. 498.

Mat. Westminster.

Vter, surnamed Pendragon, the brother of Ambrosius, succeeded him both in valour, and in the Gouernment of Britaine. His entrance was with troubles against the Saxons, who vnder the leading of Eske and Octa, the sonnes of King Hengist, had passed with spoile to the Citie Yorke, whither this new-made Generall presently repaired, and giuing them battell, with the discomfiture of the whole Army, tooke both the brethren prisoners, and committed them to safe custodie.

Hect. Boetius.

But the Britaines (saith Boetius) becomming disloiall to their Prince, seldome assisted him with preuenting counsell: and the Prince enamored vpon the Duke of Cornwals Wife, consulted more with Merline to transforme himselfe from himselfe, then to giue direction against the common enemie. For comming to Tindagell Castle in Cornwall, possessed by Gorlois, Duke of that Prouince, beheld (in his eye) the Paragon of Nature, which was Lady Igren, his Dutches and wife. Vter, whose thoughts till then had bin free, and from his childhood had euer followed Mars in the field, was now surprised so far with her loue, that his Shield and Armes were both neglected and vnworne, and all his thoughts set on worke to purchase his most wished desire; which lastly, by Merline and Magick was effected, and that after this manner (if we will beleeue him of Monmouth, who is the reporter.) His ſuites and hopes failing (ſaith he) to win her vnto diſhonour, Merline altogether new-moulded the ſhape of King Vter, and printed in his face the feature of Gorlois her owne Lord, by which meanes, and without ſuſpect the King diſhonourably violated this Ladies chaſtitie, in which Bed of deceit, the famous Arthur was begot. The captiue Captaines Eske and Octa in theſe looſe times of his loue, gat looſe from their Keepers, and with their ratling armour rouſed Vter from this wanton Lullaby; who with troopes of ſtrength, and trumpets of defiance, met theſe Saxons face to face in the field, where betwixt them was fought a moſt bloudy battell, and that euen almoſt to the laſt ſtroke, and wherein, if fatall deſtinie had withdrawne her hand, the Iland had been rid of theſe Intruders for euer. For therein (ſay our Authours) the Saxons periſhed by the Britaines ſwords; vpon whoſe points alſo Eske and Octa paid their eſcapes with the loſſe of their liues. This field was at Verolam, whither Vter ſicke, and in his Horſe-litter, was borne among his Army, and after long and ſore ſiege, wonne from them that Citie. Finally, when this King had raigned the ſpace of eighteene yeeres, he died by poiſon put into a well, whereof vſually he dranke, and was buried at Stonhenge with his brother Ambroſius.

For in all his warres againſt the Saxons, hee was moſt fortunate and victorious, with their great ouerthrowes. But others will haue him ſo named from his Royall Banner, borne euer before him, wherein was portraied a Dragon with a Golden Head; of which Standerd ſince, neighbour Nations haue had good experience, and in far Country it hath been diſplaied in the cauſe of Chriſtianitie, to the terror of the Pagans, as in Syria by that inuincible Engliſh King, Richard the firſt, ſurnamed Cur-de-lion; in Scotland and Wales by that conquering Prince Edward the firſt, and the ſame as yet is in field borne for an Imperiall Standard in our Engliſh Campes.

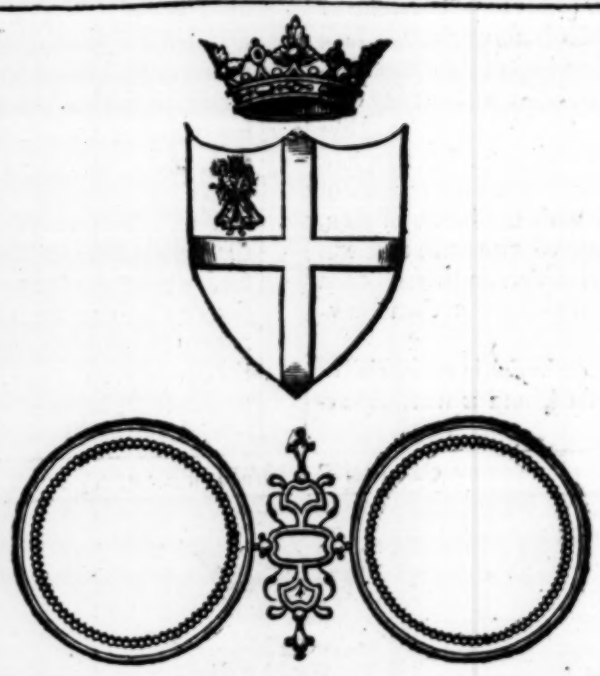
KING ARTHVR. 5.



5. An. Do. 516.

Matth. Weſtm.

Scotia Chron.

Matth. Weſtm.

ARthur the ſonne of Vter, begotten as is ſaid of Ladie Igren Dutcheſſe of Cornwall, was crowned King at fifteene yeeres of age, about the yeere of Chriſt fiue hundred and ſixteene; or as Matthew of Weſtminſter hath it, fiue hundred and eighteene. His proſperous entrance was enuied at by Lotho King of the Picts, and by Couran King of the Scots, who had married his owne Aunts, Anna and Alda, the two ſiſters of Ambroſe and Vter, each of them expecting the Crowne before him, through the opinion and repute of his baſtardie, eſpecially Lotho, who had iſſue by Anna, Mordrad, and Gawan: the latter of which ſpent his life in the cauſe of that quarrell. His firſt proceedings were againſt the common enemie the Saxons, whoſe Captaine Colgerne, he chaſed from Northumberland into Yorke; which Citie likewiſe he girt with a ſtrait ſiege, notwithſtanding Colgerne thence eſcaped into Germany, and of King Cherdick got ſuccour for his Saxons, who with ſeuen hundred ſaile arriued in Scotland. Arthur aduertiſed of his great power, raiſed his ſiege, and drew towards London, and thence ſent for aid to his Nephew Howel, King of Little Britaine in France, who came himſelfe in perſon to ioyne with his Vncle.

Theſe from South-hampton marched to Lincolne, which Citie Cherdick had ſtrongly beſieged, but was thence forced by Arthurs conquering ſword. Twelue battels he fought againſt theſe Saxons (as Ninius recordeth) with great manhood and victorie. The firſt was at the mouth of the Riuer Gleyne: the ſecond, third, fourth, and fifth, vpon the Banks of Douglaſſe, in the Countie of Lineux: the ſixth vpon the Riuer Baſſus; the ſeuenth in the wood Calidon; the eighth neere to the Caſtle Guynien; the ninth in Wales, at the Towne Cairelien; the tenth at Trachenrith, or Rithowode vpon the Sea ſide: the eleuenth vpon a hill named Agned Cathergonien; and the twelfth at Bathe, or Bathen-hill, where the Britaines (as Beda ſaith) gaue the Saxons a very great ouerthrow; which (by Gyldas report) happened fortie foure yeeres after the Saxons firſt arriuage into Britaine, the yeere wherein himſelfe was borne.

Beda hiſt. Angl. lib. 1. cap. 16.

Of Arthurs ſucceſſe both at home and abroad, his great magnificence in Court and Countrey, his Banners, and foure Golden Swords borne before him, his Round Tables, and challenges of Martiall Honour, let Monmouth the Writer, Newbery the Reſiſter, and Leiland the Maintainer, be heard for me. But certaine it is (by the report of Malmesbury) that Arthur was a Prince more worthy to be aduanced by the truth of Records in warrantable credit, then by fables ſcandalized with poeticall fictions and hyperbolicall falſhoods. Whoſe Banner was ſo often ſpread for the cauſe of Chriſtianitie, and defenſe of his Countrey, being the only proppe that vpheld the ſame. And lamentable it is, that the fame of this puiſſant Prince had not beene ſounded by a more certaine Trumpet: for to ſay the truth of his Writer euen in a word, hee was well skilled in Antiquities of tradition, but but as it ſeemeth, not any of ancient credit, ſo many toies and tales hee euery where interlaceth out of his owne braine, wherewith hee was charged while himſelfe liued, inſomuch as he is now ranged among thoſe Writers whom the Roman Church hath cenſured to be forbidden.

This hurt therefore thoſe ouer-zealous Monkes haue done to the Subiect whereof they wrote, that through an ouer-much conceited opinion, with the vertue and fame of the perſon, they haue mingled ſuch matters as may iuſtly be reiected, whereby their worths are not only depriued of their truly-deſerued honours, but which more is, euen their perſons ſuſpected to be nought elſe but fictions, as Hercules in Ouid, or Hector in Homer. And ſo hath Geffrey done by this moſt worthy Prince Arthur, whoſe warres againſt the Saxons for defenſe of this Iland, he hath enlarged with the Conqueſts of other Kingdomes and Countries, wherein he neuer came: which hath made not onely his Acts to be doubted of, but euen his perſon to bee called in queſtion, whether any ſuch Arthur euer ruled in Britaine. Yet with better regard to the Recorders of his ſpreading fame, we grant both the man, and many honorable parts in him, though not in the like manner as they haue laid them downe. Neither are we ſtraied ſo farre from the ſteps of credulitie, that we can beleeue no more then wee ſee, or that ſeeing, bee fore-ſtalled with a preiudicate opinion: for though we conſent not to the fables of Homer, neither to the inuentions that Euripides and Sophocles made vpon the Battles of Troy, yet wee denie not but that there were Warres and Battles at Troy, wherein many Martiall acts vndoubtedly were performed: neither doubt wee of his perſon, as Seneca ſeemeth to doe of Iupiters, but acknowledge it with reuerence for truth, yet with this reſeruation, that all is not Goſpell which is written in Greeke. And had there not beene a truth of things whereupon Poets made their fables, there had beene at this day no fables of Poets in the world. And as Geffrey wondreth that neither Gyldas nor Beda doe mention Arthur nor his great deeds, ſo ſaith Randulphus, may we at Geffrey, that hath augmented them aboue the pitch of credulitie. But for the truth of this Prince, beſides a Charter exemplified vnder the ſeale of King Edward the Third, wherein mention is made of King Arthur, to haue beene a great Benefactour to the Abbey of Glaſtenbury, who as Iohn Rouſe reporteth, had giuen Bren-march and other Demaines, to the value of fiue hundred Markes yeerely, to the ſaid Monaſterie. His Armes (being an Eſcocheon, wheron a Croſſe, with the Virgin Mary bearing Chriſt in her armes) cut in ſtone, and ſtanding ouer the firſt Gate of entrance as yet, is ſaid to be the Armes of that Abbey. And Ioſeph, the iudicious Monke of Exceſter, who followed King Richard the Firſt in his warre for the Conqueſt of the Holy Land, in his poeticall verſes extolleth Arthur with Alexander, Caſar, and Hercules; yea and Ninius, farre his ancient, calleth Arthur an Iron Mall, that both bruiſed and brake the Lions iawes aſunder.

Therefore of his perſon we make no doubt, though his acts haue beene written with too lauiſh a pen: neither conſent we with thoſe Hiſtorians that naturalize him for a Britaine, ſeeing that Ninius, Beda, Malmesburie, and himſelfe ſeeme to ſpeake the contrarie: for Ambroſius being the brother of Vter Pendragon, as we already from Beda haue ſhewed, was a Captaine deſcended from the bloud of the Romans, whoſe parents ſaith Ninius, had worne the Purple Robe, and both of them the ſonnes of Conſtantine, whoſe father in Britaine againſt Honorius the Emperour had put on the ſaid Robe. And by his naturall deſcent from the Romans, Arthur not only denied them Tribute, but alſo threatned to haue a Tribute from Rome: for in his Letters to that end ſent vnto the Senate, thus in an old Manuſcript we finde it indited: Vnderſtand among you of Rome, that I am King Arthur of Britaine, and freely it hold, and ſhall hold; and at Rome haſtily will I bee, not to giue you truage, but to haue truage of you: for Conſtantine that was Helenes ſonne, and other of mine Anceſtors conquered Rome, and thereof were Emperours, and that they had and held I ſhall haue your Goddis grace. Whereby is manifeſt his bloud was from the Romans. Let not therefore any of our Britaines take exceptions againſt me for this, neither that I enlarge not his fame, by the enlargement of his Empire in Ruſſia, Lapland, and in making Norway his Chamber of Britaine, as if that Kingdome and Title ſhould bee giuen him by the Pope, that indeed cuts large thongs out of other mens Leather: his Conqueſts of thirty Kingdomes, and killing of Denabus the huge Spaniſh Giant, & his combat with Frolo Gouernor of France, and with Lucius Hiberus the Roman Legate, whoſe ſlaine body hee ſent to the Senate for the tribute of Britaine by them demanded: ſeeing that others before mee, farre more ripe Hiſtorians, haue made both doubts and obiections againſt them. And therefore I conclude with this Arthur, as Saint Auguſtine with the Athenians, whoſe men (ſaith he) were euer greater in fame then in deeds. And with Ninius will end with his ſaying; Arthurus pugnabat contra illos in diebus illis; & licet multi ipſo nobiliores eſſent, ipſe tamen duodecies Dux belli fuit, Victorque bellorum: Arthur made warre againſt them in thoſe daies; and though many were more noble then he, yet was hee twelue times Generall in the Field, and returned Conquerour. But more conſtant is the memorie of his death, and place of his buriall, both which are reported vpon warrantable credit: for Mordred the ſonne of Lotho, whereof wee haue ſpoken, affecting the Crown, vpon a pretence of right from King Vter, and ſuppoſed baſtardiſe of Arthur, gaue many attempts, through the aid of his Picts, and aſsiſtance of the Saxons, to diſpoſſeſſe him of that wherein he was ſeated: and laſtly at * Kamblan or Cambula in Cornwall (ſaith Leland) this Britiſh Hector encountring Mordred, ſlew him out-right, and receiued of him his owne deaths wound. The witneſſe of this Field as yet are thoſe peeces of Armour, horſe-harneſſe, and other habiliments of Warre, which are daily digged vp in tillage of the ground; vnleſſe thoſe reliques of Battle be the ſeales of that fight which Marianus writeth to haue beene in this place betwixt the Britaines and Saxons, in the yeere of our Lord eight hundred and twenty.

If then it bee true that Arthur heere died, this place we may ſay ſeemeth to be conſecrated vnto Mars: for Tindagell Caſtle, ſtanding hard by, firſt brought into the world this glorious Prince, for one of her nine Worthies, and Cambula againe receiued his laſt bloud. But from this place he was carried vnto Glaſtenburie in Somerſet-ſhire, where he died the one and twentieth of May, in the yeere of our Saluation fiue hundred forty and two, after he had moſt victoriouſly raigned twenty ſix yeeres. His body was there buried, and ſix hundred yeeres after was taken vp, and found vpon this occaſion: When Henry the ſecond, and firſt Plantagenet, had ſwaied the Engliſh Scepter to the laſt of his raigne, it chanced him at Pembrooke to heare ſung to the Harpe certaine Ditties of the worthy exploits and acts of this Arthur, (by a Welſh Bard, as they were termed, whoſe cuſtome was to record and ſing at their Feaſts the noble deeds of their Anceſtours) wherein mention was made of his death, and place of buriall, deſigning it to be in the Church-yard of Glaſtenburie, and that betwixt two Pyramides therein ſtanding: whereupon King Henry cauſed the ground to be digged, and at ſeuen foot depth was found a huge broad ſtone, wherein a leadden Croſſe was faſtned, and in that ſide that lay downeward, in rude and barbarous letters (as rudely ſet and contriued) this inſcription written vpon that ſide of the Lead that was towards the ſtone:

HIC IACET SEPVLTVS REX ARTVRIVS IN INSVLA AVALONIA.

Heere lieth King Arthur buried in the Ile of Avalonia.

And digging nine foot deeper, his body was found in the trunke of a Tree, the bones of great bigneſſe, and in his ſcull perceiued ten wounds, the laſt very great, and plainely ſeene. His Queene Guineuer, that had beene neere kinſwoman to Cador Duke of Cornwall, a Lady

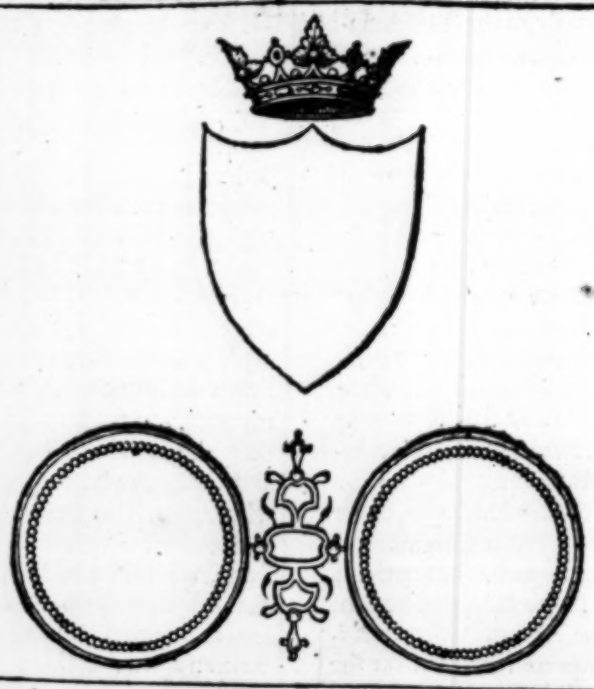
CONSTANTINE 61.



An. D. 542.

Brute booke.

Conſtantine the ſonne of Cador Duke of Cornwall, and coſen to King Arthur by his alliance in mariage, at his death was appointed by him to ſucceed in his Dominions, and moſt ioifully receiued of the Commons, as the man, in the opinion of this worthy elector and themſelues, accounted moſt fit to defend the Land from the many oppreſsions of the Saxons, who now beganne to ſpreade the wing as farre as to Tyne in the North, and to ſet downe the limits of their ſeuerall Kingdomes; which notwithſtanding, theſe ſtrangers daily enlarged vpon the home-bred Inhabitants, the ciuill warres of the Britaines giuing way to the ſame, and that not onely among themſelues, but by the Picts alſo, in the behalfe of the two ſonnes of Mordred, that ſought to diſpoſſeſſe him of the Crown. In which quarrel many battles were fought, but with ſuch ſucceſſe to the attemptors, that theſe two Competitors were forced for refuge into London and Winchester, Gyldas. Aber ſuccyſ.

chester, whither Constantine pursued them, they taking Sanctuarie in the Churches, and not farre from the Altars he slew them: for which deede, the Priest Gyldas, that flourished in those daies, in his inuective reprehensions thus writeth: Britaine hath Kings (saith hee) but they are Tyrants: Iudges it hath, but they are wicked, pilling and harming the innocent people; reuenging and defending, but whom? Such as be guilty and robbers. They haue many wiues, yet breake they wedlocke; many times swearing, yet periure themselues; vowing, but for the most part with dissembling lies; warring, but still maintaining vniust and ciuill broiles; abroad pursuing theeues, and yet at home cherish them, euen at their owne Tables, and sometimes also reward them. They giue large almes indeed, yet heape they vp sinnes high as the Mountaine. They sit in the Seat of sentence, yet seldome seeke the rule of right iudgement, despising the humble and innocent persons, and extolling vp to Heauen proud and bloudie Murderers, Theeues, and Adulterers, yea and if he would permit them, the very enemies of God. Many they keepe in prison, and load them with irons, more to serue their owne purposes, then for any guilt in the person, taking solemn Oaths before & vpon the Altars, and yet despise they the Altars, as altogether vile, and but filthie stones.

Of this hainous and wicked offense, Constantine the tyrannicall whelpe of the Lionesse of Deuon-shire is not ignorant, who this yeere, after the receiuing of his dreadfull Oath, whereby he bound himselfe, that in no wise he should hurt his Subiects, (God first, and then his Oath, with the company of Saints, and his owne mother being present) did notwithstanding in the reuerend laps of both his Mothers, the Church, and her by nature, and that vnder the vesture of an holy Abbat, deuoure with sword and speare, in stead of teeth, the tender sides and the entrailes of two children of noble and Kingly race, and likewise of their two Gouernours, yea and that (as I said) before the sacred Altars; the Armes of which Persons so slaine, not stretched forth to defend themselues with weapons (which few in those daies handled more valiantly then they) but stretched forth to God, and to his Altar, in the day of Iudgement shall set vp the reuerend ensignes of their patience and faith at the Gates of the Citie of Christ, which so haue couered the seat of the Celestiall Sacrifice, as it were with the red Mantle of their cluttered bloud.

These things hee did not after any good deeds done by him deseruing praise: for many yeeres before ouercome with the often and changeable filths of adulterie, and forsaking his lawfull wife (contrary to the law of God) beeing not loosed from the snares of his former sinnes, hee increaseth the new with the old. Thus far Gyldas, for this time, and for the raigne of Constantine; whose life being no better, was cut off in battell by Aurelius Conanus, when he had raigned fully three yeeres, and without issue was buried at Stonhenge.

AVRELIVS CONANVS. 7.

7. An. D. 545. Mat. Westminster.

Aurelius Conanus, the Nephew of King Arthur, after he had slaine his Cosen Constantine in battell, was made King ouer the Britaines in the yeere after Christs Natiuitie fiue hundred fortie fiue. He was of disposition free and liberal, but therewithall of a light credit, and very suspicious, cherishing them that accused others, without respect of right or wrong, putting some to death, and retaining others in perpetuall prison, among whom his own Vncle was one, whose two sons he caused to be slain, no causes obiected, but that these three were in truth betwixt him & the Crowne: for which, and other the like impious parts, the said Gyldas continueth the tenor of his vehement reprehension in this manner. And thou Lions whelpe (as speakes the Prophet) Aurelius Conanus, what dost thou? art thou not swallowed vp in the filthy mire of murthering thy Kinsmen, of committing fornications and adulteries, like to the others before mentioned, if not more deadly, as it were with the waues and surges of the drenching Seas, ouerwhelming thee with her vnmercifull rage? dost thou not in hating the peace of thy Country, as a deadly Serpent, and thirsting after ciuill warres and spoiles (often times vniustly gotten) shut vp against thy soule the Gates of celestiall peace? Thou being left alone, as a withering tree in the middle of a field, call to remembrance (I pray thee) the vaine youthfull fantasie, and ouer timely deaths of thy Fathers and thy Brethren: shalt thou being set apart, and chosen forth of all thy lineage for thy godly deserts, be reserued to liue an hundred yeeres, or remaine on earth till thou bee as old as Methuselah? nothing lesse. And thus with exhortations for his amendment, turneth his speech to his Successor.

Gyldas.

The raigne of this King, among the vncertainties of other proceedings, is ranged by our owne Historians, as vncertainly. For some hold him to rule onely two yeeres, and no more, being then cut off by the iust reuenging hand of God for his sinnes: others allow three yeeres for his raigne, wherein, as they say, most viciously hee liued: and yet Matthew of Westminster will haue him continue in gouernement no lesse then thirty yeeres; and Iohn Stow addeth three more: such extremes are wee driuen vnto, that haue our relations onelie from them.

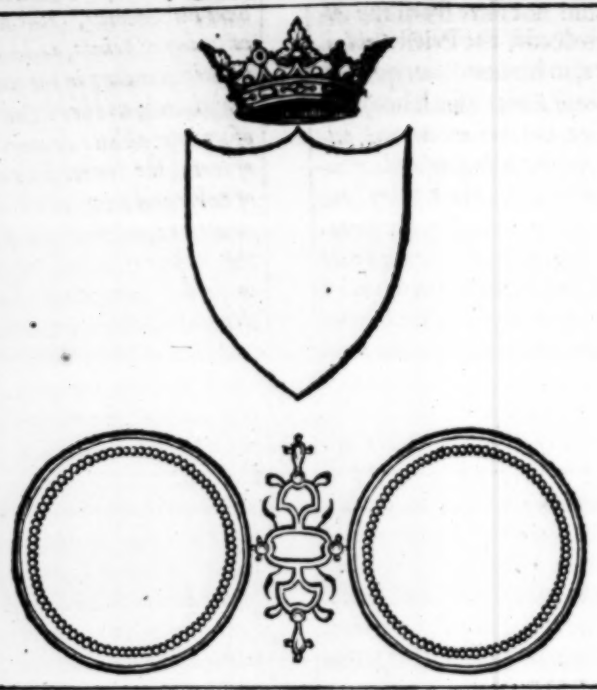
VORTIPORVS. 8.



8. An. Do. 578.

Vortiporus, after the death of Aurelius, ſucceeded him in the Kingdome of the Britaines, which then was much ſcantled by the intruſions of the Saxons whom in many battels (as ſaith the Britiſh Hiſtorians) he vanquiſhed, and valiantly defended his Land and Subiects, from the danger of them and of their Allies: notwithſtanding theſe reported actions thus honorably atchieued, yea and his Parentage with ſucceſsion of gouernmeut, may be both ſuſpected and iuſtly called in queſtion, as by the words of Gyldas is manifeſt; who ſufferd not this King alſo to paſſe vntouched in his Inuectiue and lamentable paſsions. And thou (ſaith he) Vortiporus the Tyrant of South-wales, like to the Panther in manners and wickedneſſe, diuerſly ſpotted, as it were with many colours, with thy hoarie head in the Throne full of deceits, crafts, and wiles, and defiled euen from the loweſt part of thy body to the Crowne of thy head, with diuers and ſundry murthers committed on thine own kin, and filthy adulteries, thus proouing the vnworthy ſonne of a good King, as Manaſſes was to Ezechias; how chanceth it that the violent ſtreames of ſinnes, which thou ſwalloweſt vp like pleaſant wine, or rather art ſwallowed vp by thē, (the end of thy life by little & little now drawing neere) cannot yet ſatisfie thee? What meaneſt thou, that with fornication, of all euils as it were the full heap, thine own wife being put away, with her death, which thou wroughteſt, doſt oppreſſe thy ſoule with a certain burthē that cānot be auoided?

By this teſtimonie of Gyldas, this Vortiporus could not be the ſonne of bad Conan, as Geffrey Monmouth and Matthew of Weſtminſter affirme him: his Father being compared to godly Ezechias King of Iudah, and himſelfe continuing his gouernment, as is ſaid the ſpace of foure yeeres, ended his life without iſſue to ſucceed him.

MALGO CANONVS. 9.

9. An. D. 581. Mat. Weſtminſter.

Malgo Canonus, the Nephew of Aurelius Conanus, as ſome write, ſucceeded Vortiporus in the Kingdome of Britaine, a man of a moſt ſeemely preſence, but withall, charged with many vnbeſeeming and foule ſinnes, by ancient Gyldas, the onely recorder of the Actions in theſe times; who calleth him the Dragon of the Iles, greater in power then many, but exceeding all in miſchiefe and malice; a large giuer, but more lauiſh and prodigall in all ſinnes and licentiouſneſſe: in Armes and dominions more ſtrong, and greater then any other Britiſh Potentate; but ſtronger in the deſtruction of his owne ſoule, in committing the grand abhorred ſinne of Sodomie. In his youthfull daies, with ſword and fire he brought to deſtruction his Vncle by the mothers ſide (being then king) together with many others, and after vppon a ſhew-ſeeming remorſe of Conſcience, vowed the profeſſion and life of a Monke; but returned ſhortly after to his owne vomit, and became worſe then he was before: for deſpiſing his firſt mariage, he became enamored vpon the wife of his brothers ſonne, whiles he was liuing; and after that he had kept her a certaine time, murthered them both. In theſe ſinnes hee continued the terme of fiue yeeres, and dying without iſſue, left his Crowne to another.

Malgo Canus, the continuance of his raigne.

By theſe reprehenſions of Gyldas it ſhould rather ſeeme ſeeme that theſe Princes liued all together at one and the ſame time, vnto whom hee ſpake perſonally, and mouth to mouth, which could not be, if ſuch ſucceſſions and ſuch yeeres had beene expired, as heere is laid downe. And therefore not without cauſe ſome haue affirmed, that theſe Captaines vſurped authoritie together in diuers parts of the Iland, and not ſucceſsiuely one after another; neither indeed as Kings, but rather Tyrants, polluted with theſe greeuous ſinnes, as you haue heard, and are ſo termed by their own Hiſtorian, that bringeth *one more to tyrannize, whom neither Monmouth nor hee of Weſtminſter hath ſpoken of, which is Cuneglaſus, whom hee calleth, a Lion tawney Butcher, a Beare, a Contemner of Religion, an Oppreſſour of the Clergie, that fought againſt God with his many greeuous ſinnes, and warred vpon man with his martiall weapons. Hee (ſaith hee) did put away his lawfull wife, prouoked the godly with many iniuries, was proudly conceited of his owne wiſdome, and ſet his whole hope in vncertaine riches. If then the head was ſo ſicke, could the body be ſound, that (as Beda ſaith) were ſo ſet to breake all orders of truth and iuſtice, that ſcant any token or remembrance thereof remained? And for witneſſe againſt them, calleth their owne Hiſtorian Gyldas, that accuſed them of many impieties, and this not the leaſt, that thoſe Britaines neglected the preaching of the Goſpell to the Saxons.

Beda hiſt. Angl. lib. 1. cap. 22.

*If Cerdic be not another whom Beda calleth a Britain King, lib. 4 cap. 23.

For theſe ſinnes aſſuredly, God gaue their Land to another Nation, and themſelues to exile, or to the ſwords of their enemies. Howſoeuer, ſome latter Britaine hath rather excuſed their ſinnes by the ouer-raſh zeale of Gyldas, whom he tearmeth a Pulpit-Prieſt (but no perfect Hiſtorian) that beat down ſinnes with an ouer-ſharpe cenſure of the ſinners, as the maner of many Preachers is at this day. But (ſaith hee) let the true renowne of the Britaines appeare to the world: and ſurely ſo ſhall it doe for me. And againe I returne to my intended purpoſe.

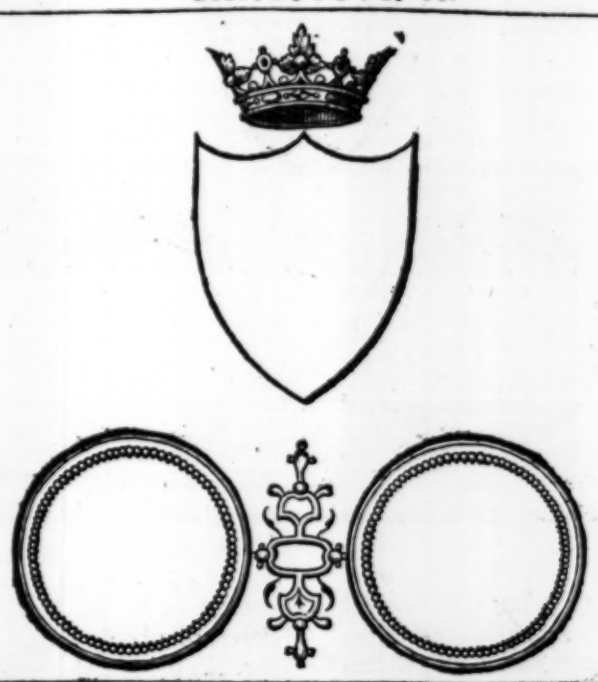
CARETICVS. 10.



10. An. Do. 586.

Careticus ſucceeded Malgo in the gouernment of Britaine, as deſtitute of vertue and fluent in vice, as any of theſe his preceding Kings: for it is recorded that hee was a nouriſher of diſſenſions, and ſowed ciuill warres among his ſubiects; a ſinne odible to God and Man, and vnto the vnconſtant Britaines gaue occaſion of his hatred: which when the Saxons perceiued, was further inſtigated, and with the aſſiſtance of Gurmund an Arch-pirate, and Captaine of the Norwegians, followed againſt the King, who not able to reſiſt them, fled into the Towne of Chicheſter for ſafety, but by the deuice of his purſuers, certaine ſparrowes being caught, and fire faſtned to their feet, were let flie into the Towne, where lighting vpon ſtraw and other matter fit for flaming, burnt in ſhort ſpace the whole Citie, and Careticus flying beyond Seuerne, ſecured himſelfe among the Mountaines of Wales, wherein he died, after he had vnproſperouſly raigned three yeeres: and from that time foorth (ſaith Randulphus) the Britaines loſt their whole Kingdome in the Eaſt part of the Iland, and were confined in the Weſt by the Riuers Seuerne and Dee.

Cadwan, after foure and twenty yeeres ciuill diſſenſion maintained among the Britaines, euer ſince they had forgone their Country, and betaken themſelues to thoſe vaſt, but ſecuring Mountaines; of a Ruler

Wil. Malmesb.

Ruler only of North-wales, was made Gouernour of all those parts, a man deseruing well before hee came to that estate, and being risen, maintained himselfe and subiects in great honour and peace. His first affaires against the Saxons, was to reuenge the deaths of his Britaines, and harmelesse Monkes of Bangor, slaine (as we haue said) by wild Ethelfrid, the mighty King of Northumberland, who in Field had assembled all their powers, wherein the fatall end either of the Britaines or Northumbrians must needs haue ensued, had not the quarrell beene staied by the mediation of friends. These Kings, then, and there reconciled, embraced peace, with such true friendshippe, that they continued amitie together so long as they liued.

Harding saith, that this British King Cadwan, honorably receiued and worthily cherished Acca, whom this King Ethelfrid had put from his bed, for the loue he bare vnto his Concubine, but is deceiued in making her the mother of Edwin, that was his sister, and Cadwan to raigne but thirteen yeeres, whereas others allot him two and twentie.

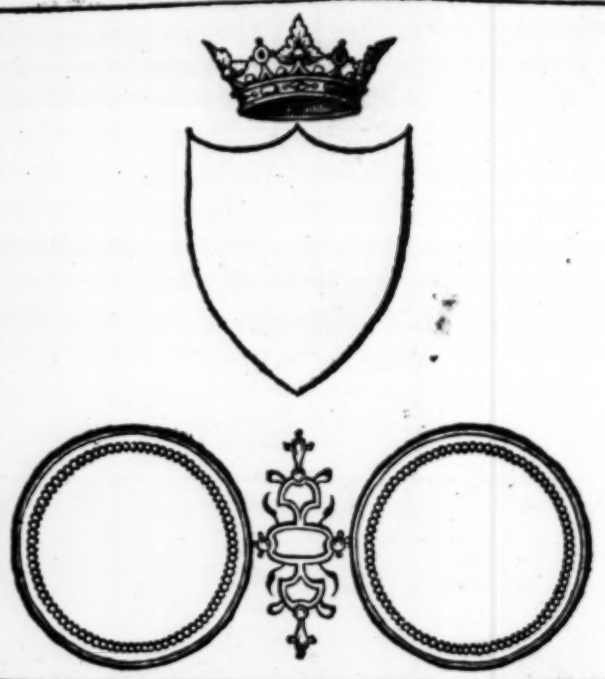
CADWALLO. 12.



12. An. Do. 635.

Cadwallo or Cadwallin, the sonne of Cadwan, was made King ouer the Britaines, the yeere of Christs Incarnation six hundred thirty fiue. He warred most strongly against the Saxons, and either by Conquest or Alliance ioined amitie with Penda the cruell King of the Mercians, a Pagan Idolater, himselfe by the report of Beda, although a Christian in name and profession, yet in minde and manners so rude and outragious, that hee spared neither womens weakenesse nor childrens innocencie, but put all to death with greeuous and bitter torments, to fulfill his cruell and vnmercifull tyrannie, wasting a long time, and raging ouer the Prouinces, purposed to exterminate out of the borders of Britanny the whole Nation of the English, and to extinguish the very name of them. Neither did he ought esteeme any reuerence or honour to the Christian Religion, which those men embraced: so that euen to this day (saith he) the Britaines custome is to set light by the Faith or Religion of the Englishmen; neither will they communicate with them more then with Heathens or Pagans. These two cruell Kings slew the most Christian Edwyn King of Northumberland, with his sonne Prince Osfride, in a great and bloudy battle at Hethfild, the yeere of Christs incarnation six hundred thirty three: and the yeere following, with wicked force (saith Beda) but with worthy vengeance, Cadwallo the Britaine slew Osfrike and Eanfrid, Kings of Deira and Bernicia, that were become Apostataes from their Christian Faiths, and that with crueltie and losse of the Saxons, as their owne Historians held it fit neither to mention their names in their monethly Calendar, nor register the yeere wherin they were slaine, in account of their gouernment, but assigned it vnto the raigne of their Successour King Oswald, which was so obserued vnto his daies; so terrible was this worthy Cadwallo, and odious the remembrance of this vnfortunate Battle. But this cursed Captaine (saith he) enioied not this felicitie long: for the said Oswald, to reuenge his brothers death, came with a small power, but strongly fensed in the faith of Christ, and neere to the Riuer Denise gaue him battle, wherein himselfe and late-victorious Host were all slain and confounded.

Beda hist. Angl. lib. 3. cap. 1.

But we must remember that Beda was a Saxon, in whose behalfe his penne hath somewhat passed the bounds of equitie (if not veritie) in charging this most valiant Conqueror with tyranny, and his Martiall Sword with crueltie, that was drawne and strucke in defence of his native Country, wherein the Saxons claime stood only vpon vniust intrusion. So likewise himselfe being a Monke and Prieft, hath euery where blamed the Britaines for dissenting from the Roman Church, in celebration of Easter and other Ceremonies; whereas in doctrine they were as sincere, which is the true substance of the Gospell. But the Britaines record that this valiant Cadwallo died not in Heuenfeild, neither by the hand of King Oswald, but that he raigned in great honour the space of eight and fortie yeeres, and in peace died 22. of Nouember, in the yeere of Christ Iesus six hundred seuentie seuen. His body the Britaines buried in S. Martins Church in London, neere Ludgate; whose Image great and terrible, triumphantly riding on horseback, being artificially cast of Brasse, they placed vpon the same West gate, to the further feare and terror of the Saxons, as Vortimer before had commanded his at Stonar. But this relation, as also that he married the sister of King Penda, as my often named Manuscript reporteth, I leaue to the best liking of my Reader.

Geffrey Mon.

Cadwallo or Cadwan, the continuance of his raign.

About this time the most blasphemous doctrine of Mahomet began to infect all the Easterne World. For although himselfe liued some nine yeeres before the gouernment of this Cadwallo, yet presently after his death his doctrine was more publikely imbraced. He was borne in Arabia, of a poore and base stocke, and being fatherlesse, was sold for a bondslaue vnto an Ismaelite, whose name was Abdemonaples, a man of exceeding great riches, and in great trade of merchandizing, and Mahomet for his subtiltie in wit, was his fit instrument, and greatly in his fauor. The Master dying, left Mahomet his chiefe Factor, who hauing great riches in his keeping, married his Mistris, and so became heire of all; with whom consorted one Sergius a Monke, which for heresie was fled into Arabia, who instructed Mahomet in the heresie of the Nestorians, and now for his wealth and Magicall Arts, wherewith hee bewitched the minds of the people, assumed assumed to himselfe the name of the great Prophet of God, and began to be famously published for the doctrine which he taught: the which was none other but a confused Chaos of all the heresies that had been before him: for with the Sabellians he denied the Trinitie; with the Manichies, he affirmed but two persons to bee in the Deity; with Eunomius, hee denied the equalitie of the Father and the Sonne; and with Macedone, taught that the Holy Ghost was a creature. He borrowed of the Iewes Circumcision; of the Nicholaitans, pluralities of wiues; and of the Gentiles, much Superstition; and more to cloake his diuelliſh inuented fantasies, somewhat he tooke from the veritie of the Gospell. Of these compounded he deuised a Law, and wrote this his Religion in the booke called his Alcaron; and those his Professors he named Saracens, from Sara the wife of Abraham. An.Do.625.

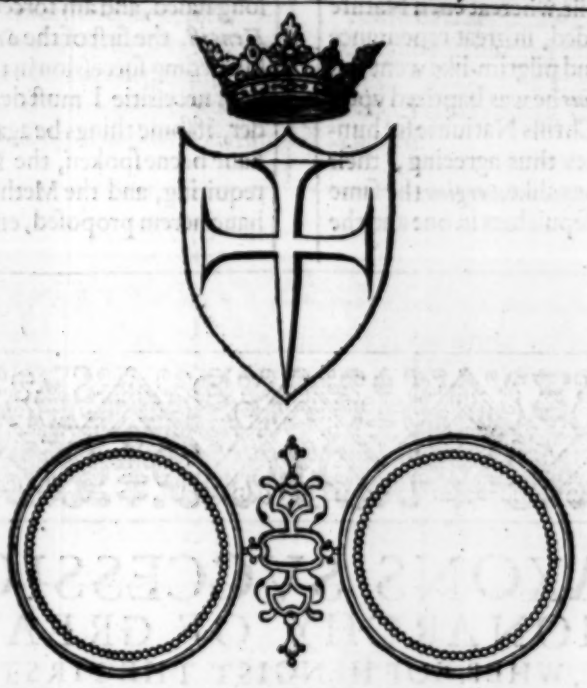
Hee died of the falling sickneſſe, which long time hee had dissembled, saying forsooth after his trances, that the Angell Gabriel had conference with him, the brightneſſe of whose glorie hee could not behold.

CADWALLADER. 13.



13. An.Do.685.

Cadwallader, the sonne of Cadwallo, and last King of the Britaines, after the death of his Father, succeeded him in his dominions, and with great valour fought against the Saxons, as hee of Monmouth affirmeth, of whom heare him speake in his owne words. Cadwalader (saith he) raigning victoriously the time of twelue yeeres, fell lastly into a dangerous sickneſſe, with despaire of recouery, and vnable to gouerne. Much debate and strife arose among his great Lords, and others of high estate, insomuch that they warred each against others, to the no small annoiance and detriment of the whole Country. At which very time likewise, so great a dearth of corne and victuall raigned, that herbes and roots were the Commons chiefest sustenance: whose third calamitie was mortalitie and pestilence, raigning so sore, and so suddenly, that in their eating, drinking, walking, and speaking, they were surprised with death, and in such number, that the liuing were scarce able to bury the dead; which miseries lasted no lesse then eleuen yeeres continuance, whereby the Land became desolate, and brought forth no fruit at all, insomuch that the King and many of his Nobles were driuen to forsake their natiue Country, and to seeke releefe in forraine parts. Cadwallader repaired to the Court of Alan his cosen, the King of Little Britaine in France, where he was honourably receiued and maintained.

But now the Angell of God sheathing his sword from slaughter, and the earth answering man againe with her former abundance, those Saxons that were escaped, sent for more of their Nation to their further supplie, who repleniſhed the Cities, and manured the Countrey, at this day called Lhoyger, containing all the Land that lay on the East of Seuerne and Dee, dispossessing the poore Britaines of their rightfull inheritance, and diuiding their Lands vnto their owne vse. Cadwallader hearing of their daily arriuage, and their vniust intrusion vpon his home-bred subiects, minded their redresse by his present returne, and to that end had wrought King Alan, for his succour & assistance. But see how it chanced: He being now ready to imbarke his Host, and to hoise vp his sailes for Britaine, and in the silent night much spent in praier & supplication, that God would prosper with good successe these his great affaires, behold an Angell appeared to him, or at least wise to his seeming he heard a voice, that forbade him the enterprise, declaring that it was not Gods will that hee should vndergoe that Voiage, or that the Britaines should rule their Land any longer; but contrariwise bade hie him to Rome, and of Pope Sergius receiue the habit of Religion, wherein hee should die, and rest in peace.

This dreame (for I hold it no other) being told vnto Alan, search was made into the Bookes of both the Merlines, as also into the speech of the Eagle at Shaftesbury, pronounced eight hundred and eighty yeeres before the birth of our Sauiour Christ (if wee doe beleeue these to be true) wherein it was prophecied forsooth, that the Britaines should lose their Kingdome, and that the same should be possessed of others, vntill the time that the bones of Cadwallader should bee brought from Rome. By such toies and illusions in those daies of darkneſſe, the euer-erring minds of men were content to be lead: for not onely Cadwallader, a quiet and meeke-spirited man, was possessed with this conceit, that it came vnto him by a diuine prouidence, but also King Alan perswaded him to obey his Oracle; and thereupon preparing for his Pilgrimage, gaue ouer his expedition for Britaine, and left his distressed Subiects to bee ouer-runne by strangers, and the Land to bee enioied by a forraine Nation: and receiuing the habit of seeming Religion at the hands of Pope Sergius, died soone after in the yeere of our Lord six hundred eighty nine, and there was buried in S. Peters Church, being the last King of the Britaines bloud, after they had held possession therof the space of one thousand one hundred thirty and seuen yeeres before the Natiuitie of Christ, and six hundred eighty eight yeeres after his Birth, as the Chronicle of Wales, with other Britaine Writers, haue calculated, though (as is said) after the largest size. But howsoeuer this sudden alteration was wrought in Cadwallader, yet whiles he continued a King in health, hee raigned (saith Geffrey) in great magnanimitie, the D. Powel. Chron. of Wales.

Cadwallader, the continuance of his raigne.

terme of three yeers, and fought many Battles against the Saxons, whose sword was euer sheathed with victorie; for Lothaire King of Kent he slew in the Field, and Edilwach also King of the South-Saxons, with the ruine of his Country, as the British Historians report, and would haue it.

Beda histor. lib. 4. cap. 26.

But Beda, vnto whom more credit is heerein to be giuen, telles vs, that Lothaire was slaine by Edrik, his Nephew and Successour, declaring the manner and day of his death; and that Ceadwall, a young man of the west-Saxons bloud royall, being banished from among them, fell vpon the South-Saxons, harrying the Country and killing their King. But afterwards lamenting the bloud he had spilt, whereat euen Nature her selfe seemed to bee offended, in great repentance abandoned his Kingdome, and pilgrim-like went vnto Rome, where of Pope Sergius he was baptized vpon Easter Euen, the yeere from Christs Natiuitie six hundred eightie nine. The times thus agreeing, their names so neere, their deuotions alike, Sergius the same ghostly father to both, their sepulchers in one and the same Church, doe strongly confirme that they both were the same and one only man, as we formerly haue said. But with this man Cadwallader, whereseuer he died, lay buried the last bloud of their Kings, their gouernment, and immediatelie the very Name of Britaine; for many hundred yeeres ensuing, as in the sequell of this Historie (Christ assisting) shall bee shewed.

Cap. 15.

Beda hist. lib. 5. cap. 7.

And now at last, according to my first intendment, I am come to speake of the succession of Great Britaines Monarkes, from which (vpon the fore-shewed occasions of the Ilands diuision, the Saxons possessions, and these Britaine Resisters) I haue beene ouerlong staied, and am forced to returne againe to King Hengist, the first of the Saxons, that I may shew their succeeding succession in this English Monarchy: wherin of necessitie I must desire the patience of my Reader, if some things be againe touched that formerlie haue beene spoken, the Matter of Historie so much requiring, and the Method that to my proceeding I haue herein proposed, enforcing it.

Saxon Monarchs.

THE SAXONS SVCCESSIONS IN THE MONARCHY OF GREAT BRITAINE, WHEREOF HENGIST THE FIRST KING OF KENT BECAME THE FIRST MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

CHAPTER XIII.

An. Do. 450. Beda. Malmsb.

Engist, a Prince of the English-Saxons, hauing the Command ouer certaine forces planted in the Low-countries of Germany, in the yeere of Christs Incarnation foure hundred and fiftie, transported them ouer into Britaine, where the fifth yeere after his arriuall, he began his Kingdome in Kent; & hauing surprised his son in law King Vortigern, slain his Britaines, and seized into his possession the best of the Iland, he laid the foundation of a Monarchy, and deserueth to be reputed the first Monarch of the English Nation.

(2) He (as all the Saxon Kings besides) doth claime his originall from Prince Woden, and his wife Fria, by Wechta the eldest of their seuen sonnes, being the fifth in issue from them; as thus: Himselfe was the sonne of Withtgils, who was the sonne of Witha, and he the sonne of Wechta, the eldest sonne of the Deified Woden. Floren. Wigorn.

This Prince held the supreme Scepter of this Iland for thirty foure yeeres continuance, and therein died honorably, saith Marianus Scotus. But Peter de Ikham, Polydore, and others say, that he was slaine in battell, or else taken by Edol, Earle of Gloecester, and beheaded at Conesborow. Hee left issue behind him two sonnes and one daughter, whose names were Hatwaker, Eske, and Rowena. Hengist, how long he raigned. Maria. Scot. Peter Ikham. Geffrey Mon. Polydor Virgil.

(3) Hatwaker his eldest sonne, is reported by Petrus Albinus of Wittenberg, a great Genealogist and Historio- Petrus Albinus.

Hiſtoriographer alſo) to be Duke of the Saxons in Germanie, and there left to gouerne the people at his Fathers departure for Britaine. And if Albinus authority be ſufficient, he was the Father of Duke Hatwegat, and grandfather of Hilderik King of the Saxons, anceſtor to the valiant Witikindus, the principall progenitor of the moſt noble Familie of the Dukes of Saxony.

(4) Eske, the ſecond ſonne of King Hengiſt, came ouer with his Father into Britaine, and was his aſſiſtant in all his warres, wherein he gaue worthy teſtimonie of his valour: whoſe Kingdome of Kent after his death he enioyed, and gaue name to that Countries Inhabitants, who were from him called Eskings, ouer whom he raigned peaceably twenty yeeres.

(5) Rowena, the daughter of King Hengiſt, was borne in Germany before her Fathers departure, and afterwards ſent for by him into Britaine, to further his deſignes. At whoſe ſurpaſsing beautie and feature Vortigern ſo viciouſly gazed, that he put from him his lawfull and louing wife, to inioy the pleaſures of her Paganiſh bed, and to the great decay of Chriſtianitie, and griefe of the Nobilitie, ſhe became the Kings ſecond wife, and the principall cauſe of the Lands deſtruction. By her he had a daughter, who contrary to all lawes either of God or man, was likewiſe his third wife; by whom he had iſſue Fauſtus, that as vertuouſly ſpent the daies of his life, as he was inceſtuouſly begot in that wicked bed.

This Rowena, whom ſome call Ronixa, by Vlitarpius is accounted the Neece, and not the Daughter of Hengiſt. But ſeeing his opinion is grounded vpon the youth of Hengiſt, as not ſufficient in yeeres to haue a daughter ſo mariageable, I rather thinke and hold this bare teſtimonie vnable to turne the great ſtreame of other Writers out of their vſuall courſe and receiued chanell.

Vlitarpius.

ELLA THE FIRST KING OF THE SOVTH-SAXONS, AND SECOND MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

Ella, Monar.

Chapter XIV.

Ella a noble Saxon, being ſent for by King Hengiſt, about the three and twentith yeere of his raigne, brought a freſh ſupply of thoſe Germans to the reliefe of his Countrymen, who with his forces landed at the hauen now called Shoreham in Suſſex, where putting backe the Inhabitants in many skirmiſhes, laſtly chaſed them into a great wood then called Andredſlege, whence often being aſſailed by the ſudden aſſaults of the Britaines, wherein, as may bee thought, he loſt the liues of his two elder ſonnes, was ſo hardly beſet, that hee ſent for more aid of his Saxons, who came to his ſupply.

(2) His ſtrength thus augmented, and ambition ſtill increaſed, he fought three cruell and bloody battels, but the laſt of them moſt fatall againſt the Britaines, in the place then called Macrodeſ-burne, and beſieging the ancient and famous City Anared-Cheſter ſituated in the ſaid great foreſt, and chiefe defenſible fortreſſe in all thoſe Southern parts, intercepted the Britaines that came to their reliefe, and entring the ſame by an aſſault, put to the ſword all that were found within it. After which great loſſe, the Britaines ſought rather to prouide for their owne ſafety by flying into deſert places, then by making open reſiſtance to procure their owne too apparant deſtruction.

(3) Ella in this ſtate continued the time of fiue yeeres before he aſſumed the name of King, or the limits of that Prouince aſsigned vnder his gouernment, but then without any ſhew of reſiſtance laid the foundation of this Kingdome, which was the ſecond of the Saxons; and as Hengiſt held Kent, ſo he had Suſſex and Surrey for his Poſſeſsion, wherein for ſix yeeres ſpace with Hengiſt he liued, and that with ſuch approbation of valour as that after his death he became the ſecond Saxon Monarch of the Engliſhmen, in the yeere of grace 488.

An. Do. 488.

Ella, how long he raigned.

(4) He is ſaid to be the elder ſonne of Oſa, whoſe genealogie Florentius of Worceſter thus deriueth: Oſa (ſaith he) was the ſonne of Etherbert, and he the ſonne of Ingengeat, who was the ſonne of Angengiat, whoſe father was Aluſa, the ſonne of Ingebrand, the ſonne of of Wegbrand, the ſonne of Beorn, the ſonne of Beornus, the elder ſonne of Brand, the ſonne of Bealdeag, the ſixth ſonne of prince Woden and of Lady Fria his wife.

(5) His iſſue were Kymen, Plenching, and Ciſſa, three valiant ſonnes, that came ouer with him, and aſsiſted him in his enterpriſes for Britaine. From Kymen, the port wherein they arriued, was called Kymeniſhore; by the Britaines, Cuneueſhore, which time and ſeas hath both ſhortened, and altered: and now is it called Shoreham, a well knowne hauen in Suſſex. This Prince came to his graue before his Father, either by the ſtroke of warres, or by the courſe of nature, without further mention of his acts, and his ſucceſſion, cut off by his death.

VVil. Malmsb.

(6) Plenching his ſecond ſonne, was borne vnto him in the Lowe countries of Germany, and with his brethren aſſiſted his Father to the attaining of the South-Saxons Crowne; but being cut off by vntimely death, whether by the hand of the enemy, or by natures appointment, is vncertaine.

Florent. VViz.

(7) The yongeſt ſonne of king Ella, was Ciſſa, whom death ſpared to liue a long life; but fame as ſparing to adorne it with memory of his acts: for nothing of him is left memorable, beſides the building of Chicheſter. Fortune indeed ſet his fathers Crowne on his head, but kept the Imperiall Diademe in her owne hand, to adorne the head of a worthier bearer, which was Cherdik the weſt-Saxon, vnto whom Ciſſa gaue yeerely contribution, to ſecure him from the Britaines, as before and after hath been, and ſhall bee ſhewed.

(8) This Ella his entrance and erection of his Kingdome, for time is vncertaine; but his raigne therein, as alſo in his Monarchie, is more certainelie knowne: for hee was King of the South-Saxons the ſpace of thirty two yeeres, and Monarch of the Engliſh-men ſix and twenty, dying in the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation fiue hundred and foureteene, which was the thirty ſixth after his firſt arriuall into Britaine.

See Chap. 4.

CHERDIK THE FIRST KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND THIRD MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

Cherdik.

CHAPTER XV.

1. An. Do. 495.

THe Saxons Sunne, thus riſen and high aſcended vpon the South of Britaine, began now to ſpreade his beames towards the Weſt; for Kent being quietly poſſeſſed by King Eske, and South-Saxia, with all the ſubdued, at the diſpoſe of great Ella, Cherdik a valiant Captaine of the Low Country Germans, thought himſelfe as ſufficient in warres, and as able to reach at, to weare, and to weld a Crowne of Eſtate, as either of them that had ſo done before him: and ſeeing that Britaine was now the ſeede-plot for Diadems, ſet his affection and preparation that way.

Mat. VVeſtm.

(2) He with his forces entred in the Weſt of that Iland, where he in his firſt battell ſo danted the Inhabitants, that apparāt ſignes of approching glory were added to his aſpiring hopes: for therein hee ſlew Natanleod, otherwiſe called Nazaleod, a mighty King of the Britaines, whereby an eaſie entrance was laid open to his deſired Empire, and a more eaſie warre left to his poſteritie. This battle chanced about the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus fiue hundred and eight, and was fought in the region of Natanleod, (which Country bare the name of the King) and neere vnto a brooke of water in the Weſt of Hampſhire, which from Cherdik began to be called Cherdiks-ford, where now a Towne of the ſame name ſtandeth, but by contraction and ſhortneſſe of ſpeech is called Chardford.

Hen. Hunt.

(3) Florentius of Worceſter, the Saxons Genealogiſt (as I may well terme him) bringeth this Cherdik (as he doth the reſt of the Saxon Kings) from the ancient Prince Woden, and that in this manner: Cherdik (ſaith he) was the ſonne of Eliſius, and hee the ſonne of Eſla, the ſonne of Geriſius, the ſonne of Wigga, the ſonne of Friaſrin, the ſonne of Freodegar, the brother of Beorn, the progenitor of Ida the firſt King of Bernicia, and both both of them the ſonnes of Brand, the ſonne of Bealdæg, the fift ſonne of the foreſaid Woden.

(4) In the ſeuenth yeere of Ella his Monarchie, was his arriuage, and ſix yeeres after hee beganne his Kingdome of the Weſt-Saxons, ſeating himſelfe and foundation therof betwixt the Britains and the South-Saxons, for whoſe further ſecuritie, Ciſſa King of that Prouince, gaue him an yeerely contribution towards the maintenance of his charge in warre; wherein hee got ſuch reputation, that after the death of Ella, and the thirteenth of his owne raigne, hee aſſumed the Monarchie vnto himſelfe, and was both the firſt King of the Weſt-Saxons, and the third Monarch of the Engliſh-men, wherein he continued the ſpace of twentie one yeeres, and deceaſed in the yeere of our Lord fiue hundred thirty fiue, being the three and thirtieth of his Kingdome, and the fortieth after his firſt arriuall.

(5) His iſſue were two ſonnes, Kenrik and Chelwolfe: the one immediately, and the iſſue of the other collaterally attained to the ſame poſſeſsion and title that Cherdike heere firſt laid.

(6) Chelwolfe his ſecond ſonne (for of Kenrik the eldeſt wee are hereafter to ſpeake) hath little mention made among our writers: more then that hee was the Anceſtour of Eskwin the eight King of the Weſt-Saxons, that is to ſay, the father to Kenfrid the father of Kenſy; which Kenſy had iſſue the ſaid Eskwin, who was the Succeſſor of king Kenwalk, and predeceſſor of King Kentwin in the kingdome of the Weſt-Saxnos. See chap. 7.

KENRIK THE SECOND KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND FOVRTH MONARCH OF THE ENG-LISHMEN.

Kenrik.

CHAPTER XVI.

Enrik, the eldeſt ſonne of King Cherdick (as is ſaid) being borne in Germanie, and following his father into Britaine, valiantly ſerued vnder him, as well in the Battle fought againſt King Natanleod, the firſt day of his arriuage, as in other battles againſt the Britaines in other places; namely, at Cherdiksford, Cherdiſley, and in the Conqueſt of the Ile of Wight. Immediately vpon the death of his Father, he ſucceeded in his whole dominions, and was ordained the ſecond King of the Weſt-Saxons, and the fourth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, beginning his raigne ouer both at one and the ſame time, the yeere of Chriſt his Natiuitie fiue hundred thirty foure.

(2) And enlarging his confines vpon the Territories of the Britaines, gaue them two great ouerthrowes; the one at Searesbery in Wilt-ſhire, and the other at Banbury in Oxford-ſhire, which was fought the two and twentieth of his raigne, whereby his fame grew more renowned, and his Kingdome in more quiet after. He raigned the ſpace of twenty ſix yeeres, and left this life in the yeere of our Lord God fiue hundred ſixty. An. Do. 556. Kenrik, how long he raigned.

(3) He had iſſue three ſonnes, Cheuline, Cuthwolfe, and Cuth. Chelwin the firſt, ſucceeded his father in the Monarchie, and Weſt-Saxons Kingdome.

(4) Cuthwolfe, the ſecond, aſsiſted his brother in many victories, as preſently in his raigne ſhall follow. And Cuth, the third brother, famous in his iſſue, though mentionleſſe for action in himſelfe, whereof more largely hath beene ſpoken in the raigne of Kenrik, as he was King only of the Weſt-Saxons. In Chap. 7. Sect. 2.

Cheuline.

CHEVLINE THE THIRD KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, AND FIFTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

Chapter XVII.

An. D. 561.

Matt. Weſtm.

Heuline, the eldeſt ſonne of King Kenrike, ſerued with great commendations vnder his father, in all his warres againſt the Britains, and is ſpecially mentioned at the Battle of Banbury in Oxford-ſhire; and after his fathers death became the third King of the Weſt-Saxons, and the fifth Monarch of the Engliſhmen. Hee much enlarged the bounds of his Kingdome, and increaſed the power and glorie of the Weſt-Saxons.

Henry Hunting.

(2) For continuing the warres where his Father left, did not onely ſubdue the Britaines in many Battles, but alſo ſet himſelfe againſt his owne Nation the Saxons, and ſought to impoſe the ſcope of his power vpon the South of the Riuer Thames: for entring Kent (whoſe King was then a childe, by name Ethelbert, the ſonne of Imerik) at Wiphanaun or * Wilhandun in Surrey, in a ſet and ſore Battle, defeated all his forces, whence the young King was chaſed, and two of his greateſt Captaines, bearing the names of Dukes, were ſlaine, as we haue ſaid.

* Wimbledon.

(3) Not long after this victory, he ſet his minde to inlarge his Weſt-Saxons Dominions vpon the poſſeſſion of the declining Britaines, and to that end furniſhed forth a great Band of his Souldiers, whereof he made his brother Cuthwin chiefe Generall. Theſe marching to Bedford, gaue Battle to the Britaines, where they ſlew them downe-right, and ſurprized foure of their chiefeſt Townes, at that time called Liganburge, * Eglesbourgh, Benſington, and Eueſham, which they fortified, to their owne ſtrength, and the Britaines great loſſe.

* Ailsburie.

(4) And following the Tract of his fore-going fortunes, about ſix yeeres after ſent forth againe his Saxens, vnder the conduct of the foreſaid Cuthwin, who encountred the Britaines at Dierth or Deorham, with ſuch valour and ſucceſſe, that beſides great ſlaughter of the Britiſh Souldiers, three of their Kings, whoſe names were, Coinmagill, Candidan, and Farimnagill, fell in the Field, with the ſurprizall of theſe three Cities, Gloceſter, Bathe, and Cirenceſter. Then (ſaith Gyldas) euidently appeared the Lands deſtruction, the ſins of the Britaines being the only cauſe, when neither Prince nor People, Prieſt nor Leuite, regarded the Law of the Lord, but diſobediently wandred in their owne waies. Matth. Weſt. Gylda.

(5) But no greater were the ſinnes of the Britains, then the vnſatiable deſires of the Saxons were to conquer: for Cheuline about the laſt of Malgoe his gouernment, met the Britaines at Fethanleah, in the face of a Field, which was fought out, to the great ſlaughters of them both, and with the death of Prince Cuth, King Cheulins ſonne: notwithſtanding the victorie fell on his ſide with great ſpoiles obtained, and poſſeſſions of many Prouinces, which himſelfe no long time enioied. Tho. Rudborn.

(6) For growne proud through his many proſperous victories againſt his enemies, and tyrannizing ouer his owne Subiects, the Weſt-Saxons, fell into ſuch contempt, that they ioined with the Britaines for his deſtruction. The greateſt againſt him, was diſloyall Chell, or Cealrik, his nephew, the ſonne of Cuthwin his moſt loyall brother, whom both the Nations had elected for Generall. Vnder him they muſter and march into Wilt-ſhire, and at Wodnesbeothe (now Wannes-ditch) pitch downe their Standards. Cheuline that thought hee lead fortune in a leaſe, with confident boldneſſe built his preſent proceedings vpon his former ſucceſſe, and in the face of his enemies diſplaied his colours. But the Battles ioined, and the Field goared with bloud, the day was loſt vpon the Kings ſide, and he in diſtreſſe ſaued himſelfe by flight. Heere might you haue ſeene the world, as it is, vnconſtant and variable; for he a Mars, that had ouer-borne the Britains in ſo many Battles, and had raiſed his Saxons vnto ſo great a height, is forced to flee before his conquered Captiues, and to exile himſelfe from the ſight of his owne Subiects, after he had glorioufly raigned thirty one yeeres, or (as ſome will) thirty three, and as a Leyland.

meane man, died in his baniſhment, the yeere of grace fiue hundred ninety two.

(7) He had iſſue two ſonnes, which were Cuth and Cuthwin, the elder whereof had valiantly ſerued in his fathers warres, namely at Wimbledone in Surry, againſt King Ethelbert and his power of Kentiſhmen, in the yeere of Chriſt fiue hundred ſixty ſeuen; and laſtly in the Battle at Fethanleah, where the Britaines receiued a great ouerthrow. Notwithſtanding, as hee was valiantly fighting among the thickeſt of his enemies, hee was there ſlain, in the yeere of our Lord fiue hundred eighty foure, being the fiue and twentieth yeere of his fathers raigne, and that without iſſue.

(8) Cuthwin, the younger ſonne of King Cheuline, ſuruiued his father, but ſucceeded him not, becauſe of his young yeeres; or elſe (and that rather) for the hatred that his father had purchaſed of his Subiects, which they repaied him in his owne expulſion, and in this his ſonnes depriuation. But although the wreath of the Weſt-Saxons did not adorne this Cuthwines head, yet ſhone it more bright, and ſtood with greater maieſty vpon the browes of Ina, the warlike and zealous King of Weſt-Saxons, and of Egbert the victorious and firſt ſole abſolute Monarch of the Engliſh Empire: both of them in a right line iſſued from this Cuthwin, as in the ſeuenth Chapter we haue ſaid.

ETHELBERT THE FIFTH, AND FIRST CHRISTIAN KING OF KENT,

AND THE SIXTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS WIVES AND ISSVE.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THe flame of the Weſt-Saxons for a time thus quenched, the Lampe of Kent began againe to ſhine, and to aſſume the Title of the Monarchie, after it had beene ſuppreſſed in them through the raignes of theſe foure laſt Kings: for young Egberts entrance, with the great loſſe of his Kentiſh, ouerthrowne by King Cheuline, gaue rather inducements to a tributary ſubiection, then any apparant hopes to purchaſe an Empire.

(2) But ſuch is the diſpoſe of God in his hidden Counſell, that things of leaſt appearance many times become the greateſt in ſubſtance, as in this Prince it was euidently ſeene, who making vſe of his owne youth and loſſe, got thereby experience, both to defenſe himſelfe, and to prouoke others, and with ſuch victories abroad, repaired his loſſes at home, that as farre as Humber he made all ſubiect to Kent.

(3) Thus growne to be the greateſt of any Saxon before him, hee ſought to hold it vp by forraine alliance, and to that end became ſuter for Berta a moſt vertuous Chriſtian Lady, the daughter of Chilperik King of France; vnto whom by her father ſhe was laſtlie granted, but with theſe conditions, that ſhe might reſerue her Chriſtian Profeſſion, enioy the preſence and the inſtructions of Luidhard her learned Biſhop, with the place of his Queene.

(4) Theſe couenants concluded, and many French Chriſtians attending her in his Court, by their daily ſeruice of God, and continuall practiſe of pietie, drew many of the Engliſh to fauour their Religion, yea and the King alſo to bee inclined that way. And as theſe were working the ſaluation of Kent, behold Gods proceedings for the conuerſion of the reſt.

(5) It chanced great Gregory (then but Arch-deacon of Rome) to ſee certaine youths of this Iland brought to that Citie, to be ſold for ſlaues: His Chriſtian heart pitying at ſuch heatheniſh tyrannizing, and beholding ſtedfaſtly their faces to be faire and Angellike, demanded of their Merchants, of what Nation they came; who made him anſwer, that they were Angles, and by that name were knowne vnto other Nations. Indeed, ſaid he, and not without cauſe, for their reſemblance is Angelicall, and fit it is that they be made inheritours with the Angels in Heauen. But of what Prouince are they? ſaid Gregory. It was replied; Of Deira, a Country ſituated in the Continent of Britaine. Now ſurely, ſaith he, it is great pity but theſe people people ſhould bee taken from Dei ira, the ire of God. And farther asking what was the name of their King, it was anſwered, that he was called Ella; whereunto he alluding, ſaid, that Alleluia, to the praiſe of God, in that Princes Dominions ſhould ſhortly be ſung.

Auſtine commeth into England.

(6) And to that purpoſe himſelfe, being afterwards Pope, ſent Auſtine a Monke, with forty others, for aſsiſtance, whereof Melitus, Iuſtus, and Iohn were chiefe. Theſe landing in Tanet, in the moneth of July, about fiue hundred ninety and ſix yeeres after the Incarnation of Chriſt, and one hundred forty and ſeuen after the firſt arriuage of theſe Angles into Britaine, had immediately acceſſe vnto the preſence of King Ethelbert, but yet in the open Field, for hee feared to conferre with them in any houſe, leſt by ſorcerie (as hee fondly ſurmiſed) he might be ouercome.

(7) Theſe preaching vnto him the word of life, his anſwer was, that preſently he could not conſent to their Doctrine, neither raſhly forſake his ancient and accuſtomed Religion. But ſeeing (ſaid hee) you tell vs ſtrange things, and giue vs faire promiſes of after life, when this life ſhall be ended, wee permit you to preach the ſame to our people, and to conuert as many as you can; and wee our ſelues will miniſter all things behouefull for your liuelihood. Which promiſe hee inſtantly performed, and in Canterburie his head City, allowed them fit places for reſidence, and ſufficient prouiſion for their maintenance; wherein theſe religious men, following in ſome meaſure the examples of the Apoſtles, ſpent their times in preaching and praiers, watching for the peoples conuerſions, and exerciſing the workes of true piety, as examples and motiues vnto others, to embrace the Goſpel which they ſought to plant.

Auſtine and his followers maintained in Canturbury.

(8) Neere vnto the Eaſt part of the City, ſtood an ancient Church, built by the Chriſtian Romans, whiles they had dwelt in Britaine, and by them dedicated to the honour of S. Martin, and is ſo yet called. To this Church the Chriſtian Queene Berta, with her Communicants the French, daily reſorted to pray, and vnto theſe, and in this Church, Auſtine and his fellowes began daily to preach: vnto whoſe Sermons ſo many of the Kentiſh alſo reſorted, that a plentifull harueſt in ſhort time appeared, vpon the ſeede-plot of their tillage; for it is reported that ten thouſand of the Engliſh people were baptized there in one day, inſomuch that the King himſelfe forſooke his Heatheniſh Idolatrie, and likewiſe receiued the Sacrament of Baptiſme, vnto his ſaluation in Chriſt: in witneſſe whereof, hee gaue the Lordſhip and Royaltie of his chiefe Citie Canterburie, vnto Auguſtine, and reſigned his princely Palace therein vnto him, who in the Eaſt of this City laid the foundation of that great, and afterwards magnificent Church, dedicated to the ſeruice and name of Chriſt, which at this day is the Cathedrall of that Metropolitan See: and Ethelbert to giue him more roome, withdrew himſelfe vnto Reculuer in Tanet, where he erected a Palace for himſelfe and his ſucceſſours, the compaſſe wherof may be traced by an old wal, whoſe ruines remaine there yet to this day.

(9) Auſtine thus ſeated, and in the well deſerued fauour of King Ethelbert, got one requeſt more, which was this, that whereas by the Law of the Twelue Tables, it was forbidden to bury the dead within the walles of any Citie, (the practiſe whereof, wee daily finde by monuments taken vp in the fields adioining) it would pleaſe him to giue to that vſe, an old Idoll-Temple ſtanding without the Eaſt Wall of the Citie, wherin the King himſelfe had wontedly worſhipped his Idols. This obtained, and the Church purged frō that prophane exerciſe, to the ſeruice of God, being honored with the name of S. Pancras, King Ethelbert added thereunto a moſt faire Monaſterie, built vpon his owne coſt, and dedicated it vnto the name of Peter and Paul the Apoſtles, appointing it to bee the place for the Kentiſh Kings Sepulchers, and Auſtine likewiſe meant it for the burials of his ſucceſſours in that See. But firſt it became the Monument of his owne name: for in regard of the Procurer, both Pancras, Peter, and Paul were ſoone ſwallowed vp, and the whole called onely by the name of S. Auſtines. In this place, eight Kings of Kent had their bodies interred, and tenne of their Arch-biſhops therein laid, vntill that Cuthbert the eleuenth in ſucceſsion, in fauour of S. Iohns, a new Church by him erected, procured of King Egbert the ſonne of Ercombert, that the ſucceeding Arch-biſhops might be buried there. This Monaſterie, as all the reſt did, came to her fatall period in the daies of King Henry the Eighth; whoſe vncouered walles ſtood ſo long languiſhing in time and ſtormes of weather, that daily increaſed the aſpect of her ruines, till now laſtly they are made ſubiect to other publike vſes, and the whole tract of that moſt goodly foundation in the ſame place no where appearing. Onely Ethelberts Tower, in memorie and honour of the man, as yet hath eſcaped the verdict and ſentence of deſtruction; whoſe beauty, though much defaced and ouerworne, will witneſſe to ſucceeding ages the magnificence of the whole, when all ſtood compleat in their glory together.

(10) Theſe his happie beginnings, Auſtine ſignified by Letters to Rome, and withall demanded directions, how he might further proceed: which queſtions, were they not written by the Venerable Beda, wee could hardly beleeue that ſuch idle conceits ſhould haue place in the minde of a man ſo well and fruitfully buſied: as, Whether a woman with child might receiue the Sacrament of Baptiſme, or in her monethly diſeaſe, the holy Communion, or enter the Church: how long after her deliuerance, the husband ought to refraine her Bed: How the Gifts that were offred on the Altar, ought to be diſtributed: and vnto what degree of conſanguinitie Chriſtians might marie: and many others ſuch like, as though himſelfe had neuer read either Moſes or Paul. But of the thing then more needfull, for that at that time it ſtirred moſt contention, it ſeemeth he was ſufficiently inſtructed; neither among his other queſtions is it once named: and that was, the due time for the celebration of Eaſter: the difference whereof, betwixt the Britaines and the Romans was ſuch, that it cauſed Lord-like Auſten to prophecie (if not to ſeeke) their deſtructions; and they in their opinions, to hold him no better then the Man of Sinne: for thus the Storie is reported.

Auſtines queſtions to the Pope.

(11) Auſtine, by the aſsiſtance and authoritie of King Ethelbert, called an Aſſemblie of the Britiſh Biſhops and Doctours, that had retained the doctrine of the Goſpell amongſt them, euen from the firſt plantation thereof by the Apoſtles themſelues, to be holden in the Borders of the Victians and Weſt-Saxons, and at the place vpon that occaſion called * Auguſtines Oake: thither reſorted ſeuen Britiſh Biſhops, and many other well-learned men (ſaith Beda) out of their greateſt Monaſterie at Bangor, where at that time Dinoth was Abbat. Theſe men now ready to goe to the foreſaid Synod, came firſt to a certaine holy and wiſe man, which liued thereabout an Anchorets life, to aske his counſell, whether they ought at Auſtins preaching and exhortation, leaue their Traditions or no: The Anchoret replied, If he be a man of God, follow him. But how ſhall we proue (ſaid they) that hee is a man of God? The Anchoret anſwered, Our Lord ſaith, Take yee on you my Yoke, and learne ye of me, for I am milde and humble of heart. If therefore this Auſtine bee milde and humble of heart, it is like that himſelfe beareth the Yoke of Chriſt, and will offer you the ſame to beare. But if hee bee curſt and proud, it is certaine that hee is not of God, neither muſt we much eſteeme his words. Then they enquired, how they might know whether this Auſtine were proud or no: Prouide (quoth he) that he and his companie may come firſt to the place of the Synod or Councell-houſe: and if it bee ſo that when you approch neere him, he ariſe courteouſly, and ſalute you, then thinke him to bee the ſeruant of Chriſt, and ſo heare him, and obey him: but if when you approch, hee deſpiſe you, and will not vouchſafe to riſe at your preſence, which are the greater number, let him likewiſe bee deſpiſed of you. And truly (ſaith hee) as this Anchoret bade them, ſo did they: for it happened, that when they came thither, S. Auſtine was already ſet in his chaire, and ſtirred not: which which when they saw, forthwith waxing wroth, they noted him of pride, and therefore endeuoured to ouerthwart and gainsay whatsoeuer he proposed. And so the Synod brake vp without any thing done.

Thus then wee see, that the substance of doctrine was embraced in Britaine, before the sending of Austin from Rome: only in ceremonies they dissented, as the most of Christian Churches, without derogation to the Gospell, at this day doe. And this for the celebration of Easter, a matter of no great moment (if we consider our Christian libertie, and the Apostles feare, that the obseruations of daies, moneths, times, and yeeres, turne the hearts after beggerly rudiments, bring againe into bondage, and make his labours for Christ in vaine) yet for the different obseruation only of this Feast from the Romans, how oft are the Britaines tearmed by Beda, a wicked people, a cursed nation, and well deseruing those calamities which the Lord did afflict vpon them? This controuersie for Easters celebration, thus begun, continued no lesse then ninety yeeres after, and was lastly concluded in manner as followeth.

(12) This variance (saith Beda) made not onely the people to doubt and feare, lest bearing the name of Christians, they did and had runne in vaine, as the Apostle speaketh, but also good Oswy King of Northumberland, and learned Prince Alkfryd, with Queene Eanfled, were much distracted and perplexed: for by this variance (saith hee) it often times hapned, that in one yeere two Easters were kept; for the King breaking vp his Fast, and solemnizing of the Feast, the Queene with Prince Alkfrid, continued their Fast, and kept that day their Palme-Sunday. To conclude which contrarietie, a Synod purposely was called, and the Question disputed by their best Diuines. The place was Stranshalch or Whitby, whereof Hilda was Abbesse. The chiefe parties for, and against the accustomed time of keeping that feast, were King Oswy and Prince Alkfrid his sonne. The Disputers for Oswy and the established orders, were Colman Arch-bishop of Yorke, with his Scotish Clergie, and Hilda the vertuous and learned Lady Abbesse of the place. For Alkfrid and the attempted alteration, were Agilbert Bishop of the West-Saxons; Wilfrid Abbat of Rippon, with Iames and Romanus, two learned men, and the reuerend Cedda newly consecrated Bishop, appointed Prolocutor of the Assembly.

The Conuocation set, King Oswy made a solemne Oration, wherein hee vrged a necessitie, that those people which serued one God, ought to celebrate his heauenly Sacraments alike, and should keepe one order and rule in the same: the truth of which seruice, and surcease of that long vnchristian variance, for the Christian celebration and time of Easter, was then presently by those learned men to bee handled, and by best approouements to be determined; whereunto hee requested their vttermost endeuours, and to that purpose commanded his Arch-bishop Colman first to speake: whereupon Colman with reuerence stood vp and said: The Easter which I obserue, I receiued of my Fore-fathers, of whom I was consecrated, and sent hither for your Bishop. They all (you know) were godly men, and obserued the Feast as we doe now; neither thinke you they kept this tradition without sure warrant from greater then themselues, which was Saint Iohn the Euangelist, and the Disciple whom Iesus especially loued, who in the Churches which himselfe planted, celebrated the Feast of Easter, as we doe now. Therefore knowing the man so worthy, and the manner so ancient, I hope you will all confesse, it is not safe for vs now to reiect.

Wilfride the declaimer, appointed to answer, stood vp and said: The Easter which we obserue, wee our selues haue seene obserued in Rome, where the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul liued, preached, suffred, and are buried: and in our trauels thorow France and Italie, either for studie or vpon pilgrimage, we haue seene the same order kept: and we know by relation, that in Africke, Asia, Ægypt and Greece, nay thorowout all nations and tongues in the world where Christ hath his Church, that this our time and order is obserued. Shall then these obstinate Picts (I meane the Britaines) and these remote Ilands in the Ocean Sea, and yet not all of them neither, fondly contend in this point against the whole world?

But here Colman interrupted him, and said, I much marueil, brother, that you terme our doings a fond contention, seeing we haue for our warrant so worthy an Apostle as Iohn was, who only leaned vpon our Lords brest, and whose life and behauiour all the world acknowledgeth to bee most wise and discreet.

God forbid (said Wilfrid) that I should accuse Iohn: but yet we know that he kept the decrees of Moses literally, and according to the Iewish Lawes; and so the rest of the Apostles were constrained in some things to doe, for the weakenesse of them who accounted it a great sin to abrogate those rites that God himselfe had instituted; and for that cause S. Paul did circumcise Timothie, offred bloud-sacrifices in the Temple, shaued his head at Corinth with Aquila and Priscilla: vpon which consideration also spake Iames vnto Paul, You see brother how many thousand of the Iewes haue receiued the faith, and all of these are yet zealous followers of the Law. But the light of the Gospell now shining thorow the world, it is not lawfull for any Christian to bee circumcised, or to offer vp bloudy sacrifices of Beasts. Saint Iohn therefore, according to the custome of the Law, in the fourteenth day of the first moneth, at euen began the celebration of Easters Festiuitie, regardlesse whether it fell vpon the Sabbath day, or any other of the weeke. But S. Peter preaching the Gospell in Rome, remembring that our Lord arose from his graue the first day after the Sabbath, giuing thereby vnto vs certaine assurance of our resurrection, obserued the Feast of Easter according to the Commandement of that Law he looked for, euen as S. Iohn did, that is to say, the first Sabbath after the full Moone of the first moneth. Neither doth this new obseruation of the Gospell, and Apostles practise, breake the old Law, but rather fulfilleth it; for the Law commandeth the Feast of Passeouer to bee kept from the foureteenth day of that moneth, to the twentie and one of the same. And this hath the Nicene Councell not newly decreed, but rather confirmed (as the Ecclesiasticall Historie witnesseth) that this is the true obseruation of Easter, and of all Christians after this account is to bee celebrated: and thereupon charged Bishop Colman, that hee neither obserued it according to Iohn nor Peter.

To this the Bishop replied, that Anatholius for his holinesse much commended by the said Ecclesiasticall Historie, and Columba a Father of like sanctitie, by whom miracles were wrought, kept the Feast according as he then did, from whose imitation he durst not digresse.

Your Fathers, which you pretend to follow, how holy soeuer they bee (said Wilfrid) and what miracles soeuer they haue wrought, yet this I answer, that in the day of iudgement many shall say vnto Christ, that they haue propheried, cast out Diuels, and wrought miracles in his name, to whom our Lord will answer, I know you not. And if your Father Columba (yea and our Father, if hee be the true seruant of Christ) were holy and mightie in miracles, yet can hee by no meanes bee preferred to the most blessed Prince of the Apostles, vnto whom our Lord said, Thou art Peter, and vpon this rocke I will build my Church, and the gates of hell shall not preuaile against it, and to thee will I giue the keyes of the Kingdome of Heauen. Thus said, the King asked Colman, whether our Lord indeede spake thus vnto Peter, who answered, He did. But can you (said hee) giue euidence of so speciall authoritie granted to your Father Columba? The Bishop said, No. Then (quoth the King) doe you both agree confidently, that these words were principally spoken vnto Peter, and that vnto him the keyes of the Kingdome of Heauen were giuen? They all answered, It is most certaine. Whereupon the King concluded this great controuersie, and said, Then will not I gainesay such a Porter as this is, but as farre as I know, and am able, I will conuet in all points to obey his ordinance, lest perhaps when I come to the Doores of Heauen, I finde none to open vnto mee, hauing his displeasure, which is so cleerely prooued to beare the keyes thereof.

And with this so simple a collection of King Oswy, concluded this long and great contention for the celebration of Easter; which heere, as borne before the

REDVVALD THE THIRD KING OF THE EAST-ANGLES, AND SEVENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS WIVES AND ISSVE.

CHAPTER XIX.

AN. D. 616.

Edwald, the ſonne of Titulus, and the third King of the Eaſt-Angles, had been a ſubſtitute vnder Ethelbert King of Kent, and ſerued a long time as his Vice-roy ouer all his dominions, whereby he gained ſuch reputation to himſelfe, that either for his owne valour, or Edbalds vices, (contemned of the people for his Apoſtaſie, frenſie, and inceſtuous bed) became the ſeuenth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, about the yeere of Chriſt his Incarnation ſix hundred and ſixteene; and the twentieth and fourth of his raigne ouer the Eaſt-Angles.

(2) This Redwald (ſaith Beda) had receiued Baptiſme in Kent, but in vaine, and without zeale, as it afterwards appeared. For returning to his Country, through the perſwaſion of his wife, returned againe to to his superstitious worships; and in one and the same Temple, after the manner of the old Samaritans, hee erected an Altar for the seruice of Christ, and another little Altar for burnt sacrifices to his Idols, which stood vnto the daies of Beda himselfe. But as she was an instigator to the East-Saxons idolatry, so was shee an instrument to the further spreading of Christianitie (though not by her so purposely meant) in sauing the life of Edwine, who afterwards planted the Gospell in all the North parts of the Saxons gouernment.

(3) For Edwine flying the rage of wilde Ethelfrid, was succoured and maintained in the Court of King Redwald, vnto whom lastly, the Northumbrian sent both threats and rewards to haue him deliuered, or else put to death: and surely had not the Queene stood for his life, he had presently died. But she alleaging the law of humanitie, the trust of a friend, and the royaltie of a Prince, preuailed so farre, that Redwald did not onely saue his life, but assisted him in battell, to the destruction of his enemie, and the gaining of Northumberlands Crowne. For vpon the return of Ethelfrids Ambassadors, vnto whom Redwald had yeelded to make Edwine away, he with his power of the East-Angles were at their backes, and as an enemie made towards Northumberland.

(4) Ethelfrid, whose rage and reuenge was ready enough vpon lesser occasions, with such sudden preparation as he was able to make, met the East-Angles almost at Nottingham, and that not farre from the Riuer Idle, where boldly encountring his vnequall enemie, at the first brunt slew Reynhere the sonne of King Redwald, to the great griefe of him and his whole host: whose reuenge was so violently sought, that they slew King Ethelfrid in the field, and established Edwine to be his successor; which was the second yeere of Redwalds Monarchy. Redwald, his raigne.

(5) Wherein he raigned the space of eight yeeres, and was King of the East-Angles thirty one, and deceased in the yeere of our Lord six hundred twentie foure; the eighth of Edbalds King of Kent; the thirteenth of Kingils King of the West-Saxons, and the eighth of Edwins ouer the Northumbrians.

(6) The Queene and wife of this King is not named by any of our Writers, but that she had been the widow of a Nobleman, descended of the bloud-royall of that Nation, and was a Lady that had deserued great commendations for the many vertues by her possessed, had she been a Christian, or a fauorer of the Christians, or had not been an vtter enemy to their faith. Notwithstanding by her first husband she had a sonne named Sigebert, that proued a learned and most religious Prince, of whom we haue spoken in Chapter eleuenth.

(7) His issue were Reynhere and Erpenwald. Reynhere the elder, and Prince of the East-Angles, was slaine as you haue heard, in the battell that his father fought against wilde Ethelfrid, neere vnto the Riuer Idle in Nottingham-shire.

(8) Erpenwald the younger succeeded his father Redwald in the Kingdome of the East-Angles, and was the fourth King of that Nation, whose life and raigne we haue declared in the succession of the East-Angles Kings: Chapter 11.

EDVVINE THE GREAT KING OF NORTHVMBERLAND, AND THE EIGHTH SOLE MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS RAIGNE, WIVES, AND ISSVE.

CHAPTER XX.

THE Monarch reuerted from the East-Angles, was next possessed by the Northumbrians, wherein it was held with greater glorie and for longer time. For Edwine in King Redwalds life growne very potent, after his death became his successor in the English Monarch, and most worthily did adorne the same by his ciuill iustice and diuine pietie: his exile, visions, and obtaining of the Northumbrians Crowne, we haue already spoken of, and therefore without repetition will passe on to his end. An.Do.617.

(2) This Edwine, the sonne of great Ella, the first King of the Deirians, was the third King that possessed the same, the eighth of Bernicia, the second (and first Christian) King of all Northumberland, at the age of twenty three, and in the yeere of Christ six hundred twenty foure, succeeded Redwald in the Monarchy, and was the greatest King of all the Saxons. For (as An.Do.624.

(as Beda saith) hee subdued all the coasts of Britannie whersoeuer any Prouinces were inhabited, either of English or of Saxons, which thing no King of the English before him had done; and added the * Meuian Iles vnto his owne Dominions. The first of them, and next the South, was large and fertile, gaue roome for nine hundred and sixty of his English Families, and the second, ground for aboue three hundred Tenements.

Hebrides.

(3) His first wife dead, he became suiter for Lady Ethelburg, daughter to Ethelbert King of Kent, deceased, and sister to King Eadbald then raigning: whose Ambassadours were answered, that it was not lawfull for a Christian Virgin to bee espoused to a Pagan, lest the faith and sacraments of the heauenly King should bee prophaned, by the matching with that earthly King, which knew not to worship God aright. But Edwine hearing of the Virgins beautie, integrity, and pietie, was so farre ouergone and rauished therewith, that hee condescended, shee should with her place retain her owne Christian Profession, and enioy the Christian societie both of her men, woman, Priests, and seruants, to bee her attendants in his Court. These couenants thus confirmed, the Lady accompanied with Paulinus the reuerend Bishop, and an honourable retinue, all of them Christian, came to King Edwins Court, and with great ioy shee was espoused his Queene.

Ethelburgs good parts.

(4) The greatnesse and prosperitie of this Northumbrian King, was both feared by them a farre, that raigned in no such power, and beheld by his neerer, with an enuious eie: among whom, Quinchelme that raigned with his father king ouer the West-Saxons, sent a desperate Ruffin, whose name was Eumerus, to murder Edwin the next yeere of his mariage; who repairing to his Court, then resident neere the riuer Deruent, at the place that is now called Aldeby in Yorkshire, with a double-edged short sword, the point thereof poisoned, and girt vnder his garment, vpon Easter day entred his Palace, as an Ambassadour, and with craftie speech reteined the Kings attention, where getting occasion, and stepping forward, drew his sword, which one Lilla the Kings seruant saw, and wanting wherewith to defend his person, put himselfe betwixt the King and the sword: and thorow his bodie so slaine, the same was so farre runne, that it dangerously wounded the King with his point, and with the same sword, before he could be beaten down by the Guard, slew another seruant, whose name was Fordhere.

A conspiracie.

Beda hist. Angl. lib. 2. cap. 9.

(5) It happened the same night, being holy Easter Sunday, that Queene Ethelburg was brought to bed of a daughter: for ioy whereof, and her safe deliuerance, the King gaue thankes to his Idols; which Bishop Paulinus, then in presence, greatly reproued, and bade Edwin to giue thankes vnto God, from whom only all goodnesse came; and spake vnto him of our new birth in Christ: at which conference the King much reioiced, and promised that hee would euer after renounce all his Idols, and worship that Christ whom he preached, if that God would grant him his life, and giue him victorie against that King, who had sent this Manqueller to murder him; in pledge whereof, he assigned Paulinus to baptise his daughter, the which vpon Whitsunday following was performed in her, by the name of Eanfled, and shee the first of the Northumbrians which receiued that Sacrament. At which time also, Edwin being recouered of his wound so lately receiued, made an Armie, and marched forth against the West-Saxons, and in battle either slew or tooke prisoners al them that had conspired his death, and as a victorious Conquerour, returned to his Country.

Bishop Paulinus.

(6) Where continuing in honour, and his affaires prospering to his owne desires, hee was yet in minde distracted, and his thoughts continually perplexed, what God he should worship. The sanctitie of the Christians mooued him much, and the ancient customes of his Ancestours sate neere his heart, betwixt whom there seemed a combat in himselfe. And in these dumps sitting one day alone, it chanced Bishop Paulinus to haue accesse to his presence, where laying his right hand vpon the kings head, demanded of him whether hee remembred that signe: whereat Edwine suddenly fell at the Bishops feete, whom hee in haste and reuerence presently lifted vp, and spake vnto him as followeth.

Beda hist. Angl. lib. 2. cap. 12.

Behold O Soueraigne (said he) by the bountifull hand and power of our God, you haue escaped the hand and vengeance of your most hated and dreadfull enemie. Behold also, by his most gracious goodnes you haue obtained the soueraigntie of raigne and rule of the Kingdome. Remember now therefore the third thing which you promised him, and deferre no longer to accomplish the same by receiuing his faith and keeping his Commandements, who hath deliuered you from your temporall aduersities, and exalted you to the honour and Maiestie of a King; whose holy will if you hereafter obey, and doe his precept which by mee is preached, hee will also deliuer you from the perpetuall torment of Hell, and make you partaker with him in his heauenly Kingdome and eternall blisse without end.

Edwine put in minde of couenants.

(7) Whereupon conferring with his Counsell, whereof Bishop Coyfi was chiefe, for the establishing of the Gospell, and suppressing of Idolatrie, it was then concluded, that the true God should bee worshipped, and the Altars of their wonted Idols ouerthrowne: vnto which action, Coyfi himselfe became the first man; for mounted on horsebacke in armour, with a girt sword and launce in his hand (all which was vnlawfull for those Idoll-Priests) he brake downe their Altars, Grates, and Barres, and destroied their Temples whersoeuer he came. Some ruines thereof not farre from Yorke, and neere vnto the rising of the riuer Derwent, remained to be seen vnto the daies of Beda, and were then called Gotmund in Gaham. And king Edwine himselfe, with all his Nobilitie, and most of the Commons, receiued the lauer of Baptisme, the eleuenth yeere of his raigne, and of Christs Incarnation six hundred twenty and seuen, one hundred and eighty yeeres after the Saxons entrance into Britaine. The king was baptized the twelfth of Aprill, being Easter Sunday, at the Citie Yorke, in the Church of S. Peters, built then of wood, and was the kings Oratorie, which he enclosed about with a deepe foundation; and laying the walles with squared stones, made it the Cathedrall Church, and his Conuerter Paulinus Arch-bishop of that See.

Idolatrie abolished.

Beda hist. Angl. cap. 13.

(8) The Gospell thus established in these Northerne parts, spread daily further into other Prouinces, and with such fruit of peace, that in the raigne of this Edwin, and thorowout his Dominions, a weake woman with her new-borne babe might haue passed without dammage or danger ouer all the Iland, euen from Sea to Sea. And so much did the King tender his Subiects, that his prouident care was extended to the way-faring passengers, for whose vse he enclosed cleere Springs by the waies, where he set great Basens of brasse, both to wash and to bathe in; which either for loue or displeasure of the king, no man defaced, or tooke away.

Beda hist. Angl. lib. 2. cap. 16.

And so great was the magnificence of this Monarch, that (according to Bede) he had not only in Battle the Ensignes proper to battle borne before him, but in his ordinarie passages thorow the Cities and Towns of his kingdome, there alwaies went an Ensigne-bearer before him. And (to vse the words of the same venerable Author) he went not in any street, in which there was not borne before him that kinde of Standard which the Romans called Tufa, and the English Thuuf. That the Romans had such an Ensigne, as that which here is called Tufa, Iustus Lipsius in his Commentarie vpon that place in Vegetius (lib. 3. cap. 5.) where the seuerall Ensignes of the Romans are recited, doth declare, correcting that place of Vegetius (where Rufa was set for Tufa) by this place of Bede, and in the same shewing, that Tufa signified a Ball, as the Ball (by the example of Augustus) was an Ensigne of Monarchie, or absolute gouernment.

(9) But as the Sunne hath his rising, his height and and descent, and euer is mouing in the circle of his celestiall orbe; so man hath his birth time, being, and death, and till then is neuer staied in one certaine point. Kings therefore, as they be Kings, are the Suns of their owne world, but as they are men, goe to the shadow of death: neither can the strength of their power, wisdome, or policie, loue or applause, stay the hand heere that holds the fatall knife; for so in this King Edwin wee see, raised aboue hope to attaine the Diademe, and ruling in loue and liking of the people, was notwithstanding cut off in the midst of his glorie and greatnesse of strength.

(10) For Penda the stout Mercian enuying his peace, and Cadwallo the Britaine seeking to receiue his right, ioined in friendship against this Monarch, and met him as his enemies in the face of a Field. The plaine was large, and called Hethfeild, where after a long and most bloudie fight, king Edwin was slaine, with prince Offryd his sonne, his whole Host put to the sword, or most shamefull flight: which chanced the fourth of October, the yeere of our Lord six hundred thirty three, the sixth of his Christianitie, the seuenth of his Monarchie, the seuenteenth of his kingdome, and the forty seuenth of his age. His bodie was lastly buried in S. Peters Church at Streanshall, after called Whitby.

His Wiues.

(11) Quenburg his first wife, was the daughter (as Beda reporteth) of Ceorle; but as all other Writers doe witnesse, of Crida King of Mercia. She was married vnto him in the beginning of his youth; (and when he was dispossessed of his inheritance by the Tyrant Ethelfrid, as we haue said) with him shee liued a great part of his banishment, and in the Court of Redwald King of the East-Angles deceased, before her husband could recouer his Kingdome.

(12) Ethelburg, surnamed Tate, was the second wife of this King, who was the daughter of Ethelbert King of Kent, and of Queene Berta his first wife. She was married vnto him in the yeere of grace six hundred twentie fiue, being the second of his Monarchy, and was his wife six yeeres: but suruiuing him, and desirous to liue a religious life, shee returning into Kent, withdrew her selfe to a place not far from the Sea side, called Lymming, wherein shee built a Monasterie of Nunnes, and among them spent the rest of her life, and therein died, and was there buried.

His Issue.

(13) Offride, the eldest sonne of King Edwine, and Quenberg his first wife, was borne in the time of his fathers exile among the East-Angles. He was baptized in the faith of Christ by Paulinus the first Archbishop of Yorke, and was slaine the same day, and in the same battell that his father was. He had a sonne named Iffy, who was baptized also by Bishop Paulinus; and after the death of his father and grand-father, for feare of King Oswald, was conueied ouer the Seas into France, to bee brought vp in the Court of King Dagobert, where he died in his childhood, and was there honourably interred.

(14) Edfrid, the second sonne of King Edwine and Lady Quenberg his first wife; was borne in the time of his fathers exile, and baptized with his brother Offrid by Bishop Paulinus. After his fathers death, for feare of King Oswald, hee fled to Penda King of Mercia, who was his fathers enemie, and his mothers kinsman; by whom hee was most treacherously murthered. He left behind him a sonne named Hererik, who by his wife Bertswith had issue the vertuous & learned lady Hilda, Abbesse of Streanshalch: & Queen Hereswith her sister, the wife of Ethelhere King of the East-Angles brother to King Anna, by whom shee had issue Aldwolfe, Elswold, and Beorne, all three succeeding Kings of the East-Angles.

(15) Ethelme, the third sonne of King Edwine, and the first of Queen Ethelburg his second wife, was baptized by Paulinus Arch-bishop of Yorke, not long after his father and halfe-brethren; but in short space after his baptisme, he departed out of this world, euen in the time that he wore the white attire, which in those daies was vsed to bee worne by such as were newly baptized for a certaine space. His body was with all due funerall obsequies enterred within the new Church of S. Peter in the Citie of Yorke, which his father had newly founded.

(16) Vskfrea, the fourth sonne of King Edwine, and the second of Queene Ethelburg his second wife; and the last and youngest of them both, bare the name of his fathers great grandfather. He was baptized by the Arch-bishop Paulinus at one time with his brother Ethelme. After the decease of his father, his mother carried him with her out of Northumberland into Kent; and from thence conueied him ouer into France with his Nephew Iffy, the sonne of his halfe-brother Offrid, where hee continued in the custodie of King Dagobert, being his mothers cosen-german, and there died, and was honourably buried in a Church with his Nephew Iffy.

(17) Eanfled, the elder daughter of King Edwine and Queene Ethelberg his second wife, was borne the night following that her father was wounded and baptized, hee being a Pagan. Shee was afterwards married to Oswy, the fourth King of Northumberland, and tenth Monarch of the Englishmen, as shall bee said

Beda hist. Ang. lib. 3 cap. 19.

(18) Ethelbrid the younger daughter, the fifth and last-borne child to King Edwine and of Queene Ethelburge, was baptized at the same time with Ethelme and Vskfrea her brethren. She died an infant, the white clothing not yet put off, which in those daies was vsually worne at certaine set times after their baptisme, and was with like funerall obsequies buried by her brother Ethelme in the Church of S. Peters in Yorke, which their father had founded.

Oſwald.

OSVVALD KING OF NORTHVMBERLAND, AND THE NINTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS RAIGNE, WIFE, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 9.

Chapter XXI.

An.Do.634.

OSwald, the fifth King of Deira, the ninth of Bernicia, the third of Northumberland, and the ninth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, began his raigne the yeere of Chriſts incarnation ſix hundred thirty foure. He with Eanfrith and his brethren, the ſonnes of wilde Ethelfrid, and Oſrik alſo the ſonne of Alfrid King Edwins Vncle had been ſecured in Scotland all his raigne, and among the Red-ſhanks liued as baniſhed men, where they learned the true religion of Chriſt, and had receiued the Lauer of Baptiſme. But Edwines death wrought and diuulged, theſe Princes returne again to their Country, and the Northumbrians Kingdome lately gouerned by one, was now againe diuided into two ſeuerall parts, as formerly it had been.

(2) Ouer the Deirans, Oſrik was made king, and of Bernicia, Eanfrid aſſumed the raigne; but Gods iuſtice ouer taking their Apoſtaſie, neither their liues nor this diuiſion laſted long. For Cadwall the Chriſtian, and Penda the Pagan were Gods inſtruments, that with worthy vengeance in the firſt yeere of their gouernment, cut the one off in battell, and the other by trechery; whoſe names and yeere of raigne as vnhappy and of hatefull remembrance, the Hiſtoriographers of thoſe times would haue to be omitted.

Beda hiſt. Ang. lib. 3. cap. 1.

(3) But religious Oſwald lamenting the effuſion of his Countries bloud, long ſlept not, their reuenge. For aſſembling his power, which was not great, hee ſuddenly and vnlooked for came vpon Cadwallo, and at Deniſeburne pitched downe his tents. The place (ſaith Beda) ſtood neere the wall that Seuerus had made, where Oſwald for the firſt day forbare to fight, and among his Souldiers for his Standerd ſet vp a Croſſe of wood; whereunto it ſeemeth thoſe dawning daies of Chriſtianity were ouermuch addicted. Here Oſwald making firſt interceſsion to God, the onely preſeruer of his people, in ſore & long fight obtained great victory, with the ſlaughter of Cadwallo, and of all his Britiſh Army: which ſo accompliſhed, many haue attributed the vertue of that Croſſe to bee no ſmall cauſe of that great ouerthrow. This Croſſe ſo ſet vp, was the firſt we read of to haue been erected in England, and the firſt Altar vnto Chriſt among the Bernicians, whoſe pretended miraculous cures, not onely in the wood it ſelfe, but in the moſſe and in the earth wherein it was ſet, let Beda report them, and Stapleton vrge them, yet for my part, I hold them no Article of our canonicall Creed.

(4) But certaine it is, that Oſwald himſelfe was a moſt religious and godly king, and tooke ſuch care for the conuerſion and ſaluation of his ſubiects, that he ſent into Scotland for Aidan a Chriſtian Biſhop, to inſtruct his Northumbrians in the Goſpell of truth. And whereas the Biſhops could not ſpeake their language, the king himſelfe was interpreter at his Sermons, and gaue his words in the Engliſh, as hee ſpake and pronounced them in the Scotiſh, which language Oſwald perfectly ſpake, hauing beene there the ſpace of eighteene yeeres.

Hect. Boetius.

Thus the godly proceedings of the king and Biſhop, produced ſuch increaſe of their heauenly ſeed, that it is reported in ſeuen daies ſpace, fifteene thouſand Chriſtians receiued Baptiſme; and many of them forſaking the pleaſures of the world, to haue betake themſelues to a religious and ſolitarie life.

(5) At this time the whole Iland flouriſhed both with peace and plentie, and acknowledged their ſubiection vnto king Oſwald. For, as Beda reporteth, all the Nations of Britannie which ſpake foure languages, that is to ſay, Britaines, Redſhanks, Scots, and Engliſhmen, became ſubiect vnto him. And yet being aduanced to ſo royall Maieſtie, he was notwithſtanding (which is maruellous tobe reported) lowly to all, gracious to the poore, and bountifull to ſtrangers. The fruits whereof the ſame Author exemexemplifieth in his bounty and humilitie towards the poore; who vpon a ſolemne feaſt day, ſeeing many ſuch at his gates, ſent them both the delicates for himſelfe prepared, & commanded the charger of ſiluer to be broken, and diuided among them. The Biſhop much reioycing thereat, tooke the king by the right hand, and praied that it might neuer conſume; as after his death it did not, but was ſhrined in ſiluer, and in S. Peters Church at Bebba, now Bambrough, with worthy honor was worſhipped for the many miracles in cures that it did, as likewiſe the earth wherein his bloud was ſpilt: with ſuch lauiſh enlargements haue thoſe writers interlined the deeds of Gods Saints.

(6) But as the Sunne hath his ſhadow, and the higheſt tide her ebbe, ſo Oſwald, how holy ſoeuer, or gouernment how good, had emulators that ſought his life, and his Countries ruine: for wicked Penda the Pagan Mercian, enuying the greatneſſe that king Oſwald bare, raiſed warres againſt him, and at a place then called Maſerfeild in Shrop-ſhire, in a bloudie and ſore fought battle ſlew him; and not therewith ſatiſfied, in barbarous and brutiſh immanitie, did teare him in peeces, the firſt day of Auguſt, and yeere of Chriſt Ieſus ſix hundred forty two, being the ninth of his raigne, and the thirty eighth of his age: whereupon the ſaid place of his death is called to this day Oſwaldſtree, a faire Market Towne in the ſame Countie.

(7) The diſmembred limmes of his body were firſt buried in the Monaſtery of Bradney in Lincolnſhire, ſhrined with his ſtandard of Gold and Purple erected ouer his Tombe, at the induſtry and coſt of his neece Offryd, Queene of Mercia, wife vnto king Ethelred, and daughter to Oſwyn that ſucceeded him. From hence his bones were afterwards remooued to Gloceſter, and there in the north ſide of the vpper end of the Quire in the Cathedrall Church, continueth a faire Monument of him, with a Chapell ſet betwixt two pillers in the ſame Church.

His Wife.

(8) Kineburg, a moſt vertuous Lady, and daughter to Kingils the ſixth, and firſt Chriſtian king of the Weſt-Saxons, was the wife of king Oſwald, who became both his father and ſonne in the day of her mariage, by receiuing him at the Font, and her of his gift. She was maried vnto him in the ſecond yeere of his raign, which was the yeere of Chriſts Incarnation ſix hundred thirty ſix: no other relation made of her beſides the birth of his ſonne.

His Iſſue.

(9) Ethelwald, the only childe of king Oſwald and Queene Kineburg his wife, was borne in the yeere of our Lord ſix hundred thirty ſeuen, being the third yeere of his fathers raigne; and but an infant at his fathers death, was diſappointed of the Northumbrian Kingdome by the fraud of his vncle Oſwyn. Notwithſtanding at the death of Oſwin king of Deira, and then not aboue ſixteene yeeres of age, hee tooke the ſame kingdome, and by ſtrong hand held it againſt his vncle ſo long as he liued, and at his death left it to his coſen Alkefryd, the naturall ſonne of king Oſwyne, as in the ninth Chapter we haue ſaid.

OSVVY KING OF NORTHVMBERLAND, AND THE TENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS ACTS, WIFE, AND CHILDREN.

Monarch. 10.

CHAPTER XXII.

Swye, the illegitimate ſonne of King Ethelfrid, ſurnamed the Wilde, at thirty yeeres of age ſucceeded Oſwald his halfe brother in his Dominions, being the fourth King of Northumberland, and the tenth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, entring his gouernment the thirteenth day of October, and yeere of Chriſts Incarnation ſix hundred forty three. His firſt beginnings were much diſquieted by Penda the Heathen Mercian, by the rebellions of his baſe ſonne Alkfrid, and by the oppoſitions of Ethelwald the ſon of King Oſwald: but none ſate more neere his heart then Oſwyn king of the Deirians did, whoſe vertuous gouernment did much darken (as hee tooke it) his owne, and the free loue of thoſe ſubiects, daily to leſſen his among the Bernicians.

But Oſwyn finding himſelfe too weake for Oſwy, and to ſaue the effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, forſooke the field, accompanied onely with one Souldier, and went to Earle Hunwald his friend as he thought, to ſecure his life. But contrary to truſt, hee deliuered him vnto King Oſwy, who cruelly ſlew him the twentieth of Auguſt, and ninth of his raigne, at the place called Ingethling; where afterwards for ſatisfaction of ſo hainous an offence, a Monaſterie was built, as vpon like occaſions, many the like foundations were laid; whoſe ſtones were thus ioyned with the morter of bloud.

(3) Of this Oſwine thus ſlaine, Beda reporteth the Story following: Among his other rare vertues and princely qualities, his humility (ſaith he) and paſſing lowlineſſe excelled: whereof he thus exemplifieth: The reuerend Chriſtian Biſhop Aidan vſing much trauell to preach the Goſpell thorowout that Prouince, the King for his more eaſe, gaue him a goodly Gelding with rich and coſtly trapping. It chanced one day, as the Biſhop rode to miniſter the word of life, that a poore man demanded his almes: but hee not hauing wherewith to releeue him, and pitying his diſtreſſed poore eſtate, preſently alighted, and gaue vnto him his horſe and rich furniture; whereof when the King heard, he blamed him, and ſaid, What meant you (my Lord) to giue to the begger the horſe that I gaue you, with my ſaddle and trappings? Had we horſes of no lower price to giue away to the poore? To whom the Biſhop replied, And is the brood of a beaſt dearer in your ſight, then this poore man the childe of God? The King thus reproued, turned himſelfe towards the fire, and there ſadly pauſing vpon this anſwer, preſently gaue from him his ſword, and in haſte fell at the Biſhops feet, deſiring forgiueneſſe in that he had ſaid. The Biſhop much aſtonied, ſuddenly lift vp the King, deſiring him to ſit to meat, and to be merry; which the King immediately did, but the Biſhop contrariwiſe began to bee penſiue and ſadde, and the teares to trickle downe his cheekes: in which paſſion hee burſt out into theſe ſpeeches, and ſaid to his Chaplaine in an vnknowne tongue, I neuer till this time haue ſeene an humble King; and ſurely his life cannot bee long, for this people are not worthy to haue ſuch a Prince to gouern them. But to returne to King Oſwy.

(4) Who after many cruell inuaſions of the mercileſſe Penda, was forced to ſue vnto him for peace, with proffers of infinite treaſure and moſt precious iewels: all which reiected, and the Tyrant comming on, Oſwy ſought his helpe by ſupplication to God, and with ſuch zeale as then was embraced, vowed his young daughter Elfled to be conſecrated in perpetuall virginitie vnto him, with twelue Farmers and their lands, to the erection and maintenance of a Monaſterie: and thereupon prepared himſelfe for battle.

Elfled the daughter of King Oſwy.

(5) The Armie of this enemie is reported to redouble thirty times his, all well appointed and old tried ſouldiers: againſt whom Oſwy with his ſonne Alkfryd boldly marched, Egfryd his other ſonne then being an hoſtage with Cinwiſe an vnder Queene of the Mercians: Ethelwald the ſonne of Oſwald, tooke part with Penda, againſt his naturall Vncle and natiue Country: ſo did Ethelherd the brother of Chriſtian Anna, ſide with this heatheniſh and cruell Mercian.

And heerein proud Penda loſt his life, with the diſcomfiture of all his Mercian power. Heerein alſo died Ethelherd, the Eaſt-Angles King, who was the only motiue to theſe warres: and Ethelwald eſcaping, returned with diſhonour vnto Deira. He it was that decided the long controuerſy for Eaſters celebration, and founded the Cathedrall Church in Lichfeild for a Biſhops See: which Citie, with all South-Mercia, diuided from the north by the riuer Trent, hee gaue to Peada the ſonne of king Penda, in mariage with his naturall daughter Alkfled, on condition that he ſhould become a Chriſtian: all which the ſaid king not long enioied, but was murdered in his owne Court. (8) Thus Oſwy ending in troubles as he began in warres, raigned the ſpace of twenty eight yeeres, and then falling ſicke, was ſo ſtrucke with remorſe for the death of good Oſwyn, and bloud which hee had ſpilt, that hee vowed a pilgrimage to Rome, in which reputed holy place hee purpoſed to haue ended his life, and to haue left his bones therein to reſt: but his diſeaſe increaſing, and that purpoſe failing, he left this life the fifteenth of Februarie, and his body to remaine in *S. CHAPTER XXIII.

Vulfhere, after the murther of his brother Peada, aduanced againſt Oſwy by the Nobles of Mercia, maintained his title and kingdome for twelue yeeres continuance, in the life time of that Northumbrian Monarch, and after his death tranſlated the Monarchy from thoſe Kings, and Country, vnto himſelf and his ſucceſſors the Mercians, who now wore the Imperiall Diademe without reuerſement, vntill ſuch time as great Egbert ſet it vpon the Weſt-Saxons head.

He was the ſecond ſonne of Penda King of Mercia, and the ſixth in ſucceſſion of that kingdome, beginning his raigne the yeere of Chriſt his Incarnation, ſix hundred fiftie nine, and twelue yeeres after, Anno ſix hundred ſeuenty one, entred his Monarchy ouer the Engliſhmen, and was in number accounted the eleuenth Monarch of the Land.

(2) His entrance was with trouble againſt the Northumbrians; for vnto Egfrid their King he had loſt the poſſeſsion of the Iland Linſey, and was expelled the Country: yet three yeeres after he fought againſt the Weſt-Saxons with better ſucceſſe, whoſe Country with conqueſt he paſſed thorow, and wan from Rewald their King the Ile of Wight, which Iland he gaue to Edilwach the South-Saxons King, whom he receiued his God-ſonne at the font-ſtone: notwithſtanding himſelfe had lately been a prophane Idolater, and moſt cruell Heathen, as by the Liger booke of the Monaſtery of Peterborow appeareth, whoſe ſtory is this:

But King Vulfhere repenting this his moſt vnhumane murther, became himſelfe a Chriſtian, and deſtroied all thoſe Temples wherein his heathen Gods had been worſhipped, conuerting them all into Chriſtian Churches, and religious Monaſteries: and to redeeme ſo hainous an offence, vnderwent the finiſhing of * Mediſham, his brothers foundation, enriching it largely with lands and poſſeſsi-

Her mother was Sexburg, daughter to Anna, the seuenth King of the East-Angles, whose sisters were many and most of them Saints. She was married vnto him in the third yeere of his raigne, and was his wife fourteene yeeres. After his decease, she went to her mother Queene Sexburg, being then Abbesse of Ely, where she continued all the rest of her life, and therein deceased and was buried.

(7) Vulfald a young Gentleman conuerted to the Christian faith by Bishop Chad, and martyred for profession of the same by King Vulfhere, is reported by Water of Wittlesey, a Monke of Peterborow, in a Register which he wrote of that Monastery, to bee the supposed son of King Vulfhere himselfe, and to haue been slaine by him in his extreme fury before he was a Christian, or could indure to heare of the Christian faith. He was buried in Stone, as we haue said, where his father built a Colledge of Canons regular, which was afterwards called S. Vulfaldes.

(9) Wereburg, the daughter of King Vulfhere and Queene Ermenhild, was in her childhood committed to the bringing vp of Queene Etheldrid her mothers Aunt, in the Monastery of Ely, by whose perswasion she professed virginity, and returning to her Country in the raigne of King Ethelred her Vncle, was by him made ouerseer of all the Monasteries within his dominions. She deceased at Trickingham (now called Trentham) in Stafford-shire, and was buried at Hanbery. Her body was afterwards remooued to Westchester, where Leofrik the Earle built in honour of her a goodly Church called S. Wereburgs, which to this day is the Cathedrall Church of that Citie.

CHAPTER XXIIII.

An.Do.675.

Ethelred, the third sonne of King Penda, and brother to the last declared Vulfhere, in the yeere of Christ Iesus six hundred seuenty fiue, beganne his raigne in the kingdome of Mercia, and at the same time in the Monarchy of the Englishmen, being the seuenth King among them that ware their Diademe, and the twelfth person that bare the Imperiall title of the whole: his claime was not immediately nor next in succession, young Kenred his Nephew standing betwixt him and the Crowne. But himselfe a child in yeeres, and in them also addicted vnto a priuate life, he gaue his Vncle way to vndergo so publike a charge, which without contradiction was likewise accepted of the subiects.

Circumstances belonging to the beginning of his raigne.

daring to appeare in field. The Citie Rochester felt also his fury, whose Citizens were ransacked, their buildings ruinated, and their Bishop Putta driuen to such distresse, that he became a Teacher of good Arts and Musicke in Mercia, to maintaine his aged yeeres from the necessity of perishing want. These stirres (saith Beda) happened in the yeere of grace six hundred seuenty seuen; and the next following, so fearefull a Blazing starre, as was wonderfull to behold, first discouered in the moneth of August, and for three moneths together continued rising in the morning, and giuing forth a blazing pile very high, and of a glittering flame.

(3) The remorse of conscience for the bloud he had spilt, and the places of Oratories by him destroied, (besides his intrusions into another mans right) strucke so deepe a wound into King Ethelreds breast, that euer hee bethought him what recompence to make. First therefore building a goodly Monastery at Bradney, and that most fruitfully seated in the County of Lincolne, thought that not sufficient to wash away the scarres of his foule offence, but determined in himselfe to forsake the world, for that was the terme attributed to the monasticall life: wherein notwithstanding, in lesse cares they liued, and their persons more safe from all dangers attempted, then when they publikely administred their lawes to their people, the iust executions whereof, many times breed the ouerthrow of their Princes, and their Persons neuer secure amidst their owne gards.

(4) But such was the religion then taught, and the godly zeale of the good Princes then raigning, whose works haue manifested their vertues to posterities, and faith in Christ the saluation of their soules, in whose Paradise we leaue them, and Ethelred to his deuout intent: who to reconcile himselfe first vnto Kenred, bequeathed the Crowne solely to him, although he had a sonne capable thereof: then putting on the habit of religion, became himselfe a Monke, in his owne Monastery of Bradney, where he liued a regular life the terme of twelue yeeres, and therein lastly died Abbat of the place, when hee had raigned thirty yeeres, the yeere of Christs natiuity, seuen hundred sixteene.

(5) Offryd, the wife of King Ethelred, was the daughter of Oswy, and of Lady Eanfled, King and Queene of Northumberland. She was married vnto him in the yeere of our Lord six hundred seuenty seuen, being the third of his raigne, and the twentieth of her age. Shee was his wife twenty yeeres: and passing thorow the North parts of Mercia, she was set vpon and slaine by the people of that Country, in reuenge of the death of Peada their King, who had long before bin murthered by Alkefled his wife, and her half sister, as we haue said. And thus strangely came shee to her vntimely end, the yeer of our Lord six hundred ninety seuen, the twenty three yeere of her husbands raigne and the fortieth of her owne age.

CHAPTER XXV.

An. Do. 704.

Kenred the sonne of Vulfhere, because of his minoritie at his Fathers death, was defeated of his dominions by his Vncle Ethelred, and vntill it pleased him to resigne his Crown, liued a priuate life, whereunto by nature hee was most inclined. But King Ethelred for the wrongs to him committed, and to redeeme the time that in warre and wealth he had prodigally spent, yeelded the Scepter vnto his hand, and set his seeming ouer-heauy Crowne vpon his Nephew Kenreds head: who began his raigne at one and the same time, both ouer the Mercians and Monarchy of the Englishmen, which was the yeere of Christs Incarnation seuen hundred and foure.

CHAPTER XXVI.

An. Do. 709.

Helred, the ſonne of King Ethelred, was of ſufficient yeeres, and well able of rule, at ſuch time as his father reſigned his Scepter vnto his Nephew Kenred, had not the pricke of that ſinne touched his conſcience, which made him to beſtow the ſame as he did; notwithſtanding the Crown being too waighty for Kenred to weare, he as freely againe gaue it the ſonne, as he had receiued it of the father before, and relinquiſhed his claime and title thereto.

The appendances of his ingreſſe into goucramét.

(2) Chelred thus aduanced before he it expected, entred his gouernment with great applauſe of the people, in whoſe opinions he was held the onely man worthy of their Crowne. Ouer the Mercians he raigned the ninth King, and of the Engliſh Monarchs the fourteenth in number, beginning them both in the yeere of grace ſeuen hundred & nine, and the fourth of Iuſtinian the younger, Empire.

Chelred worthy of the Crowne.

(3) His quietnes was diſturbed by Inas the Weſt-Saxon, whoſe fame for his fortunes beganne then to grow great. For Kent he had forced to buy their peace with mony: the Britaines ſubdued, and had inlarged his confines vpon them. And now againſt Chelred this new riſē Monarch, he meant to try chance, whoſe glory he looked at with an ouer enuious eye.

Inas King of the Weſt-Saxons.

(4) His greatneſſe likewiſe Chelred ſuſpected, who either to himſelfe or ſucceſſors, (by the foundation which he laid) would diuert the Monarchy from him and his Mercians, and entaile it to himſelfe or his Weſt-Saxons. Hereupon great preparation was made, and each ſet forward with all the powers, the one to attaine, and the other to keep, the glory and title that both of them ſo much thirſted after. At Wodnesbury they met, and with vndaunted ſpirits ſo fought, that the victory was doubtfull, for neither could ſay the battell was his, or that he departed with the leſſer loſſe.

His Wife.

(6) Wereburg the wife of King Chelred, is mentioned by Marianus the learned Scotish Historian, and by Florence of Worcester, who was the follower and continuer of his History, whom we may reasonably credit in this matter, being not incredible, although she must of necessity be thought to haue been married very young, or to haue died very old, because they record her decease to haue beene in the yeere of Christ seuen hundred eightie one, which was almost sixtie yeeres after the death of her husband, and towards the end of the long raigne of King Offa.

She died sixtie yeeres after her husband.

ETHELBALD THE TENTH KING OF THE MERCIANS, AND THE FIFTEENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN: HIS RAIGNE AND ACTS.

Monarch 15.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Thelbald, cosen germane once remoued vnto King Chelred, succeeded him in the kingdome of the Mercians, whereof he was the tenth in number, and of the Monarchs ouer the Englishmen, the fifteenth in account. He beganne his raigne in the yeere of grace seuen hundred sixteene, and with great honour raigned ouer all the Kings on the South side of Humber, whose time for the most part was spent in peace; yet some wars he had, and those with variable euents.

(2) For in the eighteenth yeere of his raigne, hee beleiged Sommerton, and wanne it; and inuading Northumberland, without proffer of resistance, returned with great riches by spoile. The Britaines also that were ioined confederates with the West-Saxons, hee molested and ouercame, for whose reuenge King Cuthred gaue him battell neere vnto Burford, where he with his Mercians receiued the foile, and lost the Banner, wherein was portracted a Golden Dragon, the thirty seuenth yeere of his raigne.

(3) The sinnes of these times both in Prince and people, were many and great, as by the Epistles of Boniface an Englishman, and Archbishop of Mentz, is most manifest, wherein he reproued his adulterous life, who refraining to marry, wallowed in filthy lecheries; by whose example the Noblemen of Mercia did the like: and their women, as well Nunnes as others, made away their children borne out of wedlocke, whereby the graues were filled with dead bodies, as hell it selfe with damned soules. And in another Epistle sent vnto Cuthbert, Archbishop of Canterbury, he complaineth of the English Nunnes, who wandring in pilgrimage vnder shew of deuotion, liued in pleasure and wanton fornications, through all the Cities of France and of Lumbardy.

Nunnes infamy.

(4) This his Epistle tooke so good effect, that in repentance King Ethelbald released and priuiledged the Church from all tributes to himselfe, and built the Abbey of Crowland in Lincolnshire, for the pacifying of Gods wrath towards his sinnes; when also it was enacted by Cuthbert and his Clergy, in a Conuocation held in his Prouince, that the sacred Scriptures should be read in their Monasteries, the Lords Praier and Creed, taught in the English tongue: which accordingly was done. Which Councell was held in the thirty yeere of this Kings raigne, and of Christs incarnation seuen hundred forty eight.

Crowland Abbey built.

(5) Finally, when he had ruled forty two yeeres, fighting against Cuthred the West-Saxon, in a warre not prudently vndertaken, he was traiterously slaine by his owne subiects, at the procurement of Bernred a Leader of them, who affecting the kingdome by this stratagem of Treason, sought to attaine it, but was himselfe slaine by Offa the Mercian, before that this ill sowen seed could take any roote. The place of this Great Ethelbalds death, was Secondone, three miles from Tamworth, in the County of Warwicke; and of his buriall, Repton in Darby-shire, where with honourable obsequies he was enterred, the yeere of Christs humanity seuen hundred fiftie eight, hauing had neithe Wife nor Childre n.

OFfa, the coſen of King Ethelbald, after ſome time of Inter-regnum, ſucceeded him in his dominions of Mercia; a man of ſo high ſtomacke and ſtoutnes of mind, that he thought nothing vnpoſsible for him to attaine: and for vertue and vice, ſo equally compoſed, that hardly could bee iudged to whither of them the ſcale of his carriage moſt inclined, although the Monke of *S. The parents of Offa.

(2) His Parents hee nameth Twinfreth and Mercella, and himſelfe hee ſaith to haue been firſt named Pinered, borne both lame, deafe, and blinde, wherein he ſo continued vnto his mans eſtate. The rage of Bernred (ſaith the ſame Author) had forced all three into a ſolitary place, where ſuddenly by miracle Pinered was reſtored, and for that cauſe called another Offa, who preſently aſſailed, and in a great battel manfully fought, ſlew the vſurping Bernred. The Nobles of Mercia being rid of that Tyrant by the valour of Offa, gladly imbraced & receiued him for their King; who began his raigne with greater ſhew of glory, then any Mercian before him had done, being in number the eleuenth that had raigned in that Prouince, and is accounted the ſixteenth Monarch of the Engliſhmen.

(3) His neighbour Kings foreſeeing whereat his eye glanced, ſollicited by Letters Charles the Great, then King of France, againſt him, who wrote vnto Offa in their behalfe, and in threatning wiſe commanded him to deſiſt. But he was ſo farre from fearing of his threats, that to his contempt he was the more eager.

Malmsbury.

(4) The firſt that felt his fury, were the Kentiſhmen vnder Alrik their King, whoſe ouerthrow was the leſſe diſhonourable (ſaith Malmesbury) for that they were vanquiſhed by ſo great a Monarch. The place was Otteford, vnfortunate to them, where their King was ſlaine by the hand of Offa himſelfe, their forces quite diſcomfited by the loſſe of this field, and their Country trodden downe vnder the feet of the Mercians.

(5) From South to North King Offa then marched, and beyond Humber made hauocke of all that ſtood againſt him; whence returning triumphant, he ſet vpon the Weſt-Saxons, that had formerly ioined with his enemies: the place was Benſinton, which Caſtell King Offa tooke, with the diſcomfiture of King Kenwolfe, and all his Weſt-Saxons, who ſought their reuenge by the aides of the Britaines in Wales. Their King (ſaith mine Author) was then Marmodius, betwixt whom ſome intercourſe by letters paſſed, & great preſents to King Offa ſent, onely to protract time, and to worke vpon aduantage.

(6) In this Interim of complements, for a further ſecurity, Offa cauſed a great ditch to be drawn betwixt his and the Britaines borders, which worke began at Baſingwark in Flint-ſhire, and North-wales, not farre from the mouth of Dee, and ranne along the mountaines into the South, & ended neer Briſtow at the fall of Wye; the tract whereof in many places is yet ſeene, and is called to this day Clawdh Offa, or Offaes ditch. Marmodius, who openly bare ſaile to this wind, and ſeemed to winke at Offaes intent, ſecretly called a Counſell of State, wherein he declared how the Act thus in working, would ſoone proue the bane of liberty vnto their country, and the marke of diſhonor to thēſelues & poſterity for euer; therefore his aduice was, that by ſome ſtratagem it might be ſtaid by time.

(7) To this his Britaines conſented, the truce yet laſting, and the feaſt of Chriſts Nativity euen then at hand; in the celebration wherof was held the greateſt aduantage with leaſt ſuſpect, to put themſelues in action againſt it; and ſecretly working the aſsiſtance of their allies the Saxons, both of the South, the Weſt, and the North, vpon Saint Stephens day at night, ſuddainely brake downe the banke of this fortification, filling vp againe a great part of the Ditch, and in the morning moſt furiouſly ruſhed into Offa his Court, put-putting a great number to the ſword, who were more intentiue and regardfull to the Feaſt, then to any defence from their cruell and mercileſſe ſwords.

(8) Theſe wrongs King Offa delaied not to requite; firſt making their hoſtages his vaſſals and ſlaues, and then with a great army entring Wales, in a bloody and ſore-fought battaile hee ouercame Marmodius and all his aſſociates in the field. Thus then as a Conquerour ouer all his enemies triumphantly after ten yeares wars abroad returned he to his owne Kingdome, neither puffed with pride, nor ſuffring his title to be enlarged according to his conqueſts: yet he was not neglectiue of regall ſtate, by the report of the Ligger booke of S. Albans, which ſaith, that in regard of his great prerogatiue, and not of any pride, he firſt inſtituted and commanded, that euen in times of peace alſo, himſelfe and his Succeſſors in the Crowne, ſhould at he paſſed through any Cities, haue Trumpetters going and ſounding before them, to ſhew that the perſon of the King ſhould breed both feare, and honor in all which either ſee him or heare him.

(9) Vnto King Charles of France he wrote in excuſe of his warres, and deſire of his amity; whom Charles againe congratulated with letters of gladnes, both for his victories, and the Chriſtian piety in his land embraced; deſiring of Offa ſafe conduct for ſuch his ſubiects, as came to his country in deuotion to God, and withall ſent to him, (for a preſent) a Booke of the Decrees of the ſecond Councell of Nice. Which Synodall Booke (to vſe Roger Houedens owne words) was ſent vnto King Charles from Conſtantinople, wherin (alas for pity) by the vnanimous aſſertion of three hundred Biſhops or more congregated in that Councell, were decreed many things inconuenient, yea and quite contrary to the true faith; as is moſt eſpecially the worſhipping of Images, which the Church of God doth vtterly deteſt. Againſt which Booke *Albinus wrote an Epiſtle, admirably ſtrengthned by the authority of the holy Scriptures, which together with the foreſaid Booke himſelfe preſented in the name of the Princes & Biſhops of this land, vnto the foreſaid Charles King of France. Such intercourſe both for State and Church had this great Offa with that great Charles.

(10) His laſt warres (according to mine Author) were againſt the Danes, whom he forced to their ſhips with the loſſe as well of their booties, as of many of their liues; and then (ſaith he) with the ſpirit of humility, both to recall himſelfe from the trace of blood, and to the better eſtabliſhment of his kingdomes peace, he ioined in affinity with his neighbour Princes, vpon whō he beſtowed his daughters in mariage.

(11) And making Egfrid his ſonne a King with himſelfe, in great deuotion went to Rome, where with the like zeale and example of Inas the weſt-Saxon, he made his Kingdome ſubiect to a Tribute, then called Peter-pence, afterwards Rom-Scot; beſides other rich gifts that he gaue to Pope Hadrian for canonizing Albane a Saint: in honour of whom, and in repentance of his ſinnes, at his returne (ouer againſt Verolanium, in the place then called Holmehurſt, where that Protomartyr of Britaine, for the conſtant profeſſion of Chriſt, loſt his head) Offa built a magnificke Monaſtery in Anno 795. indowing it with lands and rich reuenewes for the maintenance of an hundred Monks: vpon the firſt gate of entrance in ſtone ſtandeth cut a Salteir Argent in a field azure, & is aſſigned by the iudicious in Heraldry to bee the Armes that he bare.

(12) Alſo in teſtimony of his repentance for the bloud hee had ſpilt, he gaue the tenth part of all his goods vnto the Churchmen, and vnto the poore. At Bathe he alſo built another Monaſtery, and in Warwickſhire a Church, where the adioyning towne, from it and him, beareth the name off-church.

(13) Finally, when hee had raigned thirty nine yeares, he died in peace at his towne Off-ley the nine and twentieth of Iuly, the yeare of Chriſt Ieſus, ſeuen hundred ninety foure: and with great ſolemnity his body was buried without the towne of Bedford in a Chapell ſtanding vpon the Banke of Ouſe; which long ſince was ſwallowed vp by the ſame riuer: whoſe Tombe of lead (as it were ſome phantaſticall thing) appeareth often (ſaith Rouſe) to them that ſeek it not, but to them that ſeeke it, is altogether inuiſible.

His wife.

(14) Quendrid the wife of King Offa hath not her parentage ſet down by any of our Writers: notwithſtanding, the recorder of this his life, ſaith that her name was Drida, and that ſhee was the kinſwoman to Charles the Great King of France, and by him for ſome offence baniſhed his Realme, who arriuing vpon the coaſts of England in a ſhip without tackle, was taken thence, and relieued by Offa, being then a young Nobleman, where ſhee changed her name vnto Petronilla; with whom hee fell ſo farre in loue that hee made her his wife, contrary to the liking of his Parents. She was a woman of condition ambitious, couetous, and cruell, as appeared ſpecially in the death of Ethelbert, King of the Eaſt Angles, that came to her husbands Court to marry their daughter; whoſe port ſhee ſo much enuied, that ſhee procured him to bee treacherouſly murdered: the manner the foreſaid Author declared to be by his fall into a deepe pit, purpoſely made in his bed-chamber, and vnder his chaire of eſtate. That his head was cut off, and found by a blind-man, that the well which beares his name ſprung vp preſently in the place where it lay, that the bloud thereof gaue the blind man his ſight, and that Dryda died in the ſame pit which ſhe had digged for Ethelbert, I leaue to the credite of my author, and the liking of my Reader: but certaine it is that Gods vengeance followed this heynous fact within one yeare after the ſame was committed, by the death of her ſelfe, her husband, & her Sonne, and the tranſlation of that Kingdome from the Mercians to the Weſt-Saxons.

In the life of S. Albane, prefixed before the Ledger booke of that Abbey.

Offa affectioned to Quendred.

Quendred her trechery.

An ancient Saxon coine inſcribed with her name, CENEDRED REGIN. we haue found and here placed, which the iudicious ſuppoſe to be hers, and that not vnlikely, ſhee being ſo powerfull, proud and ambitious.

Quendred rewarded with the like paines.

His Iſſue.

(15) Egfrid the onely ſonne, and heire apparant of King Offa and Queene Quendred, was the onely ioy and pride of his parents, who ſucceeded his Father in his dominions and title, and in the ſame yeare alſo in the ſhades of death.

Egfrid the only ſon of Offa.

(16) Ethelburga, the eldeſt daughter of King Offa and Queene Quendred was maried to Brithrick the ſixeteenth King of the Weſt-Saxons: ſhee was a Lady of paſſing beautie, but withall of an inſolent diſpoſition, hating all whom her husband loued, and practiſing the deathes of them that ſhe hated. She departed into France after the poiſoning of her husband, & for that her offence, a law was enacted to the great preiudice of the Weſt-Saxons Queenes, as in the raigne of Brithrick we haue declared.

Ethelburga the firſt daughter.

Cap. 7. ſect. 16.

(17) Elfled, the ſecond daughter of King Offa, & Queene Quendred, by the report of Randulph Higden the Monke of Cheſter, was the ſecond wife to Ethelred King of Northumberland, who in regard of her had put from him his former wife, for which his ſubiects roſe in Armes againſt him, and ſlew him in the laſt yeare of King Offa his raigne.

Polychr. Elfled the ſecond daughter.

(18) Elfrid the third and yongeſt daughter of King Offa, and Queene Quendred, being promiſed in mariage, and aſſured vnto Ethelbert King of the Eaſt Angles, after the murther of her hoped Bridegroom, with great lamentations, and propheſying threats of reuenge, abandoned the ſociety of men, and withdrew herſelfe vnto the monaſtery of Crowland in the Fennes, Elfrid the third daughter.

Iohn Capgraue. (19) Fremund by Iohn Capgraue is ſuppoſed to be the ſonne of King Offa, who, as he ſaith, was traiterouſly murdered by one Oſwy that enuied his victories which he gat againſt the Danes: his body was buried at Offchurch in Warwickſhire, and neere vnto the Palace of Offa; alleadging for his Author one Burghard, who was at his death, and wrote his life; yet ſome there are that thinke him miſtaken, for that hee calleth him a young man, when as thoſe warres hapned an hundred yeares after King Offa his life. Burghard.

Egfrid.

EGFRID THE TVVELFTH KING OF THE MERCIANS, AND THE SEVENTEENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH.

CHAPTER XXIX.

An.Do.794. EGfrid, the ſonne of King Offa, ſucceeded his father in the Mercians Kingdom, wherof he was the twelfth in number, and in the Monarchy of the Engliſhmen, ranked in account the ſeuenteenth. He began his raigne the thirteenth day of Iuly, in the yeer of Chriſt his natiuity, ſeuen hundred ninety foure. The firſt buſineſſe that he vndertooke after hee came to the Crowne, was the reſtauration of antient priuiledges to the Church, which his father had depriued them of; and great hope was conceiued of his further proceedings, had not God cut him off by vntimely death. For hauing raigned onely foure moneths, hee gaue place vnto nature, and to another ſucceſſour, the ſins of the people deſeruing no ſuch Prince: for whoſe cauſe, and his fathers great bloudſhed, as Alcuine wrote to Osbertus, he was taken away ſo ſoone.

(2) He deceaſed the ſeuenth day of December, and in the firſt of his raigne, hauing had neither Wife nor Iſſue that we reade of. His body with all due obſequies was honourably buried in the Abbey Church of S. Albans, of his fathers foundation.

KENWOLFE

KENVVOLFE THE THIRTEENTH KING OF THE MERCIANS, AND THE EIGHTEENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN.

Monarch 18.

CHAPTER XXX.

Kenwolfe, not ſo neere in bloud to king Egfryd, as he was like him in all vertuous conditions, by him was ordained to ſucceed in his Dominions, whereby hee became the thirteenth King of the Mercians, and the eighteenth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, in the yeere of our Lord ſeuen hundred ninety ſeuen. At home he was an example of piety, peace, and religion, & ſet the ſcale of Iuſtice without reſpect to all alike; abroad temperate, humble, and courteous, without vain oſtentation or ambitious conceits: in warres hee was ſtout and victorious, in peace ſtudious to enrich his ſubiects: briefly, at all times ſo carrying himſelfe, that enuie could not touch him with her tongue.

Do.794.

(2) Whether vpon a new quarrell begun, or the old retained, (as inheritable to the Mercians againſt thoſe of Kent) I cannot ſay; but true it is, that in the entrance of his raigne, he entred that Prouince with a great hoſt of men, and in a ſore fought field diſcomfited the Kentiſh, and carried away priſoner their King, whoſe ſirname was Pren. His kingdome hee gaue to Cuthred, and kept him captiue in Mercia, to his great griefe, and his ſubiects diſhonour.

(3) But Kenwolfe in peace, & minding the works of true piety, gaue himſelf to the building of a goodly Church at Winchcombe in Gloceſterſhire; where vpō the day of dedication in the preſence of Cuthred (aſſigned his Viceroy in Kent) thirteene Biſhops, ten Dukes, many Nobles, and a great concourſe of people, he led Pren this Kentiſh captiue vp to the high Altar, and there without either his entreaty, or ranſome for Redemption, releaſed and ſet him free; ſhewing thereby his deuotion to God, and the heroicall parts of a magnanimous Prince.

(4) His raigne was twenty two yeares, and death in Anno eight hundred nineteene, beeing ſolemnely buried in the Church of the Monaſtery at Winchcombe aforeſaid which himſelfe had founded.

Kenwolfes burial.

His Wife.

(5) Elfryd, the wife of King Kenwolfe, hath not her parentage certainely reported by any of our Hiſtorians; yet ſome later vpon a likelihood of her name, the place and time agreeing, haue thought her to be the daughter of Offa, affianced to King Ethelbert, as hath beene ſaid: but in theſe obſcurities, conieCture may wander aſtray.

Elfrids parents vnknowne.

His Children.

(6) Kenelm the ſonne of King Kenwolfe, and of Queene Elfryde his wife, was very yong at his fathers death, and ſucceeded in the Mercians Kingdom, but not in the Monarchy of the Engliſh; King Egbert the Weſt-Saxon King then growne too great. And in the ſame yeare that he beganne his raigne, by the treaſon of his vnnaturall ſiſter hee was murthered, and firſt obſcurely buried, but afterwards ſolemnly remoued and repoſed neere to his Father in the Monaſtery of Winchcombe, as in the Mercian Kings ſucceſsions wee haue ſaid.

Kenelms death.

Chap.10. ſect.14.

(7) Quendred the eldeſt daughter of King Kenwolfe, and Lady Elfryd his Queene, after the deceaſe of her father, ambitiouſly aſpiring to compaſſe the ſway of the Mercian Kingdome wholy to her ſelfe, wickedly conſpired the death of her brother King Kenelme, which was traiterouſly acted by Askebert her inſtrument, who had the charge of him: but the ſame turning to her reproch, for very ſhame of ſo damnable a deed, ſhee within ſhort time after ended her life, but not her ignominie.

Quendred the eldeſt daughter of Kenwolfe.

(8) Burgenhild, the yonger daughter of King Kenwolfe, and of Queene Elfryd, hath not been ſo famous to poſterity as her ſiſter Quendred was for her infamous Act; notwithſtanding, ſhe may reaſonably be ſuppoſed to haue lead a better life, and to haue died a better death, eſpecially of vs, who find her not ſtained with any aſperſion of miſdeſeruing.

Burgenhild the younger daughter.

Egbert.

EGBERT THE EIGHTEENTH KING OF THE WEST-SAXONS, THE NINETEENTH, BVT FIRST SOLE AND ABSOLVTE MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN, HIS ACTS, WIFE, AND ISSVE.

CHAPTER XXXI.

An.Do.800.

THe Saxon Heptarchy drawing now to a period, the ſpring of an entire Monarchie began to ſhew it ſelfe, and the glory of the Engliſhmen more cleerely to ariſe: for thongh they had weakned each other by their own wars, yet ſtood their power ſtrong in the poſſeſsion of the whole, and the ouerborne Britaines held ſtill at the worſt.

(2) But ſuch is the diſpoſe of the ſole diſpoſer of Empires, that they haue their riſings, their fals, and their fals: neuer ſtaying in one and the ſame point, neither entailed to one and the ſame Nation, how ſtrong, politicke or populous ſoeuer. The proofe whereof is apparant in all the Kingdomes of the earth, and this of ours as mutable as any; whoſe change of State vnto, and in, this ſeuen-fold Gouernment hath hitherto beene ſeene: the ſeuerall Kings thereof long contending to branch their own fountaines furtheſt and faireſt, laſtly let them fall into one ſtreame, which ſo meeting, made a more famous confluence in this Monarchy, then the ſeauen heads of Nilus in the Egyptian Sea.

The ſeuen fold gouernment mutable.

(3) Formerly, the Kentiſh, South-Saxons, East-Angles, Northumbrians, and the Mercians, through no leſſe then eight deſcents had worne the Emperiall Diademe, whoſe rayes ſhone now ſo bright in the Weſt-Saxons eyes, that they againe ſought to reeſtate themſelues in ſo glorious a poſſeſsion. For, whereas Brightrik was poſſeſſed and contented with the Weſt-Saxon Crowne, neither that worne without iealouſie and feare; yet others of the bloud royall from Cherdik raiſed the wings of their ſoaring thoughts much higher, among whom Egbert was one, neither the laſt nor the leaſt in the opinion of the people, or ſuſpect of his Prince.

weſt-Saxons ambition.

(4) This Egbert hauing commaund of ſome part of that Prouince, ſo carried himſelfe, that his fame grew fearefull to Brightrik the King, and hatefull to the enuious Ethelburg his moſt proud Queene, by whom he was enforced firſt to ſecure himſelfe with the Mercian Offa; and laſtly conſtrained to flie into Fraunce: where vnder Charles the Great, he turned his aduerſity into an occaſion of his valour, by ſeruing in his warres, and learned by his politicke gouernment, how to rule a quiet or diſturbed State.

Egberts exile and relicts.

(5) But King Brightriks death acted, and his Queene the contriuer baniſhed, Egbert is ſolicited to the wearing of the Weſt-Saxon crowne, where hee became the eighteenth King in number, and nineteene yeares after the nineteenth Monarch of the Engliſhmen; entring his raigne the yeare of Chriſt Ieſus, eight hundreth, being the ſame yeare that Charles was made Emperour of the Weſt, and Conwall then ruling ouer the Scots.

Simeon Dunel. 801. Mat. Weſtm. ſaith 801.

(6) His firſt warres were againſt the Corniſh, and their aſſociats the Welſh, both of them a remnant of the old Britaines, who had beene oftentimes vanquiſhed, but neuer would ſeeme to be ſubdued, and for foureteene yeares continuance held ſide againſt Egbert; which their reſiſtance ſo prouoked his furie that hee enacted a moſt ſeuere law againſt them, commanding that no Britaine ſhould preſume to paſſe ouer great Offaes ditch, and preſent death to them that durſt ſet foot vpon any Engliſh ground. Their great Caer-legion (now Weſt-cheſter) hee tooke from them, and at London from their Weſt-gate caſt downe the braſen Image of Cadwallo there ſet vp by the Britaines for a terrour to the Saxons, as we haue ſaid.

John Brom. Chap.13.

(7) His warres thus proſpering, his puiſſance grew dreadfull, and his glory much enuied at by the other Princes, whereof Bernulfe of Mercia was the firſt attempter that ſought to plucke the wing of this weſt-Saxon Eagle, but thereby wrought his owne downefall; for Egbert ioyning battaile with him at Ellenden ouerthrew his power, and in that quarrell Bernulfe was laſtly ſlaine.

Chap.16.fol.

(8) Kent was the next, and faireſt marke in Egberts

berts eye, whose king not gratious in his own subiects sight, was the easiest to be subdued; him he chased ouer Thamisis, and added not onely that Countie, but also Sussex and Surrey, for Prouinces vnto his owne Kingdome: next were the East-Saxons, the East-Angles, and in truth all, both vpon the North, and the South of Humber gaue him obedience; so that the bounds of his Dominion were greatly enlarged, and his royall authority by those seuerall Kings acknowledged.

(9) Then hee to confirme his estate called an assembly vnto the City Winchester, where causing himselfe to bee solemnly crowned, became the first Saxons absolute Monarch of the whole Iland, so reducing the Monarchiall title from the Mercians to the West-Saxons, in whose Progeny it continued without reuersement vntill the Danes first got, and againe lost it, and the Saxons issue failing, the same fell to the Normans Duke by Conquest, as in continuance of our history, Christ assisting, shall be seene.

(10) His Coronation was at Winchester, and entrance in the yeare of Grace, eight hundred and nineteene, at which time by his Edict in that City dated, he caused all the South of the Iland to bee called England, according to the Angles, of whom himselfe came, and promising great felicity to his State and Successors, was therein not so happy as in his affaires he had beene fortunate.

(11) For those Saxons that by warre and blood, had made themselues Lords of other mens rights, and of one Kingdome no lesse then seuen, are now endangered to bee made seruants vnto subiection, and by warre and bloud their seuen-fold Kingdome brought againe vnto one; neither yet freed from the reuenge of bloodie violence: for that a fierce and cruell nation (the Danes) ceased not continually to inuade them, till they had subdued and set the crowne thereof vpon their owne heads, who in King Brightrick dayes, and about the yeere seuen hundred eighty seuen, hauing with three vessels landed in the West of England, at three seuerall times, in so many seuerall places, sought the ruine of the land in the raigne of this Egbert.

(12) The first was in his thirty third yeare, when with thirty fiue ships they landed at Lindisferne vpon the North of England, where they were met and fought with at Carham, but with such losse to the English, that two chiefe Captaines, Dudda and Osmond, two Bishops, Herefrid of Winchester, and Vigferd of Shirborne, with many Souldiers were therein slaine, King Egbert himselfe hardly escaping by the couert of the night.

(13) Their second attempt was in the second yeare following, when in West-Wales they landed, vnto whom the Britaines there ioyned, and in the place called Hengistenton abode the King in field, where Egbert with prosperous fortune vanquished and slew both the Danes and the Welsh.

(14) The third place of their arriuage was Sheepie in Kent, which Iland they sacked, and with much a doe were expelled in the last of King Egberts raign, and but the new beginning of their sauage cruelties.

(15) This Egbert by Florentius of Worcester is said to be the sonne of Alkemund, who was the sonne of Eafa, and he the sonne of Eoppa, the sonne of Ingils, the brother of Ine, the eleuenth King of the West-Saxons, and both of them the sonnes of Kenred, descended from Cherdik the first King of that Prouince: he was but low of stature, yet well composed and strong of limme, very valiant, wise and politicke, a skilfull souldier, and as great in mind, as fortunate in warre; he raigned ouer the West-Saxons the space of thirty six yeares and seuen monethes, and Monarch of the whole Iland seuenteene: his death hapned the fourth day of February, and yeare of Christs Incarnation eight hundred thirty six. The continuance of his raigne.

(16) His bodie was with all obsequies solemnly buried at Winchester, and his bones since taken vp, remaine with others in that Cities Cathedral Church, bestowed in Chests set vpon the Wall of each side the Quier, with these verses neither ancient, nor elegant, thereon inscribed:

Hic Rex Egbertus pausat cum Rege Kenulpho,
Nobis egregia munera vterque tulit.

His wife.

(17) Redburg, the wife of King Egbert, was the first of the West-Saxons, that by their new made law was depriued of title, authority, or place of a Queene; notwithstanding it seemeth shee bare a great stroke with her husband, in that Iohn Beuer the Monke of Westminster reporteth, that shee procured a law to be made against the Britains, the penalty whereof was present death for any of them to set footing within the realme of England, or to passe the Ditch that King Offa had made. Redburg cruelty.

His Issue.

(18) Ethelwolfe, the eldest sonne of King Egberi, and Lady Redburg his wife, was in his childhood committed to the charge of Helmestan Bishop of Winchester, vnder whom hee was carefully trayned vp in learning and vertue, who comming to mans estate proued also a perfect Souldier, and had the leading of his fathers power against Baldred King of Kent, whom he forced to flie ouer the Thamisis, and to abandon his Kingdome, which he subdued to the subiection of his father, and afterwards succeeded him in the Monarchy of the Englishmen. Ethelwolfe eldest sonne.

(19) Ethelstane, the younger sonne of King Egbert, and of the Lady Redburg his wife, was by his father deputed King ouer the Kentishmen, the South-Saxons, and the East-Saxons after hee had brought them vnto his subiection; which people hee most valiantly defended against the inuasions of the Danes, defeating their forces both by sea and land, and at Sandwich gaue them a most memorable ouerthrow, in the yeare of our Lord eight hundred fifty one, being the sixteenth of his brother King Ethelwolfes raigne; in whose time hee deceased, and is reported to haue left a sonne named Ostride, who by reason of his minority succeeded not in his fathers dominions, which Ethelbert the second sonne of King Ethelwolfe entred vpon, and being Monarch reunited these kingdomes inseparably vnto the Monarchy. Ethelstan yonger sonne.

(20) Edgith, commonly called Saint Edith the daughter of King Egbert, was in her childhood by her brother Ethelwolfe committed to the charge and bringing vp of a Lady in Ireland, greatly renowmed for her holinesse of life, named Modewine, by whom she was afterwards recommended to a Disciplesse of the said Lady, named Athea, and made Gouernesse of a Monastery of the Ladies, by her planted in a place which the King her brother had giuen her, called Pollesworth, situated in Arden in the north verge of the County of Warwicke, wherein she liued, died, and was honourably buried, and the place in regard of her afterwards called Saint Ediths of Pollesworth. Edgith a daughter.

Ethelwolfe.

ETHELVVOLFE THE NINTEENTH KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND THE TWENTIETH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN: HIS WARRES, ACTS, WIVES, AND CHILDREN.

CHAPTER XXXII.

An.Do.837.

Thelwolfe, the eldeſt ſonne of King Egbert, committed in his youth to the care of Helmeſtan Biſhop of Wincheſter, and by him vnto Swithun a famous learned Monke of that time, tooke ſuch a liking vnto the quiet and ſolitarie life, (onely enioyed by men of Religion, all other degrees moleſted to withſtand the intruding Danes) that he vndertooke the Monkiſh vow and profeſſion, and was made Deacon; ſhortly after which degree taken, Helmeſtan died, in whoſe place Prince Ethelwolfe was conſecrated, as Roger Houeden affirmeth, or at leaſt elected, (as Iohn Brampton Abbat of Iarnaux writeth) Biſhop of Wincheſter. But the death of his Father King Egbert immediately following, by great intreaty of the Nobles, and partly by conſtraint of the Clergy, hee was made King, and was by the authority of Pope Gregory the fourth, whoſe creature in both profeſsions he was, abſolued and diſcharged of his vowes.

Roger Houeden. Iohn Brampton. Henry Hunting. Mat. Weſtminſter.

(2) He entered his Monarchy the fourth day of February in the yeare of Chriſts Incarnation, eight hundred thirty ſeuen, and was the nineteenth King of the Weſt-Saxons, and the twentieth Monarch of the Engliſhmen. His Biſhopricke he gaue vnto Swithun his Tutor, and according to his place, combined all his powers to withſtand the dangerous Danes, that attempted the vtter ſubuerſion of his faire land: whoſe fift inuaſion in his firſt yeare happened; which drew the Saxons ciuill warres vnto a conſtrained peace, hauing more then they could well doe to defend their liues from their ſlaughtering ſwords, or to ſaue their vniuſtly gotten land from the ſpoiles of thoſe common enemies; who, not like Conquerors, but deſtroying Caterpillers, left nothing vndeuoured whereſoeuer they came, and had now begunne their mercileſſe depopulations in diuers places at once, ſo that the diſtracted Engliſh were to ſeeke where was moſt need firſt to withſtand.

Wil. Malmib.

(3) At Hampton & Porteſmouth many of theſe Norway Pirates had entred; at Hampton with their ouerthrow, at Porteſmouth with victory; and the ſame time at Carrum, a Troupe of theſe Danes diſcomfited King Ethelwolfes power. The next yeare at Merſeware, Lindſey, in Eaſt-Angle, and Kent, they did much miſchiefe, and harried all the Country before them: yet in his tenth yeare at Pedredeſmouth, the Sommerſet and Dorſetſhire men gaue them a memorable ouerthrow, vnder the conduct of Earle Enwulfe, Biſhop Adelſtan, and Oſred their captaines.

Simeon Dunel. Henry Hunt. An.Dom.851.

(4) But in the ſixteenth yeare of this King, the great Planet Mars ſeemed to prædominate continually, and Fortune to caſt the chance of victory euer on his ſide: for two hundred and fifty ſhips, (ſome reckon a hundred more) entred into Thameſis mouth and ſet on ſhore an infinite number of theſe deſtroying Danes. London and Canterbury they had ſacked and left waſt, had pierced into Mercia, and chaſed Berthulfe their King out of his Country, and now in Southery had pitched their battle, as able and reſolute to abide all the power of the Engliſh, whither King Ethelwolfe with his ſonne prince Ethelbald repaired, and tooke the field at the place called Otley; wherein after a long and ſore fight, the victory fell to the Engliſh, with ſuch ſlaughter of theſe Norway inuaders, as is incredible to report, and the ſame held as great and famous, as euer had hapned in the land before.

Henry Hunt. Artdus Flor.

(5) With the like ſucceſſe his Brother Athelſtan King of Kent, fought with the Danes at Sandwich, where chaſing them to ſea, tooke nine of their ſhips; and in Deuonſhire, Earle Ceorle at Winleſbore ſo ouerthrew their whole power, that in deſpaire they withdrew themſelues into the Ile of Thanet, where they made their abode all the winter ſeaſon; and if deſtiny had not withſtood the Engliſh, the Danes had beene expulſed for euer. But the Saxons ſeeming seeming cleared of this common enemy, fell to their wonted quarrels with the euer depressed Britaines; against whom Burthred the Mercian obtained the assistance of King Ethelwolfe in his eighteenth yeare, whose daughter Ethelswith hee had obtained in mariage; whereby for a while was encreased the fame and power of that valiant, but vnfortunate King.

(6) In this State the affaires of the land stood vnto the nineteenth yeare of King Ethelwolfes raigne, who now remembring his former Ecclesiasticke profession, ordained that Tithes and Lands due to holy Church should bee free from all Tributes or Regall seruices; and in great deuotion went himselfe to Rome, where hee was both honourably receiued, and entertained the space of a whole yeare; in which time hee new built the English Schoole, that Offa the Mercian before had there founded, and lately was fired, bearing the name of Thomas the Holy; confirming also his Grant of Peter pence, and further couenanting in lieu of his kind entertainement to pay yeerely three hundred markes to Rome, thus to bee emploied; one hundred to Saint Peters Church, an other hundred to Saint Pauls Light, and the third to the Pope: the Bride that euermore must be kissed and largely paid.

(7) His returne from Rome was through France, and being a Widower, hee there married Iudith the most beautifull daughter of Charles the Bald then Emperour; in honour of whom in his owne Court, he euer placed her in a Chaire of Estate, with all other maiesticall complements of a Queene, contrary to the law of the West-Saxons for Ethelburgaes offence, formerly made. Which his doing so disliked the Nobles, that Prince Ethelbald his eldest Sonne, Adelstan Bishop of Shirborne, and Enwulfe Earle of Somerset, rose vp rebelliously in Armes and sought to depose him; yet by mediation of friends, the matter came to a comprimize, and the land to be diuided betwixt the Father and Sonne, but with such partiality that the better part west-ward was allotted to Ethelbald: which vnequality gaue great suspition, that this reuolt was rather grounded vpon ambition, then any inclination they had for the defence of their lawes, which commonly is the pretence and vaile for all disloiall attempts of seditious subiects against their soueraigne Lords.

(8) Howsoeuer it was, long after this he liued not, but left his Monarchy vnto his eldest sonne Ethelbald: and by will appointed Ethelbert his second, to be King of Kent and Essex, which countries he had conquered. He raigned twenty yeares, one moneth, and nine dayes, and deceased at a place called Stamrige, the thirteenth day of Ianuary, in the yeare of our Lord, eight hundred fifty seauen, being the twenty one of his Raign. His body was first buried at the place of his decease, and afterwards remoued into the Cathedrall Church at Wincheſter.

(9) Osburg, the first wife of King Ethelwolfe, was the daughter of a Nobleman named Oslake, who had the office of Great Butler of England, and was descended of the stocke of Stuffe and Withgar two brethren, being noblemē of the people called Iutes, who were the first Princes of the Ile of Wight, and Nephewes to Cherdik, and cosen germans to Kenrik the first and second Kings of the West-Saxons, and the third and fourth Monarchs of the Englishmen. She was the second Kings wife that was debarred of the title and place of Queene. Shee deceased three years before the King her husband, in the nineteenth yeare of his raigne, being the yeare of Christs Natiuity eight hundred fifty fiue.

(10) Iudith his second wife, was the daughter of Charles the Emperour, and King of France, as wee haue said: her Mother was Queene Ermentrude, the daughter of Vodon Earle of Orluance. She was a Lady of passing beauty, and marryed to this King in France; and when she came into England was receiued with the title and place of a Queene, in abolishment of the peruerse law of the VVest-Saxons, made against the Kings VViues, as before was touched. She was his wife three yeares, and suruiued him without any issue.

His Issue.

(11) Ethelbald, the eldest sonne of King Ethelwolfe, and of Lady Osburg his first wife, was brought vp in his youth in the exercise of warre, and serued vnder his Father in the great victory obtained against the Danes at Ocley in Surrey, in the yeare eight hundred fifty one: afterwards hee turned his force against his Father; and at his returne from Rome, practised to defeat him of his Kingdome, and was ready to haue giuen him battaile, had not his Father parted with him his Dominion. Ethelbald the first Sonne.

(12) Ethelbert, the second son of King Ethelwolfe and Lady Osburg his first wife, was in the life time of his Father, after the decease of his vncle Ethelstan, appointed and placed his Successor in his Kingdome ouer the South-Saxons, the Kentish, and the East-Saxons, without any mention or meaning (as it seemeth,) that hee should intermeddle further with any other part of England. Notwithstanding after the death of his brother Ethelbald, it was generally holden of all men for law, equity, and reason, that he should succeed him in the Monarchy: and so he did, with the consent of his Brethren, and without resistance, or contradiction of any other. Ethelbert the second sonne.

(13) Ethelred the third sonne of King Ethelwolfe, and Lady Osburg his first wife, had by the disposition of his Father in his last will, the one halfe of his Fathers proper inheritance; which was all such land as King Egbert his Grandfather had before hee was King, and was no part of the Demaines of the Kingdome, and this was diuided betwixt him and his brother Elfred, as the kingdome was betweene their elder Brethren Ethelbald and Ethelbert: with an intent that this Ethelred should succeed his brother Ethelbald in the kingdome of the West-Saxons; notwithstanding, his brother Ethelbert, after the decease of King Ethelbald, entred into the other part, adioining it to his former kingdome, and was king of the whole, and after left it entire to this Ethelred, who succeeded him in the Monarchy. Ethelred a third sonne.

(14) Elfred, the fourth sonne of King Ethelwolfe and of Lady Osburg his first wife, was borne at Wantage in Barkeshire, in the yeare of our Lord God, eight hundred forty nine; and the thirteenth of his fathers raign. Being a child of fiue yeeres old, he was sent very honourably attended to the City of Rome, where Leo the fourth then Bishoppe confirmed him, was his Godfather at the confirmation, and annointed him to the expectation of a kingdome: growne in yeares, hee grew so in discretion, magnanimity and fauour of all men, that in the succesiue raignes of his three elder Brethren, he ruled as a Vice-roy or secondary king vnder euery of them, and after them at the last succeeded in the English Monarchy. Elfred a fourth sonne.

(15) Ethelswith, the daughter of King Ethelwolfe and Lady Osburg, was maried to Burthred the twentieth King of Mercia, which mariage was solemnized at the towne of Chippinham in wiltshire, in the moneth of Aprill, and yeare of Christs Natiuity eight hundred thirty fiue, and the fifteenth of her fathers raigne: but within twenty two years after, they were both forced by the Danes to abandon their kingdom, and departed into Italy, where the King died the same yeare in the English Colledge at Rome: shee liued after him fifteene yeares in the habite of a Nunne, at the City of Padua, and there died, and was honourably buried in the yeare of our Lord God eight hundred eighty nine, which was the eighteenth yeare of her brother King Elfreds raigne. Ethelswith a daughter.

(16) Neote, supposed by Iohn Capgraue the Legend writer, to be the sonne of King Ethelwolfe, was in his youth brought vp at Glastenbery vnder Dunstan, who was afterward Archbishop of Canterbury. He proued a man of great learning, and was one of the first Readers of Diuinity in the Vniuersity of Oxford, at the Neote a supposed sonne.

foundation, or as ſome will haue it, the reſtauration thereof by King Elfred; hee planted a Monaſtery in Cornwall, whereunto hee vſed for deuotion and ſtudious meditations often to withdraw himſelfe, which of his abode there, was afterward called Neoteſtoke; and when he was dead, his body was with great honour enterred in the County of Huntingdon, at a place then called Anulfesbery, and afterward in regard of his enterment, Saint Neotes, and now Saint Needes.

ETHELBALD THE TVVENTIETH KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND THE TWENTIE ONE MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS ACTS AND RAIGNE.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

An.Do.847. Floren. Wigorn.

Thelbald, the eldeſt ſonne of king Ethelwolfe, hauing had part of the kingdome in the life time of his Father, after his death entred vpon the whole, and was the twentieth King of the Weſt Saxons, and the twenty one Monarch of the Engliſhmen, beginning his raigne in the yeere of Chriſts incarnation eight hundred fiftie ſeuen.

His wars againſt the Danes.

(2) His youth he had ſpent in the exerciſe of war, hauing made proofe of valour in his ſeruice againſt the Danes in many battels; and likewiſe attempted (though not in ſo good a cauſe) to haue fought againſt his owne father. Which his aſſaies, as they ſeemed violent and vnnaturall, yet being in the quarrell of the Weſt-Saxons law, enacted in preiudice of their Queenes, he was both ſided and approued, as hath been ſaid.

Wil. Malmsbury.

(3) But howſoeuer vnwilling he was this faire Queene ſhould ſit in ſtate by his fathers ſide, yet contrary to all lawes either of God or man, hee laid her by his owne, and by nuptiall rites, brought her to his ſinfull and inceſtuous bed. Which act, though foule enough, ſome haue made worſe, in reporting his Wife to be his owne Mother, whom King Ethelwolfe kept for his Concubine. And ſurely this his ſin was not long vnpuniſhed by the ſhortneſſe of his raigne and life, leauing no other memory of his acts, beſides this foule blot to his faire name.

The time of his raigning.

(4) His raigne was onely two yeeres and an halfe, and death chanced vpon the twentieth day of December, the yeere of Chriſts aſſuming our fleſh, eight hundred ſixtie. His body was firſt buried at Shirburne in the County of Dorſet, where at that time was the Cathedrall Church and Epiſcopall See; but afterwards was remoued and enterred at Salesbury, in the County of Wiltſhire.

His Wife.

(5) Iudith, the Wife of King Ethelbald, was the widow of his owne Father, a moſt vnlawfull matrimonie contracted againſt all law of God or of nature; which being both diſſolued and puniſhed by the haſtie death of the King, and ſhe returning towards her father and Country in Flanders, was rauiſhed by Baldwin the Foreſter of Arden in France, and by him forcibly kept vntill ſhee conſented to become his wife, who in regard of that marriage, when he was reconciled to the Emperor Charles her Father, was by him created the firſt Earle of Flanders, by whom ſhe had iſſue Baldwin the ſecond, who eſpouſed Lady Elfrid, the youngeſt daughter of Elfred King of England, from whom, through fiue deſcents lineally, Maud Queene of England, Wife to William the Conquerour deſcended, and from her, all our Norman Engliſh Kings vnto this day.

ONE KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND THE TWO AND TWENTIETH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN: HIS RAIGNE AND ISSVES.

CHAPTER XXXIIII.

ETHELBERT, the ſecond ſonne of King Ethelwolfe, who had ſucceeded his Vnckle Ethelſtan in the kingdome of the South-Saxons, Kentiſh, and Eaſt-Saxons, and for fiue yeeres continuance, ruled thoſe Countries with great equity and valour, after the deceaſe of his brother Ethelbald, ſucceeded him alſo both in the weſt-Saxons kingdome, and the whole Lands Monarchie: whereof he was the one and twentieth King, and the two and twentieth Monarch.

An. Do. 860.

(2) His raigne began in the yeere after Chriſts natiuity, eight hundred and ſixtie, and was diſquieted from firſt to laſt by the inuaſions of the bloudy Danes. For preſently after his coronation, theſe common enemies entred the Land, ruinating all before them vnto the Citie Wincheſter, which they ſacked, and left it troden vnder their deſtroying feete, euen to the ground. But in their returne were encountred by the Barkſhire-men, vnder the leading of Oſrick, Earle of Hampton, by whom they were vanquiſhed, the prey recouered, and a great number of thoſe Infidels ſlaine.

(3) In his firſt yeere alſo a nauie of Danes and Normans entred into the Iland Tanet, and began their wonted ſpoiles among thoſe people: whereupon the Kentiſh compounded their peace for a great ſum of money giuen. Notwithſtanding theſe miſcreants, which knew not God, gaue little regard to their promiſed couenants, and before the daies of truce were expired, like a ſudden floud ouer-bare all before them. Theſe their irruptions to withſtand, the Kentiſh then prepared, rather aduenturing themſelues vpon the chance of battell, then to reſt vpon a ſeeming truce, wherein their deſtruction was too apparant, and forthwith aſſembling all the powers together, ſet vpon thoſe truce-breakers, and with much ſlaughter forced them at length out of their Country.

(4) But the date of King Ethelberts life being expired, hee yeelded his body to the courſe of nature, and his Kingdomes to his next Brother, after he had raigned ouer the Kentiſh, South, and Eaſt-Saxons, the terme of ten yeeres, and had ſate Monarch of the whole onely fiue. He died the yeere of grace eight hundred ſixty ſix, and was honourably buried in the Cathedrall Church of Shirburne in Dorſet-ſhire, by his brother King Ethelbald.

Ethelberts time of raigning.

His ſuppoſed Iſſue.

(5) Athelm, the brothers ſonne of King Elfred, mentioned in the laſt will and teſtament of the ſame King, ſeemeth by all likelihood to be the eldeſt ſon of this King Ethelbert, elder brother to the ſame King Elfred, although hee ſucceeded not his father in his Kingdome. For in thoſe daies, if the Kings ſonne were vnder age, the ſucceſsion went to the next brother; and if that brother left his ſonne at full age, then it went vnto him; otherwiſe it reuerted to the elder brothers ſonne.

Athelm the eldeſt ſonne.

(6) Ethelwald, ſurnamed Clito, which is a word of addition giuen to all the Saxon Kings ſonnes of England, is mentioned in King Elfreds wil to be his brothers ſonne, and is moſt likely to be the ſonne of this King Ethelbert, he prooued a moſt deadly enemy to his coſen King Edward, the ſonne of King Elfrid his Vncle, deſtroying his townes in Dorſet-ſhire, and being driuen out of England, ioined himſelfe with the Danes, who made him their King in Northumberland; and vnder his leading, greeuouſly aſſailed the Countries of the Eaſt-Saxons, Eaſt-Angles, and Mertians; wherein hee was laſtly ſlaine, the yeere of our Lord nine hundred and fiue, being the fourth of King Edward his coſen-germanes raigne.

Ethelwald the ſecond ſonne.

ETHELRED THE TVVO AND TVVENTIETH KING OF THE WEST.

SAXONS, AND THE TWENTY THIRD MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN, HIS ACTS, AND ISSVE.

Monarch 2

CHAPTER XXXV.

An.Do.866.

ETHELRED, the third ſonne of King Ethelwolfe, after the deceaſe of his Brother ſucceeded him in his Dominions, and was in number the two and twentieth King of the Weſt-Saxons, and the twenty third Monarch of the Engliſhmen; he beganne his raigne in the yeare of our ſaluation eight hundred ſixty and ſix, and for the time that hee was King, raigned in continuall warres againſt the Pagan Danes, whoſe numbers now were greater, and footing ſurer in this land then formerly had beene.

Hungar and Hubba.

(2) In the firſt yeare of his raigne, there arriued vpon the Engliſh coaſts a huge Army of theſe Danes, whereof Hungar and Hubba, men of incredible ſtrength and cruelty, were the Captaines: Theſe wintred in Eaſt Anglia, made truce with the inhabitants vpon certaine conditions, and forbare a time from their wonted rauening.

(3) But in the next yeare the King being buſied to put backe a freſh inrode of Danes in the South and Weſt of the Iland then entred; theſe deuourers tooke aduantage vpon the ciuil broiles commenced among the Northumbrians, who in theſe turmoiled times ſought to withdraw their ſubiections from the Weſt Saxons, and to ſet vp Kings againe of their owne.

The Danes march Northward.

The foreſaid Captaines Hungar and Hubba, hauing in time of their truce ſtrengthned themſelues with new ſupplies of aid, marched further into the North, where finding the people vnprouided of ſtrength, and the two Kings Osbright and Ella of reconciled enemies to be made no ſure friends, they harried the Country before them, and entring Yorke ſlew the two Kings, with infinit number of the Engliſh; which City they conſumed with fire, and burnt therein all thoſe that had fled thither for ſuccour.

(4) The State thus ſtanding, and their forces encreaſing euery day, brought new feares vpon the inhabitants, when euery late victory with increaſe of Captiues and rich ſpoiles, miniſtred occaſion & meanes of ſome other conqueſt to follow; which theſe Pagans ſo purſued, till laſtly they ſet a ſubſtitute King to raigne vnder them, ouer all the North Borders beyond the riuer Tyne; and ſo retiring themſelues out of Northumberland into Mercia, came to Nottingham, which City they wanne, and therein wintred the third of King Ethelreds raigne, who with the aid of Burthred the Mercian King, conſtrained the Danes to ſue for peace, and a ſafe departure, yeelding the City, and againe retyring themſelues ouer Tyne, remained in Yorke all the next winter. Ingulphus.

(5) The Summers opportunity approching, their wonted deſire for ſpoile was with it encreaſed, and to cut off long trauell theſe Danes by boates paſſed Humber, where Hungar and Hubba beganne with fire and ſword to lay all waſt before them, ſparing neither Perſon, ſexe nor age. The places reſpected for publike good, and ſacred Temples conſecrated onely to God, which all other Tyrants haue forborne, theſe ſauage men as the earths deſtroiers caſt downe and trampled vnder their prophane feete: among which for note were the goodly Monaſteries of Bradney, Crowland, Peterborow, Ely, and Huntington, all laid in leuell with the ground, and their Votaries, aſwell the Nunnes as the Monkes, murthered with their vnhumane and mercileſſe ſwords; to auoid whoſe barbarous pollutions, the chaſt Nunnes of Coldingham deformed themſelues to their laſciuious eyes, by cutting off their vpper lips and noſes; but to euerlaſting remembrance they remain moſt faire, and well beſeeming faces of pure Virgins. Flores Hiſtr.

(6) Theſe Pagans piercing further into the land, came into the territories of the Eaſt-Angles, wherein holy Edmund raigned King, whoſe Martyrdome in moſt cruell manner they wrought, he conſtantly calling vpon the name of Chriſt, whereof wee haue already ready ſpoken; and ſhall bee occaſioned hereafter to ſpeake.

(7) But in the laſt yeare of this Kings raign, their raging power was moſt great: for with a new ſupply two Daniſh Kings Sreeg, and Halden, entred into Weſt-Saxia, and at Reading the Kings towne intrenched themſelues: theſe forraging the Country, were encountred with at Engleſield by Ethelwolfe Earle of Barkeſhire, and his men; who in skirmiſh ſlew one of their leaders, and chaſed the reſt backe to their Trench.

(8) Theſe Danes fearing leſt delaies would proue dangerous, and knowing that the firſt ſucceſſe is commonly ſeconded with further courage of hope; foure dayes after ſhewed themſelues in field ready to fight: their hoaſt they diuided into two battalians; whereof the one was guided by two of their Kings and certaine Earles were leaders of the other; which when the Engliſh perceiued, they alſo diuided theirs, whereof King Ethelred had the leading of the firſt, and Elfred his brother was Generall of the ſecond; the place was Aſſendon, where their Tents were pitched, and the day approached for battaile: King Ethelred in his Tent ſtaid ſo long in praiers that Elfred vpon a forward courage haſted to encounter the enemy, and that with a moſt fierce and ſharpe fight, wherein hauing ſpent the moſt of their ſtrengthes, and ready to decline, and giue backe: Ethelred manfully entred the battaile, and ſo ſeconded his brother, and ouer-tyred Souldiers, that hee made way by dint of his ſword through the thickeſt of their almoſt-conquering enemies, and with ſuch loſſe of the Daniſh bloud, drawne from the ſides of one of their Kings, fiue Earles, and an infinite number of the common Souldiers, that the ſtreames thereof ſeemed as an ouer-ſwelling tide, altogether to couer the face of the field, and is accounted for the nobleſt victory that the Engliſh till then had gotten of the Danes.

(9) Yet were not theſe Pagans therewith diſcouraged, but gathering more ſtrengthes and ſupplies from other parts; foureteen dayes after, made head againe againſt the Engliſh, and pitching downe their ſtandards at Baſing, abode the cõming of Ethelred and triall of battaile, wherein ſucceſſe was altogether altered; for herein the Kings part was diſcomfited, and the Danes the winners of the day.

(10) Thus both ſides borne vpon rage & hope, in their heat of bloud prepare for new fight. The Danes power was augmented with a further ſupply ſent from beyond Seas, and the Engliſh confirmed with hope of ſucceſſe: Theſe meeting at Merton (two moneths after the battaile of Baſing) encountred each others both boldly and bloodily; wherein at firſt the Engliſh preuailed, and the Danes were chaſed; but their numbers the greater, and freſh ſupply maintaining their battaile, they recouered themſelues, and wonne the day; wherein King Ethelred receiued his deaths wound, with ſuch ſlaughter of his people, that little wanted the end of all encounters; to haue been afterwards attempted any more by the Engliſh. Paldon. Vita.

(11) Great was the valour and reſiſtance of this King; for in his ſhort time of Raigne, as Writers record, no leſſe then nine ſet battales againſt the Danes he fought in one yeare, to the great effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, and to no little loſſe of the Daniſh power; for in his raign fell of them one King, nine Earles, and of the common ſort without number. Will. Malmſb.

(12) He died at Wittingham of his wound receiued the three and twentieth day of April, in the yeare of our Lord God eight hundred ſeauenty two, and was buried in the Collegiat Church of Winburne in Dorcetſhire, where remaines his Tombe and his Armes vnto this day, with this Inſcription: Scala Chron. Marian. Scot.

In hoc loco quieſcit corpus Sancti Ethelredi Regis Weſt-Saxonum Martyris, qui Anno Domini 872. 23. die Aprilis, per manus Dacorum Paganorum occubuit.

His Iſſue.

Elfred, the eldeſt ſonne of King Ethelred ſeemeth to be Grandfather to the noble and learned Ethelward, who being Kinſman, Counſellor and Treaſurer to King Edgar; wrote an hiſtory of his Country, beginning at the firſt arriuall of the Saxons into England, and continuing vnto his own time: which hiſtory he dedicated to his kinſwoman, and coſen germane the Lady Maude Abbeſſe of Quedlingburg in Saxonie, being the daughter of the Emperour Otho, by Edgith his wife, daughter of King Edward the elder, and ſiſter of Ethelſtane, and Edmund Kings of England. Elfred the eldeſt ſonne. The Abbeſſe of Quedlingburg.

Oſwald, a young ſonne of King Ethelred, is mentioned in a Charter of his Fathers, by which he gaue lands to the Monaſtery of Abingdon neere Oxford; and to which this ſonne of his hath his name ſet downe for a witnes; which Charter is yet extant, recorded in a great Legier-booke, and Regiſter of the Euidences of the lands ſometime belonging to the ſaid Monaſtery. Oſwald a yonger ſonne.

Thyre, the daughter of King Ethelred, is reported by the hiſtories of Ireland to bee married to Gormon King of the Danes, and to haue had iſſue King Harald, which Harald, by Queene Gonhild his wife, had iſſue; Sweyn king of Denmarke, Iringe king of Northumberland, and Gonhild Queene of North-Wales. King Sweyn by Queene Sigred his wife, had iſſue Cnute King of England and Denmarke, Oſtryde wife of Duke Wolfe, and mother of King Sweyn the yonger, and Thyre the firſt wife of Earle Goodwin of Kent. CHAPTER XXXVI.

Mariannus. Florentius.

ELfred, or Alfred, the fourth ſonne of King Ethelwolfe, though he had beene annointed King at Rome by Pope Leo in his young years & Fathers life time; yet raigned he in no part of his dominions, before the deathes of all his Brethren, vnder whom hee ſerued in moſt of their warres, aſſiſting them likewiſe in all their counſels: the land now miſerably torne by the cruell incurſions of the bloudy Danes, was left vnto him, both to redeeme, and to raigne ouer, by the death and Teſtament of King Ethelred his laſt brother.

(2) Hee beganne his raigne in the yeare of his age twenty two, and of our Lord God eight hundred ſeuenty two, being crowned in the City of Wincheſter, the twenty third King of the Weſt-Saxons, and the twenty foure Monarch of the Engliſhmen: but of ſome Hiſtorians he is famouſed by the ſtile of the firſt abſolute Monarch.

Aſſer.

(3) His raigne beganne with troubles and wars in defence of the land which the Pagan Danes intended to deſtroy; and though his powers were ſmal, yet was he forced into the field within one month after his Coronation; the place was Wilton in the County of Wiltſhire, on the ſouth-banke of the riuer Wily: where the Danes at firſt gaue backe and fled: but ſeeing the fewnes of their purſuers, reenforced their battle, and got the field, with whom the Weſt-Saxons entred league, and compounded for their departure from among them.

Speculum hiſt. Ricardus Corenceſtrencis.

(4) Theſe Rouers then with their aſſociates at Reading, got themſelues into London, where they wintred; with whom the Mercians likewiſe compoũded for their peace, which proued ſhortly to be the deſtruction of their princely bloud; and laſtly, the lands ſubuerſion to a forraine nation. For the Danes hauing got footing in the North, the Weſt, and the South of this land, (vnto whoſe aide many new-come gueſts from their Eaſterne countries were arriued, vnder the leading of other three Kings, Gurthrun, Esketel, and Ammond) all together ſet their griping tallents with ſuch faſt hold vpon Mercia, that at Rependon they conſtrained Burthred the King with his Queene Elſwith out of the land, and in his ſtead placed a King of their owne choiſe, vpon condition to deliuer vp the ſame againe vnto them when they would demaund it.

Mat.Weſt.

Polychron.lib.5.

(5) In the fourth yeare of King Elfred their armies diuided themſelues into two parts, the one of them guided by King Halden, returned into Northumberland; where hee beſtowed that Country among his followers, and therein remained for two yeares continuance, doing much harmes both to the Engliſh and Pictſ. The other part led by the laſt new-come King, came to Granabridge, whence they wintered and ſpoiled the Country, and there ſpreading themſelues as Graſhoppers vpon the face of the earth, eate vp all where they came; ſo that King Elfred was enforced to compound for their departure out of his owne kingdome in Weſt-Saxia; to which couenants they promiſed and ſwore; yet contrary to both tooke into Deuonſhire, and wintred at Exceſter, vnto whom a further ſupply by ſea ſought to ioine themſelues, but met with ſuch boiſterous blaſts, that one hundred and twenty of their ſhips were caſt away by tempeſt at Swanwicke vpon our coaſts, and their land-army marching towards Exceſter, were there welcommed with ſo ſharpe an encounter by King Elfred, that they gaue him both pledges and oath to depart with all ſpeed.

(6) But Fortune euer dallying with them, whom ſhee meanes to down-caſt, ſet the chance of loſſe preſently ſently vpon the Saxons ſide: for now the three Kings Gurthrun, Esketel, and Ammond thought it not good to let Elfred thus reſt, and thereupon drew their forces weſtwards towards him, where at Chipingham (a Mannor of his) they wintred, and compelled th Weſt-Saxons there, either to yeeld, or to forſake the Country.

(7) King Elfred therefore, with ſuch ſtrength as he had, haſted towards them, and ſeuenteene miles from Briſtow pitched downe his tents euen in the face of the enemy; where betwixt theſe fierce nations a great battaile was fought, to the infinite loſſe of bloud on both ſides, and that vpon ſuch equall departure, as neither could challenge to bee maſters of the field; yet the report went, that King Elfred was diſcomfited, which turned greatly to his aduantage; for thereupon many of the Engliſh haſted to his ſuccour, leſt the ouerthrow of him ſhould be the bane of them all; his ſtrengthes thus renued with an vnexpected ſupply, no time was detracted to ſtay the Daniſh rage, who were now returned further into the heart of the land, and at Abington by Oxford had pitched their ſtandreds for fight.

(8) Thither the Engliſh repaired, and the next morning he ordered his Army; neither were the enemies vnprepared, but with braues ſtood ready to receiue the encounter. The battaile ioyned, continued with ſuch loſſe of bloud, that it is accounted one of the ſoreſt that euer betwixt them before had beene fought, and onely parted by the approch of the night, neither party challenging the honor of the day, the loſſe being ſo great vpon both ſides.

Seuen of theſe battailes are reported to be fought in that yeare, whereby both their ſtrengthes were much abated, and their ſpilt bloud ſo cooled their liuers; that laſtly they concluded vpon a peace; one article was this, that the Danes ſhould admit no more of their nation to arriue in this Iland: but how ſoone that was broken, the ſequels did ſhew.

(9) For in the yeare eight hundred ſeuenty ſixe, (ſaith Simon Dunelmenſis) Rollo a nobleman of Denmarke with a great Army entred into England, with no leſſe ſpoile and deſtruction then other of thoſe Danes before him had done, notwithſtanding the truce: with whom King Elfred met, and gaue him ſo hoat welcome, that hee liked not greatly his entertainement; and being warned (forſooth) in his ſleepe, that better fortune attended him in France, hee left his countrimen to tugge with the Engliſh.

(10) The Danes then accounting the peace to be broken, like Bees from the Hiue, infect all the land, inſomuch that this vndaunted King Elfred was ofttimes brought to ſuch extremities, that he hid himſelfe out of ſight, and in the Fens & Marſh grounds was forced with ſuch ſmall companies as he had, to liue by fiſhing, fowling, and hunting of wild beaſts for his food, hauing no more of his great Monarchy left him, but Somerſet, Hamton, and Wiltſhires only, neither yet them free from the incurſions of the Danes.

(11) The ſolitary place of his moſt reſidency, was an Iland incloſed with the two riuers Thone and Parret, at their meeting in the County of Sommerſet, commonly called Edelingſey, where he in very poore attire diſguiſed, was entertained into a Cowheards houſe (if not into his ſeruice,) where on a time as he ſate by the fire in trimming of his bow and ſhafts, a cake of dow baking vpon the hearth before him, chanced to burn; the Cowheardeſſe comming in, and ſeeing him mind more his bow then his bread, in a great fury caſt away both his bow and arrowes, and checking him as her Groom, ſaid, Thou fellow, doeſt thou ſee the bread burne before thy face, and wilt not turne it? and yet art thou glad to eate it before it bee halfe baked? little ſuſpecting him to be the man that had beene ſerued with more delicate cates.

(12) But this Prince, the very mirrour of Princes, more minding the wealth of his ſubiects, then the maieſty of State, diſguiſed himſelfe in the habite of a common Minſtrell, and in perſon repaired to the Danes Campe, who lay like Senacheribs, wallowing in wantonneſſe, and ſecure in their owne conceit from impeach of danger; which Elfred a moſt skilfull Muſitian, and an excellent Poet, did not a little egge on by his ſweet muſicke, and ſongs of their valour; ſo that he was ſuffered to paſſe vncontrolled into the company of their Princes, at banquets, or elſe where: whereby he both ſaw their negligent ſecurity, and by diligent obſeruance learned the deſignes that in their counſels they entended. Fabian.

(13) Returning to his comfortleſſe company, he told them the condition of the hoſtile Campe, and how eaſie it was to recouer againe their decaied eſtates: whereupon ſhewing himſelfe to his ſubiects, vnto whoſe ſight nothing could bee more ioyous; on the ſuddaine ſet vpon the careleſſe Campe of the Danes, and made thereof a very great ſlaughter, to the great terrour of others in other parts, that had accounted him dead long ſince. Henry Hunt. An. Do. 878

(14) Hubba, that had harried the Engliſh, and now rowzed vpon the newes of King Elfreds victory and life; with thirty three ſhips ſailed from Wales, and arriuing in the mouth of Tau, where it falleth into the Seuerne Sea, aſſaied to take there the then-ſtrong Caſtle called Kinwith, vnto whom the Deuonſhire men gaue battle, and ſlew eight hundred and eighty perſons of their retinue; where died the Daniſh King Hubba, whoſe corps being there interred vnder a great heape of copped ſtones, gaue name to the place, and was called Hubbleſtone. There and then was taken the Daniſh much eſteemed Banner, called Reafan, wherin a Rauen was purtraied wrought in needle-worke, (ſo Aſſerius Meneuenſis reporteth) by the three ſiſters of Hubba and Hungar the daughters of Lothbroke (that is Leather-breach) the Dane: In regard whereof, as alſo for the opinion of good lucke, as they tooke it, it was euer born before them in their wars. An. Do. 879. Aſſer. Menr.

(15) Theſe aduerſe proceedings of the Danes deſignes, eſpecially falling when the game was neere wonne, made them ſuſpect, how faire ſoeuer the ball lay to hand, yet fortune would ſerue it in the end to their loſſe: for Elfred now flocked vnto vpon euery ſide, beganne to build fortreſſes behind his backe, and forward to march with his conquering ſword: whereupon the Danes ſent to him for Peace, and deliuered him hoſtages, vpon aſſurance that they meant as they ſpake: The conditions were, that their King ſhould receiue Baptiſme, and the great Army of the Danes quietly to depart out of the land. Danes ſend for peace.

(16) Whereupon Gurmound or Gurthrun the Daniſh King repaired to the new built Caſtle of Edelingſey vnto King Elfred, and in the place then called Alre, was waſhed in the lauer of Baptiſme, whom Elfred receiued for his God-ſon by the name of Athelſtane, and gaue him in free gift the Country of Eaſt-Angles. In the ſame fountaine of Grace (ſaith Simond Dunelmenſis) thirty of the chiefe Daniſh Nobility were initiated: vpon whom the truly Chriſtian King Elfred beſtowed many rich gifts: And that the limites of the Engliſh might be free from their incurſions, thus the confines of King Elfreds kingdome were laide forth, as we find it in the end of thoſe Lawes that Elfred publiſhed, whoſe words are theſe: Let the bounds of our Dominion ſtretch from the riuer Thameſis, and from thence to the water of Lea, euen vnto the head of the ſame water, and ſo forth ſtraight vnto Bedford: and finally, going along by the riuer of Ouſe, let them end at Watling ſtreet. Simon Dunelm. Wil. Lambert in his booke of the old Engliſh lawes.

(17) But ſo farre were the Danes from performance of couenants, that in this eight yeare of King Elfreds raigne, and the eight hundred ſeuenty nine after Chriſt, this Gurmund and his company wintered at Chipnam in Wiltſhire, and a new ſupply of theſe Pagans (known by the name of the Wiccingi) wintred at Fulham neere London; yet after vpon better aduice, the one went into their aſſigned circuit, and the other An. other departed to the realme of France; and ſo to his twelfth yeare the land tooke ſome reſt, that had been kept long waking by the loud ſound of warre.'

(18) In the yeare of Grace eight hundred eighty fiue, theſe laſt retired Danes finding France not fitting their purpoſe, returned into Kent, and put into Medway, where on his Eaſt ſide they began a fierce ſiege vnto the City Rocheſter, before whoſe gate they built a ſtrong Caſtle: Thither King Elfred haſted, before whoſe power theſe Danes could not ſtand, but were forced to their ſhippes, and backe againe into France,

An.Do.889. (19) Whereupon the King remoued his ſiege vnto London, whence all the Danes fled (as Wolues abide not the preſence of the Lion) the inhabitants reioicing to ſee the face of their King: which City hee reſtored to her former liberty and beauty, and committed the cuſtody thereof vnto Ethelred Duke of Mercia, that had maried his daughter the Lady Ethelfred, whoſe title the King had maintained againſt Colwolphus, made King thereof by the Danes. Wherupon both Kent, the South-Saxons, and Weſt-Saxons came willingly, and ſubmitted themſelues to King Elfred. The Eaſt-Angles being gouerned, or rather ſpoiled by Athelſtan the chriſtned Dane, who after twelue yeares raigne there died, and was buried at Hadley in Suffolke.

An.Do.892. (20) But in the one and twentieth of his raigne, and of Chriſts Incarnation eight hundred ninety two: thoſe rouing Danes returned out of France, & againe arriued in Kent in the mouth of the riuer Limen, with two hundred and fifty ſhips, which they drew foure miles into the great wood, then called Andreads Weald, and there deſtroied a Caſtle that ſtood for defence, building another more ſtrong at Apulder, wherein they kept. At the ſame time likewiſe entred one Haſtings, a Nobleman of Norway, with eighty ſhips; but with a fairer ſhew as hee entended, for he ſent his oath vnto Elfred not to annoy any part of his dominions, and withall his two ſonnes to bee baptized: which King Elfred accepted, himſelfe becomming the Godfather of the one, and Duke Ethelred of the other; and both they, and his Ambaſſadors returned with rich gifts. Againſt theſe Kentiſh inuaders, King Elfred fought a great battaile at Fernham, neere vnto Aeleſford, wherein he wounded their King, and forced his Army to flee ouer Thameſis; in paſſing whereof, through ouermuch haſt, and great feare many of them were drowned, and they that eſcaped, fled to an Iland called Brekleſey incloſed about by the riuer Colne.

(21) Newes then being brought into the Eaſt, that the Danes from Northumberland had infeſted the Weſt, and with a ſtrong ſiege begirt the City Exceſter. Elfred left for Generall his ſonne in law Duke Ethelred; whileſt he with a ſtrong power went to ſuppreſſe their rage: who hearing of his comming, brake vp their ſiege, and were gone: vpon the aduantage of his abſence, periured Haſtings then wrought, who out of his new built Caſtle at Beamfield, made ſpoile of the Kings people, and forraged all the Country before him. Whereupon Duke Ethelred aſſembled a power, and firſt aſſailing his wel ſtored Caſtle, tooke thence his wife and two ſonnes, with exceeding ſpoiles of gold, ſiluer and garments; all which were preſented vnto King Elfred at his returne to London: who out of his princely magnanimity, ſent backe to Haſtings his wife and two ſonnes; becauſe (ſaid hee) ſhee was no warriour, and his two ſonnes were his God-children: whereupon Haſtings repaired his Caſtle, and ioined with the other Danes that lay at Apulder.

Haſtings wife and children ſet at liberty.

(22) Thoſe then that had fled but lately from Exceſter, in their returne met with other their conſorts, and rouing about the coaſt for their prey, fell laſtly vpon the aneient City Cheſter, which preſently they beganne to ſacke and burne. But the country inhabitants comming to the reſcue, begirt them about with their hoaſt, and foreſtalled the paſſages of all ſupply of victuals; ſo that for want of food, the Danes were conſtrained to eate vp their horſes, and vpon compoſition thence to depart.

Exceſter and Cheſter beſieged.

(23) Thence fetching a compaſſe all along the coaſts of Wales, in the ſame yeare they arriued in Eſſex, being the twenty foure of King Elfreds raigne: and in the Winter following, drew their ſhips by the Thameſis into the riuer Lea, by which they paſſed in thoſe light Pinnaces twenty miles North-ward into the land, and built them a fortreſſe at the place called * Weare, thither forthwith the King repaired, and pitched his tẽts before his enemies in the ſame place; who ſeeing their ſtrength, and the danger of long ſiege, did that by policy, which power could not ſo ſodainely do: for he diuided the riuer into ſundrie ſtreames, whereby the Chanell was made vnnauigable, and the Shippes bedded in the mudde, lay rather to their annoiance then defence; the former experience of their hunger-ſtarud beſiege made thẽ the more fearefull to fall into the like; and therfore in great haſt departed their fortreſſe, leauing their wiues and children to the mercy of the Engliſh. Neither ſtayed they till they came vnto the borders of Wales, when at Cartbridge vpon Seuerne they built another Caſtle, and lay there all the next winter.

* Ware.

(24) Long there they ſtayed not, without diſlike of their lodgings, and cold entertainments, but that they returned to their wonted ſpoiles, and diuiding themſelnes, ſome to Northumberland, and ſome into Eaſt-Anglia, like Locuſts eate vp all as they went: whoſe breath as it were, ſo infected the aire, that for three yeares following a great mortality raigned both vpon men and beaſts, and ended not much before the death of this incomparable Prince: which hapned to the great ſorrow of his ſubiects vpon wedneſday the twenty eight of October, when hee had raigned twenty nine yeares and ſixe moneths, of his age fifty one, and yeare of Chriſt Ieſus nine hundreth and one.

(25) The vertues of this Prince are matchable to any that euer raigned before him, and exceed the moſt that euer raigned after him, both in ſeruice of God, whoſe Subſtitutes they are, in defence of his Country, which charge they all beare, in prouiding good lawes, the ſinewes of Kingdomes, and care of poſterities, from which no man is exempted.

Scal. Iu. Regiſt. Hyd. Tho. Rudborn Roy. Hiſt.

The day and night containing twenty foure howers, he deſigned equally to three eſpeciall vſes, and them obſerued by the burning of a taper ſet in his Chappell or Oratory; eight howres hee ſpent in contemplation, reading, and prayers; eight, in prouiſion for himſelfe, his repoſe and health; and the other eight in the affaires of his common-wealth and ſtate. His Kingdome hee likewiſe diuided into Shires, Hundreds and Tithings, for the better ordering and adminiſtring of iuſtice, and for the abandoning of theeues, which had formerly increaſed by the meanes of long warres; whereby, notwithſtanding the multitude of ſouldiers continually imploied, it is reported that a Virgin might trauaile alone in his daies through all his dominions, without any violence offered; and that bracelets of gold were hanged in the high waies, and no man ſo hardy as to take them away.

Aſſerius &c.

Hee was a moſt zealous, and ſtudious protector and prouider for the Clergy, Widdowes, and Orphans, liberall of his goods, wiſe, temperate and iuſt, valiant, patient in aduerſities, and euer relgious in the ſeruice of God. A moſt learned Prince, a skilfull Muſition, and an excellent Poet: the beſt lawes beefitting his Subiects he tranſlated into the Engliſh tongue: as alſo the Paſterall of Gregory, the hiſtory of Beda, and Boetius his conſolation of Philoſophy, the Pſalmes of Dauid (whoſe godly raigne he propoſed to himſelfe for imitation) hee likewiſe began to tranſlate, but died before hee could finiſh the ſame. And ſo great a deſire had he vnto learning, that (as Alfredus Riuallenſis witneſſeth) he publiſhed this Act: We will and command, that all Freemen of our Kingdom, whoſoeuer soeuer possessing two hides of land, shall bring vp their sons in learning till they be fifteene yeares of age at least, that so they may be trained to know God, to bee men of vnderstanding, and to liue happily: for, of a man that is borne free, and yet illiterate, we repute no otherwise then of a beast, or a brainelesse body, and a very sot. And for the furtherance of this his roiall intent, consorted with Aserius Meneuensis, Grimbald, Iohn Scot and others, neither permitted he any in office in Court, or elsewhere, vnlesse he were learned, which incited his Nobles to the earnest pursuit of learned Arts, and to traine vp their children in good letters: his buildings were many, both to Gods seruice, and other publicke vse, as at Edelingsey a Monastery, at Winchester a New-Minster, and at Shaftsbury a house of Nunnes, wherein hee made his daughter Ethelgeda the Abbesse. But the foundation of the Vniuersity of Oxford (which hee began in the yeare of our Lord eight hundred ninety fiue, and whose lectures he honoured with his owne presence) surmounteth all his others, to the continuance of posterities, a liuing spring and gratious fountaine, whence issue the streames of all knowledge, that abundantly haue watred both this and other kingdomes.

(26) His body was first buried in the Cathedrall Church of S. Peters at Winchester, vnder a faire Monument of most pretious Purphory, afterwards because the lewd-religious Chanons giue it out (to work some feat of their vsual imposture) that his Ghost did walk euery night from house to house; both it and the Monument were taken vp, and by his son the Kings commaund (in detestation of those sorceries) remoued into the Church of the new Monastery: and lastly, his body, Monument, Church and Monastery, were taken thence, and remoued without the Northgate of the City, since called Hyde.

(27) Some alleadge that the malice of those Chanons against him, was for displeasure that he placed ouer thē a rude Swineheard named Denewlphus, whom he made their Bishop; but the ground of that assertion seemeth vnwarrantable by the relation of Wigornensis, & also of Tho. Rudburne; the first of which saith, that Elfred caused him to be trained vp in learning, and the later, that after long study, he attained to the degree of a Doctor of Diuinity in the Vniuersity of Oxford, and was afterward made Bishop of Winchester by the King. For doubtlesse at that time the Bishops of Rome had not deuested our Kings of that prerogatiue.

His Wife.

(28) Elswith the wife of King Elfred was the daughter of Ethelred surnamed Muchel, that is the Great, an Earle of the Mercians, who inhabited about Gainesborough in Lincolnshire: her mother was Edburg a Lady borne of the Bloud-roiall of Mercia. She was married vnto this King in the twentieth yeare of his age, being the second of the raigne of his brother King Ethelred, and was his wife twenty eight yeares, and liuing after him foure; died in the year of grace nine hundred and foure, and was buried in the Monastery of Nunnes which shee had founded at Winchester; out of which afterwards King Henry the first took to his wife Maud the daughter of Malcolme King of Scots, by whom the roiall bloud of the ancient Kings of England became vnited to the Normans, whereby he wanne much loue of the English nation.

His Issue.

Edward, the eldest sonne, and second child of King Elfred, and Queene Elswith, was borne about the beginning of his Fathers raigne, in the yeare of our Lord eight hundred seuenty one: hee was brought vp in his Fathers Court, and carefully attended, and instructed by men of great vertue and knowledge in learning, and in all other qualities, and exercises conuenient for Princes. He was maried, and had diuers children: hee was thirty yeeres of age before his Father deceased, and then he succeeded him in his Kingdome and Monarchy.

Ethelward, the second son, & fist, and last child of King Elfred and Queene Elswith, was borne about the midst of his Fathers raigne, and about the yeare of our Lord eight hundred and eighty. Hee was in his youth by his Fathers appointment; and for the example of other young Nobles brought vp in the study of good Arts, at the vniuersity of Oxford, where (saith Th. Rudburne, and the Annales of Winchester) he became a man very learned, and a great Philosopher: he had of his Fathers gift by his last Wil great liuings in the Counties of Deuon, Sommerset, South-Hampton: he proued a man of great iudgement and wisedome, and liuing vntill he was aboue forty yeres old; hee died the sixteenth day of October, in the two and twenty yeare of his brother King Edwards raign, Anno nine hundred twenty two, and was buried at Winchester.

Elfleda, the eldest daughter and first child of King Elfred, and Queene Elswith his wife, was married to Ethelred Duke of Mercia, who in respect of this mariage was suffered to haue all roiall iurisdiction ouer that Country, in as ample maner as the Kings thereof had enioied; and after the decease of her husband, which happened in the yeare of our Lord nine hundred and twelue: shee continued the gouernement in the same sort eight yeares, with such resolution and valiant resistance of the common enemy (the Danes) that she stood her brother Edward in great stead, as in the relation of his life shall be further shewed. She died the fifteenth of Iune nine hundred and nineteene, and was buried in S. Peters Church at Gloucester, leauing issue, a daughter, named Elswin, whom King Edward her brother depriued of that Duchy, which her owne mother enioied, and he his crowne by her assistance.

Ethelgeda, the second daughter and fourth child of King Elfred and Queene Elswith, was neuer married, but tooke vpon her the profession and vow of Virginity, and was by her fathers appointment made a Nunne of Shaftsbury in the County of Dorset, in the Monastery there founded by him: who is also accounted the first of the Towne it selfe. Shee was afterward Abbesse of the house, and therein spent, and ended her life, and was there also buried.

Elfride, the yongest daughter, and child of King Elfred (and Queene Elswith his wife, was married to Baldwin the second, surnamed the Bald, Earle of Flanders, sonne of Earle Baldwin the first, and Queene Iudith his wife, the widdow of King Ethelwolfe her Grandfather. Shee was his wife thirty yeares and more; shee suruiued him and was a widdow eleuen yeeres, she died the seuenth of Iune, in the yeere of our Lord nine hundred twenty nine, being the fift of the raigne of King Ethelstan her Nephew. She is buried by her husband in the Chappell of our Lady, within the Monastery of S. Peter, at the City of Gaunt. She had issue Arnulfe the third Earle of Flanders, progenitor of all the Earles of Flanders since his time, & Adnulfe Earle of Boloigne and Terwin.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

An.Do.901.

NO greater were the griefes conceiued for the death of worthy Elfred, then were the hopes of the people in his ſonne Prince Edward, whoſe valour had beene often approued againſt the raging Danes, & whoſe vertues were both many and princely; not ſo learned as his Father, neither ſo patient to vndergoe his chance; but as glorious in martiall proweſſe, and as fortunate in al his fights, vnder whoſe hand the Danes euery where fell, and vnder his Monarchy all the Engliſh did ſtoope excepting the Northumbrians.

(2) He entred his raigne the yeare of Chriſts natiuity, nine hundred and one, and at Kingſton vpon Thames was crowned and annointed with holy oyle. The Daniſh warres continuing in a ſucceſsiue maner, fell as it were hereditaryly from the Father vnto the Sonne, and ripened dayly towards their wiſhed harueſt. Beſides Ethelwald the ſonne of Ethelbert, the vncle to this King Edward, young at his fathers deceaſe, and therefore perhappes held vncapable of gouernment, ſhewed now the bloſſoms of vnder-ſucking plants, whoſe fruits are neither plenteous nor pleaſant in taſt; for his humours euer working vpon diſcontents, drew his thought onely how to make the poſſeſſor fall.

(5) That the Engliſh were moſt expert for war in theſe daies, is witneſſed by their reſiſtance of thoſe ſturdy Danes, againſt whom the Commons many times with victory fought, without either King or Captaine to guide them: and they were likewiſe famous in other lands: for about this time it was, that the Engliſhmen at the perſwaſion of the Gothes, beſieged the great City Argilla in Barbary, which they wanne with ſuch ſlaughter of the enemy, and ſpoile of the towne, that for thirty yeares after it lay deſolate without inhabitants, whereby it was hoped that the Saracens would haue departed Europe, as Ioannes Leo Afer hath told vs, who according to the Saracens doth referre this ſiege to the three hundred and foureteenth of Mahomet Hegira, which meeteth with the yeare of Chriſts Natiuity, nine hundred and fiue.

(6) The truce yet lasting, the Danes in Northumberland were nothing quiet, to stay whose irruptions King Edward lent a great power, who harried the Country before them, and with much slaughter returned victorious. These daliances of Fortune made the Danes very desperate, and therefore to stay the rowling ball before it should passe their goale, they gathered their powers & entred Mercia, where with victory and spoile they raged for a time. But Edward to aid Ethelred his brother in law, and Earle of that Prouince, mustered his men, and at Wodnesfield neere Wolfrune-hampton in Stafford-shire gaue the battaile, wherein the English so behaued themselues that the two Pagan-Kings Cowilfus & Healidine, the two Earles Vter and Scurfa, besides other Nobles & Commons innumerable they slew: and now the clouds of these distemperatures being driuen backe, King Edwards Monarchy ascended the Horizon, and the Sunne of his power beganne to shine very bright, therefore he seeking to hold what he had got, set his thoughts to secure his towns with Castles and walles of defence.

(7) These his proceedings caused him to be both beloued and feared; but his mind still free from any ambitious pride, as may appeare by the intercourse betwixt Leolin Prince of Wales and himselfe, wherof Wal. Mapæus maketh mention as followeth. What time Edward the Elder (saith he) lay at Austeline, and Leolin Prince of Wales at Bethesley, intending a Parly, Leolin refused to come downe, or to crosse the Seuerne: Whereupon Edward tooke boat and entred the riuer towards him, which when Leolin saw, and knew who shee was, he cast off his rich roabe wherewith he was clad, and which hee had prepared for that roiall assembly, and entred the riuer breast-hie, where clasping the boat with an imbrace, submissiuely said: Most wise and sage King, thy humility hath ouercome my insolencie, and thy wisedome triumphed ouer my folly; come, get vpon my necke which I haue (foole as I am) lifted vp against thee, so shalt thou enter into that land which thy benigne mildnes hath made thine owne this day: and after he had taken him vpon his shoulders, he would needs haue him sit down vpon his roiall roabe, and so putting his hands iointly into his, did him homage.

(8) In the twelfth yeare of his raigne, as Henry Huntington hath it; Ethelred Earle of Mercia, who had married Elfleda King Edwards sister, departed this life, she hauing borne him one onely daughter named Elfwen, whose trauell in childbirth was so grieuous, that euer after she forbare the nuptiall imbracements of her husband, alleadging that it was an ouer foolish pleasure, which brought with it so great paines; and thereupon changing the wonted affection of her sexe from the bed vnto battaile, gouerned Mercia eight yeares after her husbands decease, as another Zenobia, and did not a little assist her brother in his warres: for the Welsh she pursued as farre at Brecknoke, which she tooke with their Queene: from the Danes shee wonne the Connty of Darby, and assaulting the towne vpon them, put her selfe in great danger; for enterprising to enter the Gate, shee was resisted by whole multitudes of Danes; notwithstanding, she persisted, & got entrance, in which encounter many died, and foure of her chiefe men of war, being Warders of her person-euen fast by her side were slaine.

The Danes in Yorkeshire she constrained to bee at her deuotion, so that some of them became her subiects, some vowed to attend in her aide, and some promised to be prest at her dispose. Her policie in warre proued euer the surest; her counsell of State was regarded with the wisest, and her prouidence in building, and repairing Cities for the weale-publick, or fortifying places for munition of warre exceeded others: which shee extended vpon Chester, Tamworth, Lichfield, Stafford, Warwicke, Shrewsbury, Weddesbury, Eadsbury, Finborow, Rimcorne, Brimsbery-Bridge and others.

This renowned Lady giuing place vnto Nature, left the warres to bee continued by her brother, her daughter at the dispose of her vncle, and her body to be buried at Glocester in the Monastery of S. Peter, which her husband and her selfe had formely built.

(9) The last battaile of this King against these vnsatiate enemies, was in the Country of the East Angles, whereof Edrick the Dane was King; for hee intending new warres with the English; sought to incite other Danes to his aide, whereof Edward hauing intelligence, preuented his purpose, by his sodaine approch into those parts. Polyd.

Edrick therefore hauing all in a readinesse, rashly encountred with his enemy, and fought a fierce battaile to the great losse of his Army, and dammage of his life; for returning to his Court after so foule a discomfiture, became odious to his owne subiects, who violently fell vpon him and murdered him; and them selues brought low by ciuill dissention were shortly made subiect to the English King Edward, and that Kingdome with Mercia, ioined vnto his west-Saxons. Edrick his doings.

And now hauing raigned in great warres and honour the space of twenty foure yeares deceased at Faringdon in Barke-shire, the yeare of Christs incarnation, 924. and was buried in the new-Monastery of Winchester, which his Father begunne, and himselfe wholy finished. The time of King Edwards raigne. His death and buriall.

His Wiues.

(10) Eguina the first wife of King Edward, was the daughter of a meane Gentleman named Bercher, whose eye-pleasing feature and alluring beauty made her to be educated aboue the degree of her birth, and was brought vp by the nurse of King Edward in tender affection and great esteeme. It chanced Prince Edward in kindnes came to visite his nurse, where seeing the admirable beauty of the Maide, fell so farre in loue, that he tooke her to his wife without the consent or knowledge of his father: In which regard she is reputed by some Writers rather his Concubine then his Queene, no other cause mouing them but her meane parentage, and secret making and keeping of this mariage, although there bee some good histories and many likelyhoods to induce that she was his lawfull Queene. Eguina. Prince Edward marrieth Eguina.

(11) Elfleda the second wife of King Edward, was the daughter (as Mathew of Westminster reporteth) of an Earle named Ethelhelme, and Asser the Bishop of Sherborne maketh mention of an Earle in Wiltshire among the West-Saxons of the same name, who was in great fauour with King Elfred, the father of this King, by whom hee was sent Ambassador to carry his Almes to Stephen the sixt, of that name Bishop of Rome, in the yeare of our Lord 887. and by all probable conference of name, time, and place, hee seemeth to bee the man that was father to this Queene. Elfleda. Stephen the sixt Bishop of Rome.

(12) Edgiua, the third wife of King Edward, was the daughter and heire of Earle Sigeline Lord of Meapham, Culings, and Leanham in Kent, who was there slaine in battaile against the Danes, Anno 927. She was married vnto King Edward about the fourteenth yeare of his raigne, being the yeare of Grace, 916. She was his wife ten yeares, and after his death she liued a widdow all the times of the raignes of King Ethelstan her sonne in law, of King Edmund, and King Edred her owne sonnes, of King Edwy her Grand-child, and was liuing in the Raigne of King Edward another of her Grand-children, almost fortie yeares after the death of her husband. It is writ of her that in the yeare of Grace, 959. Shee offered her lands and euidences to Christ vpon his Altar at Canterbury. She deceased the twenty fift of August in the fourth yeare of the said King Edgar, and of Christ, 963. Edgiua. Two Kings her sonnes.

His Children.

(13) Ethelstan, the eldest sonne of King Edward, and the Lady Eguina, was borne and growne to good yeeres in the time of the raigne of his Grandfather King Elfred, who with his owne hands gaue him the order of Knighthood, after a very honourable manner Ethelstan the first sonne.

ner of creation, as William the Monke of Malmsbury, a great obſeruer of ſuch things, hath left in writing: who reporteth, that he put vpon him a Purple Robe, and girt him with a girdle wrought with pearle, and a Saxon ſword in a ſcabard of gold, hanging at the ſame. He was the Succeſſor of his Father in the Weſt-Saxons dominions, and the Engliſh Monarchy.

(14) Elfred, the ſecond ſonne of King Edward and the Lady Eguina, is warranted by the teſtimony of the ſtory of Hyde, to haue been loued of his Father aboue all his other children, that he cauſed him in his owne lifetime to bee crowned King, and to ſit with him in his Seat of Eſtate, as his Partner in the Kingdome, and that he enioyed that great honour but for a ſmall time, deceaſing ſhortly after his creation, and long before his fathers death; and was buried in the New Monaſtery at winchester, which afterwards was remoued to Hyde.

Elfred the ſecond ſonne.

(15) Editha (whom the Scotiſh Writers call Beatrice) the daughter of King Edward and the Lady Eguina, with great honour was maried to Sythrick, the Daniſh King of Northumberland, in the firſt yeere of the raigne of her brother King Ethelſtane, being the yeere of grace 915. Within one yeere after her mariage, her husband deceaſed, and his ſonne Guthfrid ſucceeded him in his Kingdome. Wherefore ſhe forſaking that Country, obtained of her brothers gift, the Caſtell of Tamworth, in the County of Warwicke, where ſhe began a Monaſtery of Nunnes, and therein liued, died, and was interred, and both the Monaſtery and Body afterwards was remoued from thence vnto Polleſworth.

(16) Elſward, the third ſon of King Edward, & the firſt of Queen Elfleda his ſecond wife, was born, as it ſeemeth, about the beginning of his Fathers raigne. He was carefully brought vp in the ſtudy of Liberall Arts, and in all other princely qualities; ſo that it was expected he ſhould haue ſucceeded his Father in the Kingdome: but preſently vpon his fathers deceaſe, he deceaſed himſelfe in Oxford, and was buried at one time, and in one place with him in the New Monaſtery at Winchester, in the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 924.

Elſward the third ſonne.

Buried at Winchester.

(17) Edwine, the fourth ſonne of King Edward, and the ſecond of Queene Elfleda his ſecond Wife, was very young when his father was buried, and his brother Ethelſtane crowned. Notwithſtanding a deep ieloſie poſſeſsing the King, that his title was too neere the Crowne, he cauſed him to be put into a little Pinneſſe, without either Tackle or Oares, one only page accompanying him, that his death might be imputed to the waues: whence the young Prince ouercome with griefe, and not able to maſter his owne paſsions, caſt himſelfe headlong into the ſea, and his dead body being driuen vpon the coaſts of Flanders, was taken vp by Adulphe, Earle of Boloine, his coſen-germane, and honourably buried in the Monaſtery of Saint Bertin, in the Towne of S. Omers. Which fact was much lamented by King Ethelſtan, who greeuouſly puniſhed the ſuggeſtions of his owne ieloſie, and the procurers of his brothers death; ſending great thanks to the Earle that buried him, and rich preſents to the Monaſtery which entombed him, and to appeaſe the ghoſt of his innocent brother, built the Abbey of Midleton in the County of Dorſet.

In which Monaſtery, ſhe was firſt a Nunne, and afterward Abbeſſe during the whole time of her life, which was there ſpent and ended, and her body in the ſaid Abbey buried.

(19) Eguina, the third daughter of King Edward, and the ſecond of Queene Elfleda his ſecond Wife, was the ſecond Wife to Charles the third, ſurnamed the Simple, King of France, ſon to King Lews the brother of Judith, Queene of England before mentioned. She had iſſue by him Lewis the third, ſurnamed Beyond-ſea, becauſe he was brought vp here in England with his Vnkle King Ethelſtan; and Gillet Ducheſſe of Normandy maried to Rollo the Dane: who in regard of his marriage, was allowed to bee the firſt Duke of that Country. This Queene ſuruiued King Charles her Husband; and afterwards was remaried to Herbert, the younger Earle of Vermandoys; which marriage was taken for ſo great an indignity, becauſe Earle Herbert the elder, father to this Earle, had cauſed the King her Husband to die in priſon, that King Lewis her ſonne preſently purſued her, apprehended, and committed her to the ſtrait cuſtody of Queene Gerberge his wife: ſo as ſhee had no recourſe vnto him, nor iſſue by him.

(20) Ethelhild, the fourth daughter of King Edward, and the third of Queene Elfleda his ſecond Wife, followed the example of her elder ſiſter Elfleda, and became a Nunne in the Monaſtery of Wilton, which was ſometime the head Towne giuing name to the whole County of Wiltſhire, and antiently called Ellandon.

Ethelhild the fourth daughter.

(21) Edhild, the fifth daughter of King Edward, and the fourth of Queene Elfleda, was maried to Hugh ſurnamed the Great, Earle of Paris, Grand-maſter and Conſtable of France, in the yeere of our Lord 926. being the third of her brother King Ethelſtanes raigne. This Hugh was the ſonne of Robert, brother to Endes King of France, and father of King Hugh Capet, progenitor of the Kings of France, euer ſithence vnto this day: but ſhee died before him without any iſſue by him.

Edhild the fifth daughter.

(22) Edgith, the ſixth daughter of King Edward and the fifth of Queene Elfleda, was the firſt wife of Otho the firſt, ſurnamed the Great, Emperour of the Weſt, ſonne to the Emperor Henry, ſurnamed the Falconer. By him ſhe had iſſue Ludolfe, Duke of Swabe, William Arch-biſhop of Mentz, Ludgard married to Conrad Duke of Lorrayn, and Mechthild Abbeſſe of Quedlingburg in Saxonie: in which Citie ſhe deceaſed the ſeuen and twenty of Auguſt, in the yeere of Chriſts Natiuity 947. the eleuenth of her husbands Empire, and the firſt of her brother King Edreds raigne in England. She was buried at the Eaſt end of the North ſide of a Chapell which her ſelfe had founded in the ſame Citie.

Edgith the ſixth daughter.

(23) Elgiua, the ſeuenth daughter of King Edward, and the ſixth of Queene Elfleda his ſecond Wife, was by King Ethelſtan her brother, with her ſiſter Egith ſent to the Court of the Emperor, Henry the firſt King of the Saxons in Germany, who honourably entertained her, brought her vp with his owne daughters; and after he had maried her elder ſiſter to his eldeſt ſonne, he placed her alſo in marriage with a Duke of Italy obout the Alpes, who is not named of our Writers, but may eaſily be coniectured by the honourable diſpoſition of the maker of the match, to haue been a Prince of note and account, worthy of her eſtate and parentage.

Elgiua the ſeuenth daughter.

Married to a Duke of Italy.

(24) Edmund, the fifth ſonne of King Edward, and the firſt of Queene Edgiua his third and laſt Wife, was borne in the twentieth yeere of his fathers raigne, being the yeere of the worlds ſaluation 921. and at his fathers death little more then three yeeres of age, was notwithſtanding by the carefull prouiſion of his mother, brought vp with all princely education conuenient for his yeeres and eſtate, inſomuch as there was generally a great expectation amongſt the people conceiued of him in the life of his brother King Ethelſtan, vnder whom he learned ſome experience of ſeruice in warre, and after whom hee ſucceeded in the Kingdome of England.

(25) Edred, the ſixth ſonne of King Edward, and the ſecond of Queene Edgiua his third Wife, and the youngeſt ſonne of them both, was borne about the two and twentieth yeere of his fathers raigne, and yeere of grace 923. which was not long before the death of his father, who left him a little infant in the cuſtody of his mother, by whom hee was carefully brought vp, and prooued a Prince of ſo great vertue and

(26) Edburg, the eight daughter of King Edward, and the firſt of Queene Edgiua, in her child-hood had her diſpoſition tried, and her courſe of life diſpoſed by her Father in this manner: he laid before her gorgeous apparrell, and rich Iewels, in one end of a chamber, and the new Teſtament and Bookes of princely inſtruction in the other; willing her to make her choiſe of which ſhe liked beſt: ſhe preſently tooke vp the bookes, and he her in his armes; and kiſſing her ſaid, Goe in Gods name whither God hath called thee, and thereupon placed her in a Monaſtery at Wincheſter, wherein ſhee did moſt vertuouſly ſpend her whole life, and in that Abbey was buried.

Edburg the eight daughter.

(27) Edgiua, the ninth daughter of King Edward, and the ſecond of his laſt Queene, whoſe name ſhee bare, is reported in the hiſtory of the Monaſtery of Hyde by Wincheſter, and other Writers of our Country, to haue beene married to Lewes Prince of Aquitane in France, which not long before had beene a Kingdome of it ſelfe, ſometime allotted to the portion of Lewes the third ſonne of the Emperour Charles the Great; of which houſe it ſeemeth this Lewes was; afterward it became a Dukedome, and the poſſeſsion of an other Family, by whom it came to be the inheritance after the Conqueſt to the Kings of England, which were deſcended of the houſe of Angeow.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Thelſtan, the eldeſt ſonne of King Edward (as hath beene ſaid) for the great hopes conceiued of him, was crowned with a greater ſolemnity then any of his anceſtors euer before him. The place was Kingſton vpon Thameſis in the County of Surrey, the yeer of Chriſt Ieſus 924, where, in the midſt of the town a high Scaffold was built, and thereon the coronation performed to the open view of all, by Athelmus Archbiſhop of Canterbury, with ſhouts of ioy as that of Salomon.

(2) His beginnings were with troubles, and that rather by reaſon of friends then force of foes: for it is recorded, that Elfred a nobleman, either in fauour of King Edwards other ſonnes, holding Ethelſtan a Baſtard, or elſe vpon an ambitious hope blinded of himſelfe, intended at Wincheſter to haue pluckt out the eyes of his Soueraine: but his treaſon being knowne, before the ſeed could ſhew blade, he was apprehended & ſent to Rome to purge himſelfe by oth: where, before the Altar of S. Peter and Pope Iohn the tenth, he there abiured the act, and thereupon fell ſodainly down to the earth, ſo that his ſeruants tooke and bare him into the Engliſh Schoole, where, within three dayes after he died: the Pope denying him chriſtian buriall vntill he knew King Ethelſtans pleaſure.

Pope Iohn the tenth.

(3) Theſe ſtormes ouerpaſt, as great a cloud ſeemed to ariſe vnto Ethelſtans ſight, whoſe eye of iealouſie euer followed the aſcent, and his eare euer opened vnto the inſtillations of Paraſites, amongſt whom his Cup-bearer was a chiefe; who brought daily more and more ſuſpition into the Kings head, that laſtly (as wee haue ſhewed) hee conſented to young Edwins death, though with too late a ſorrow hee repented the ſame: for beſides his ſeauen yeares penance voluntarily vndergone, to paciſie

the ghoſt of his betraied brother, hee built the two Monaſteries of Midleton and Michelneſſe, as for the moſt part ſuch ſeed-plots were euer ſowne in the furrowes of bloud, which hapned vpon this occaſion: It chanced his Cup-bearer in his ſeruice vpon a feſtiuall to ſtumble with the one foote, and recouering himſelfe with the other, pleaſantly to ſay, you ſee how one brother helpeth another; vpon which ſpeech the King with griefe and touch of heart, called to mind the death of his innocent brother, and forthwith commanded execution to be done on him the procurer, to repay his fact with deſerued death: & himſelfe was euer after more tender and carefull towards his other brethren, with a more reſpectiue regard, and beſtowed his ſiſters moſt honorably in mariage, as hath beene ſaid.

His Cup-bearer put to death.

(4) At his entrance of gouernment, to diſcharge the expectations of his ſubiects, hee endeauoured both by warres and allianuces to make them ſtrong and rich. Firſt, therefore entring friendſhippe with Sithricke the Daniſh King of Northumberland, vpon whom with condition that hee ſhould receiue Baptiſme, he beſtowed his ſiſter Editha in marriage, hee bent himſelfe to ordaine Lawes for the weale-publike, & thoſe to bind aſwel the Clergie as the Layety, out of which firſt ſprang the attachment of Fellons, to take hold of ſuch as ſtole aboue twelue pence, & were aboue twelue yeares of age.

(5) But Sithricke the Northumbrian dying the firſt yeare of his mariage, and his Queene returning to a religious life, his ſonnes Godfrey and Anlafe, offended that their Pagan-Gods were neglected, and onely by the meanes of this their fathers laſt wife, ſtirred the Northumbrians to diſquiet the Engliſh, which occaſioned Ethelſtan to inuade their country, and forced Anlafe into Ireland, and Godfrey into Scotland, which laſt ſo wrought with Conſtantine their King, that he vndertooke to ſide in his quarrell, with whom ioined ⁎ Howel King of Wales. Theſe in a fierce battle hee ouercame and conſtrained them to ſubmit themſelues to his will, who knowing the chance of warre to bee variable, and pittying the caſe of theſe down-caſt Princes, reſtored them preſently to their former eſtates, adding withall this princely ſaying, that it was more honour to make a King then to be a King.

(6) This notwithſtanding, the caſe of Godfrey ſo moued the ſpirit of King Conſtantine, that hee againe aſſiſted him in his inrodes into the Engliſh part, which drew againe King Ethelſtan into the North: & cõming to Yorkſhire (as he was a man much deuoted to God-ward) turned aſide to viſite the tombe of S. Iohn of Beuerley, where earneſtly praying for his proſperous ſucceſſe, for want of richer Iewels, there offered his knife, vowing that if hee returned with conqueſt, hee would redeeme it with a worthy price, and thus armed with hope, proceeded forward pitching downe his tents at Brimesburie, his nauie waffing along thoſe ſeas.

(7) To the aide of Conſtantine came Anlafe, called by writers King of the Iriſh, and of the Iles, who had married his daughter, a man no doubt both hardy and deſperate, as appeared by the Action he vnderwent; for it is recorded, that as Elfred the Engliſh had attempted to know the State of the Danes: ſo this Dane at this place did to vnderſtand the Engliſh: for, diſguiſing himſelfe like a Harper, hee went from Tent to Tent, and had acceſſe euen into King Ethelſtans preſence, vntill hee had learned what he moſt deſired, and then returned againe to his Campe, which part of his was no bolder, or more wiſely performed, then was kept ſecret, and after reuealed by a moſt faithfull ſouldier: for Anlafe departed & free from purſuit, this Souldier made the act known to King Ethelſtan: who being ſore diſpleaſed with his enemies eſcape, imputed the fault vnto him the reuealer: but he replying, made him this anſwere: I once ſerued Anlafe (ſaid he) vnder his pay for a ſouldier, and gaue him the ſame faith that I doe now vnto you; if then I ſhould haue betraied his deſignes, what truſt could your Grace repoſe in my truth: let him therefore die, but not through my treachery, and by his eſcape ſecure your royall ſelfe from danger; remoue your Tent from the place where it ſtands, leſt at vnawares hee happily aſſaile you.

(8) The King ſeeing the faith of his ſouldier, was therewith pacified, and forthwith commanded his Tent to bee remoued, where preſently a Biſhoppe new come to his Campe pitched vp his owne, and the night following both himſelfe and retinue were ſlaine by the ſame Anlafe that ſought the Kings life in aſſaulting the place; and preſsing forward came to his tent, who awaked with the ſuddain Allarum, boldly ruſhed vpon his enemies, & encouraging his men, put them backe with the death of fiue petty Kings, twelue Dukes, and well neere of the whole Army, which Anlafe had brought.

(10) To leaue a memoriall of King Ethelſtans great victory, giue me leaue to write what I find; namely, that neere vnto the Caſtle Dunbar in Scotland, he praying that his right vnto thoſe parts might bee confirmed vnto poſterities by a ſigne, at one blow with his ſword ſtroke an elle deepe into a ſtone, which ſtood ſo clouen a long time after, and vndoubtedly was the whetſtone to the firſt Authors knife: but this is moſt certaine, that hee ioined Northumberland to the reſt of his Monarchy, and returning to Beuerley redeemed his owne knife.

naturally to moue, as if they had growne and retained life: And the King of Norway ſent him a goodly ſhippe with a guilt ſterne, purple ſailes, and the decke garniſhed all with gold.

(13) Of theſe accounted holy reliques King Ethelſtan gaue part vnto the Abbey of S. Swithen in Wincheſter; and the reſt to the Monaſtery of Malmeſbury, whereof Adelme was the founder, and his Tutelar Saint, in honour of whom he beſtowed great immunities vpon the towne, and large endowments vpon the Abbey; hee new built the monaſteries of Wilton, Michelneſſe, and Midleton, founded Saint Germans in Cornwal, Saint Petrocus at Bodman, the Priory of Pilton, new walled and beutified the City of Exceter, and enriched euery famous Abbey in the land, either with new buildings, Iewels, Books, or Reuenewes.

(14) As alſo hee did certaine Cities with the Mintage of his money, whereof in London were eight houſes, at Wincheſter ſixe, at Lewis two, at Haſtings two, in Hampton two, in Warham two, in Chicheſter one, in Rocheſter three, two for the King, and one for the Biſhop; at Canterbury ſeuen; foure for himſelfe, two for the Archbiſhop, and one for the Abbat, although it appeareth the Archbiſhop had his before the raigne of this King. For among theſe ancient Saxon-Coines, we find one of Ceolnothus, who ſate there Archbiſhop in the yeare 831. which both for the antiquity & authority of truth wee haue here inſerted.

(15) This Prince King Ethelſtan was of an indifferent ſtature, not much exceeding the common ſort of men, chearefull in countenance, his haire verie yellow, and ſomewhat ſtooped forward as he went; for valour inuincible, in reſolution conſtant, and for his curteſie beloued of all; he raigned in great honour the ſpace of fifteene yeares and odde monethes, and deceaſed in the City of Glouceſter, vpon wedneſday the ſeuenteenth of October, and was buried at Malmesbury the yeere of Chriſts Natiuity 940. hauing neuer had wife mentioned in our hiſtories. Athelſtans vertues. The time of his raigne.

His ſuppoſed Iſſue.

(16) Leonet, the ſuppoſed daughter of King Ethelſtan, is reported by Iohn Rouſe and Papulwick, writers of the miſtruſted ſtory of Guy of Warwicke to bee married vnto Reynburn Earle of Warwicke, and ſonne to the ſame Guy, whoſe remembrance and reputation is preſerued & kept with no leſſe renowne among the common people, for the liberty of England ſaued by his victory in ſingle combate againſt Colbrand the Dane, then was Horatius the Romane for the preſeruatiō of Rome, whoſe hiſtorie I wil leaue for others to enlarge that haue more leaſure & better inuention. Iohn Rouſe. Papulwicke.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

EDmund the fifth ſonne of King Edward, borne vnto him by Queene Edgiua his third and laſt wife, at the age of nineteen yeeres ſucceeded his brother King Ethelſtan in his kingdome, and Monarchy: hee began his raigne the yeare of the worlds ſaluation 940. and with great ſolemnity was crowned at Kingſton vpon Thames, in the fifth yeare of Otho the firſt Emperour of that name, and his brother in law; his valour had often beene tried in the warres of King Ethelſtan againſt thoſe ſtout and ſturdy enemies the Danes, Scotiſh, Iriſh, and Welſhmen, that often had aſſaied to diſturbe his peace. Do. 940. Simon Dunel.

(2) Athelſtan deceaſed, and the crowne ſcarſe ſet vpon King Edmunds head, but that the Danes in Northumberland, diſliking ſubiection, called again Anlafe out of Ireland to be their King; who now in the infancie Wil. Malm.

infancy of Edmunds eſtate, with great power of men purpoſed to ſubdue all before him; but Edmund as forward, with full reſolution ment to keepe what was got, and ſo gathering his power, proceeded towards the North, and at Leiceſter encountred with the Danes: howbeit, through the interceding of the Archbiſhops of Canterbury and Yorke, Odo and Wolſton, the matter was mitigated before it came to the vttermoſt.

An.Do.942. (3) The next yeare of his raigne, the ſaid Anlafe (whom ſome hold to haue beeene the King of Norway) being dead, an other Anlafe, ſonne to King Sithrick, of whom we haue ſpoken, intruded vpon the Kingdom of Northumberland. Theſe heads, as Hidras, ſpringing vp each after others, drew King Edmund againe into the North, who raging like a prouoked Lion, ſubdued, as he went, thoſe townes where the Danes kept, and got from them Lincolne, Leiceſter, Darbie, Stafford, and Nottingham, compelling them to receiue Baptiſme, and to become his Subiectes; ſo that the Country was wholy his vnto Humber. Theſe his proceedings cauſed Anlafe and Reinold the ſonnes of the Daniſh Gurmo, ſubduers of Yorke, to yeeld themſelues wholy to his deuotion, offering him ſubiection, and withall to receiue the Chriſtian faith; for performance wherof, they likewiſe receiued Baptiſme, vnto whom King Edmund was Godfather, to Reinold at his Confirmation, and to Anlafe at the Font: but how ſoone they fell from both, the ſequell ſhewed; for caſting off the faith and fealty thus promiſed, they ſtirred the Northumbrians to another rebellion, yet with no better ſucceſſe then deſert; for they were forced into a perpetuall exile, and King Edmund adioined that Country to his owne gouernment; without the admittance of any Secondary or Vice-roy to rule there vnder him.

King Dunmaile. (4) Cumberland alſo, which ſeldome was quiet, hauing beene a Kingdome entire of it ſelfe, and now aided by Leolin King of Southwales, he vtterly waſted: and apprehending the two ſonnes of Dunmaile King of that Prouince, commanded the eyes of thoſe ouer-bold Princes to be puld out, and gaue their inheritance to Malcolme King of Scots, to hold the ſame by fealty from him. Thus by power and policie clearing thoſe coaſts whence the ſharpeſt ſtormes had continually blowne, hee returned into the South, and there ſet himſelfe to ordaine lawes for the good of his people, the which, leſt time the conſumer of al things might chance to obliterate, were by the labours of the learned Lambert tranſlated into Latine, and imprinted in the yeare 1568. next, to ſhew his loue to God, and bounty to his Church, he gaue the towne of Saint Edmondsbury with the liberties thereof, wholy to that Martyr, and to the Monks that liued in ſeruing at his Altars.

(5) But as each thing hath his ſpring, growth, & decay; ſo all men their dates, howſoeuer eminent in degree, & the ſhank of their Compas ſo ſet in a center that the Circle of their lines are oftentime abrupt, before it be drawn to the full round: for ſo with others, we may ſee in this Monarch, who being ſafely returned from many great dangers of war, at peace in his Pallace, came to a lamentable & vnexpected end: for at his Manor of Pucle-kerkes in the County of Glouceſter, whiles hee interpoſed himſelfe betweene his Sewer and one Leoue to part a fray, was, with a thruſt through the body, wounded to death the twenty ſixt of May, in the yeare of our ſaluation 946. when he had proſperouſly raigned the ſpace of fiue yeares and ſeuen moneths, and his body, with no leſſe ſorrow then ſolemnity, was buried at Glaſenbury

His Wife.

(6) Elfgine, the onely wife of King Edmund, hath not her parents declared (for ought I find) by any of our Writers: but this is affirmed, that ſhee was married vnto him in the firſt yeare of his raigne, which was the yeare of Grace, 940. and that ſhe was his wife foure yeeres & vpward, after whoſe ſlaughter ſhe remained a mournfull widdow all the reſt of her life, which ſhe ſpent with ſo great vertue and opinion of the people, as by the writers of that age ſhee is commended to poſterity by the name of a Saint.

Elfgine.

His Iſſue.

(7) Edwy, the eldeſt ſonne of King Edmund, and Queene Elfgine his wife, was borne in the ſecond yeare of his fathers raigne Anno 942. When his father died, hee was but foure yeeres of age, and in reſpect of his minority was not permitted to ſucceed him in the Kingdome, but forced to giue place to his vncle Edred, vnder whom he liued nine yeares; and in the tenth, his vncle being dead, and himſelfe then growne to the age of thirteene, was admitted to the ſucceſsion of the Monarchy.

Edwy.

(8) Edgar the ſecond ſonne of King Edmund, and of Queen Elfgine, was borne in the third yeare of his fathers raigne, the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 943, and was but three yeeres old when his Father died; notwithſtanding, he proued afterward a Prince of great expectation, and in the ſecond yeare of King Edwy his brothers raigne, being then but fourteene yeeres of age, he was choſen King by the Mercians and Northumbrians, both which people he gouerned vnder the title of King of Mercia, for the ſpace of two yeeres befor his brothers death, and then ſucceeded him in the whole Monarchie.

CHAPTER XL.

EDred, the ſixth ſonne of King Edward, borne vnto him by Queene Edgiua his third and laſt wife, at the age of twenty three yeeres ſucceeded his brother King Edmund in the nonage of his children in al his dominions, and was the twenty ſeuenth King of the Weſt-Saxons, and the twentie eight Monarch of the Engliſhmen. He began his raigne in the yeere of Mans ſaluation 946. and was annointed, and crowned at Kingſton vpon Thames in the County of Surrey vpon Sunday the ſeuenteenth day of Auguſt by the hands of Otho Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

(2) His Coronation robes ſcarſly put off; news was brought him that the Northumbrians had reuolted and ſtirred a dangerous inſurrection; notwithſtanding the Couenants that his brother Edmund had made with Malcolme King of the Scots to ſecure the ſame. Therfore leſt delaies might proue dangerous, with a great Army hee entred into the verge of Scotland, without ſight of enemy, or any reſiſtance. But peace being concluded betwixt Edred, Malcolme and the Northumbrians; yea and the ſame confirmed ſtrongly by oath, yet was it little regarded of the laſt named lurers; for no ſooner was Edred returned, but that they ſent into Ireland for Anlafe, the ſonne of Gurmo the Dane, who had been expelled the Country as we haue ſaid.

(3) Anlafe gathering a fleete and forces accordingly, came into Northumberland, where he was with great ioy receiued and made their King, which title hee maintained for foure yeeres continuance, banding againſt Edred, and ſtill holding him play, till laſtly the Northumbrians diſloiall to both, took their feather out of Anlafe his plume, and ſent him packing to the place, whence he came, electing one Hericus King in his ſtead.

(4) Edred awaked with the waſts that they made, prepared a iourney into thoſe parts, where with fire and ſword hee bare downe all before him; and albeit he was a man religiouſly bent, yet ſpared he not the Abbey of Rippon from flames, but laid all vnto aſhes as he went, the enemy not daring to ſhew the face. In his returne ſuſpecting no perill, ſuddainely an hoaſt brake out of Yorke, and fell vpon the Rere-ward of his Army, marching but careleſly, and broken out of their array, whereby many periſhed before any complete order of reſiſtance could be made. The King ſeeing this bold attempt of theſe Rebels, ſtroke downe his ſtandard, turning his face againe to the North, and threatened the reuenge, with the Countries ſpoile and their liues.

(5) In this plot of ſedition Wolſtan Archbiſhop of Yorke had ſowne ſome ſeed of treaſon, both in the aſſiſtance of action, and counſell for the enterpriſe, very ill beſeeming a man of his ranke: this Wolfe therfore hauing thus awaked the Lion from reſt, was the onely man that fell in his pawes; for the Northumbrians expulſing their ſtateleſſe Hericus with ſubmiſsiue teares and golden ſhowers, ſo pacified the King, that their offences were therewith cleane waſhed away: but hee good man (a Saint at the leaſt) was mued vp in priſon (againſt whom accuſations daily came, and namely, that he had commaunded ſundry of the Burgeſſes of Thetford to bee ſlaine) where hee abode till he was by Edred vpon a reuerent regard of his calling, releaſed from thence: for as this King is commended for his lenity towards the vertuous; ſo is he no leſſe for his iuſtice towards the vitious, and for the practiſe of his Religion, as forward as any, ſuffering not onely his manners to be reproued and corrected, (a quality truely roiall, and beſt beſeeming Princes) but alſo (ſo much below the pitch of ſoueraigne Maieſty) his body to bee chaſtiſed at the will and direction of Dunſtan Abbot of Glaſenbury, vnto whoſe cuſtody, he alſo committed the greateſt part of his treaſure and richeſt iewels to be lockt in his cheſts, and vnder the keyes of this Monaſtery.

Aſſer. (6) The ſtately Abbey of Mich at Abington neere Oxford built by King Inas, but deſtroyed by the Danes, he newly repaired, indowing it with lands & faire reuenewes, and confirmed the Charters with ſeales of gold: hee alſo ordained Saint Germans in Cornwal to be a Biſhops See, which there continued till by Canutus it was annexed to the Epiſcopall See of Kyrton in Deuon, both which Sees were afterward by King Edward the Confeſſor tranſlated to the City of Exceſter: but ſith the brighteſt day hath his night, and the higheſt tide his preſent ebbe, what maruaile is it, if then Edred in the middeſt of his ſtrength were ſeazed vpon by ſickneſſe and death, which ſurpriſed him after hee had raigned in great honour nine yeeres and odde moneths, to the great griefe of his Subiects, who ſolemnly interred him in the old Minſter within the City of Wincheſter, the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 955. whoſe bones with other Kings, to this day are preſerued in a guilt Coffer, fixed vpon the wall in the ſouth ſide of the Quier.

His Iſſue.

Elfred. (7) Elfred, the ſonne of King Edred, was borne before his Father was King; neither find I mention of his Mother, or any act by him done; onely in the ſixt yeare of King Edred his raigne, which was the yeere of Grace, 952. he is mentioned for a witneſſe to his Fathers graunt of lands in Wittenham, to Ethelwolfe a Duke of England in thoſe daies, as appeareth by the Charter thereof, bearing date in the yeere aforeſaid.

Bertfrid. (8) Bertfrid an other, and as it ſeemeth an elder ſonne of King Edred, was borne before his father was King, without any mention alſo of his Mother, who liuing in the ſecond yeare of his fathers raigne, namely Anno, 948. was written for a witneſſe in the ſame yeare, to his grant of lands in Bedlaking, to Cuthred one of his Barons, the Charter whereof is extant to bee ſeene vnto this day.

EDVVY THE TVVENTIE EIGHTH KING OF THE VVEST-SAXONS, AND TWENTIE NINTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN: HIS RAIGNE, ACTS, AND DEATH.

CHAPTER XLI.

An.Do.955. EDWY, the eldeſt ſonne of King Edmund, after the deceaſe of his vncle Edred, ſucceeded him in his dominions, and was the twentie eighth King of the Weſt-Saxons, and the twentie ninth Monarch of the Engliſhmen: he began his raigne in the yeare of the worlds ſaluation, 955. and was annointed & crowned at Kingſton vpon Thameſis, by the hands of Otho the 22. Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Edwyes ſinne. (2) Yong hee was in yeares, and vitious of life, if the Monkiſh Story-writers of thoſe times his deadly enemies may be credited, not paſt thirteene when he entred gouernment, and that begun with a capitall ſinne: for they report, that vpon the ſolemne day of his Coronation, and inſight of his Nobles, as they ſate in Counſell, with ſhameleſſe and vnprincelike luſt, he abuſed a Lady of great eſtate, & his neere kinſwoman, whoſe husband ſhortly after he ſlew, the more freely to poſſeſſe his inceſtuous pleaſure: and to fill the pennes of his further infamy ready to their hands, that wrote his life, hee was a great enemy vnto the Monkiſh orders (a ſore in thoſe dayes very tender to be touched, and may well be thought the cauſe of many falſe aſperſions on him,) whom from the Monaſtery of Malmsbury Glaſenbury and others, hee expelled, placing married Prieſts in their roomes: Dunſtan likewiſe the Abbot Saint of Glaſenbury hee baniſhed the Realm, for for his ouer-bold reprehenſions; if not rather for retaining the treaſure deliuered him by King Edred, and demaunded againe in his ſickneſſe; when by the voice (forſooth) of an Angell from heauen, his iourney was ſtaid, and thoſe rich Iewels not deliuered the King in his life; I will not ſay kept backe, leſt Dunſtan with Balaam (whoſe ſtories are not much vnlike) ſhould bee thought to follow (as he did) the wages of deceit.

(3) Howſoeuer, the reuerent opinion of the Monks ſingle life, and the conceiued holines of Abbot Dunſtan in thoſe miſty times, did daily counterpoize young Edwy in eſteeme, which made his beſt acts conſtrued, and recorded to the worſt; inſomuch that his Subiects minds, ebbing as the Sea from the full, drew backe the current of their ſubiectiue affections, and ſet the eye of obedience vpon Prince Edgar his Brother: and albeit his young yeeres may ſeeme to cleare him from the imputation of ſo luſtful a fact, as he is charged with, at the day of his aſſuming the Crowne; and the ſeparation from his wife, (as too neere in conſanguinity) wrought griefe enough in his diſtreſſed heart, yet pittileſſe of his eſtate, and careleſſe of their owne allegiance, the Mercians with the Northumbrians did vtterly caſt off obedience, and ſweare their fealty to Edgar, not fully foureteene yeeres aged: Edwy then raigning in a ſtill decaying eſtate, was held of ſuch his ſubiects, in no better eſteeme, then was Iehoram of Iudah, who is ſaid to haue liued without being deſired: for very griefe whereof after foure yeares raigne hee ended his life, the yeare of our Lord 959: whoſe body was buried in the Church of the new Abbey of Hide at Winchester, erected without the Wall in the North of that City. 1 Chr. 21. 20.

His Wife.

(4) Elfgine, the wife of King Edwy, was a Lady of great beauty, and nobly deſcended, yea, and by ſome deemed ſomewhat too neare in the bloud roiall, to bee matched with him in ſpouſall bed: her fathers name is not recorded, but her mother was Ethelgiue, whom ſome ſcandalized to haue beene his Concubine, and the onely cauſer of Dunſtans baniſhment. The ſubiects diſliking of this vnlawfull marriage, & further inſtigated by the Monkes, (whoſe humorous pleaſures, or diſpleaſures could very much ſway the ſtate in thoſe daies,) failed by degrees to performe their duties to their King, and her they likewiſe enforced to a ſeparation, in the third yeere of his regardleſſe gouernment, and of Chriſt Ieſus, 958. without other mention of her life or death. Iohn Capgraue.

EDGAR SVRNAMED THE PEACEABLE THE THIRTIETH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN, HIS RAIGNE; ACTS, WIVES AND ISSVE.

CHAPTER XLII.

Do. 959.

EDgar, the ſecond ſon of King Edmund hauing raigned two yeares ouer the Merciane and Northumbrians, in the dayes of Edwy his Brother, to the great impairing of King Edwyes reputation and eſteeme; after his death at ſixeteen yeares of age was choſen to ſucceed in all his dominions, and was the thirtieth Monarch of the Engliſhmen, or rather now of whole England, all other titles of Kingdomes falling vnder his ſcepter, and becomming Prouinces annexed vnto his abſolute Monarchie.

(2) He beganne his raigne in the yeere of Chriſts Natiuity, 959. and was crowned (as ſome write) the ſame yeare at Kingſton, vpon Thameſis, by Otho Archbiſhop of Canterbury. But Randulphus Higden in his Polychronicon, referreth it to the twelfth yeere of his raigne: William Monke of Malmesbury to the thirtieth yeare of his age, and the Saxon Chronicle of Polydor Virg. Ran. Higden. Wil. Malm. Saxon Chron.

of Worceſter Church, to the yeere of Chriſt, 972, and that in the City of Bath, hee was annointed and conſecrated with great ſolemnity by Dunſtan Archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Edgar the Peaceable.

(3) The raigne of this King is ſaid to haue beene altogether in a calme tranquility, and therefore hee was ſurnamed the Peaceable; his vertues were many, and vices not a few, the one gloriouſly augmented, and the other fairely excuſed, by thoſe Monkiſh writers, vnto whoſe profeſsions he was moſt fauourable: his Guides were Dunſtan Archbiſhop of Canterbury, Ethelwold Abbot of Glaſenbury, and Oſwald Biſhop of Worceſter, three ſtout Champions againſt the married Clergie, (for women in thoſe dayes were great bugs in their eyes,) therfore the married Prieſts he diſplaced, & brought in Monkes of ſingle life to poſſeſſe their roomes, whoſe ſinnes of incontinency grew after to be great, as the world did then witnes, which cauſed Treuiſa the tranſlator of Higden, to blame King Edgar, charging him to bee lewdly moued in following their counſell againſt married Clerkes.

Policr. lib. 6. cap. 9

wil. Malmsbury.

(4) So doe Malmsbury and Higden taxe him with too fauourable affections towardes the Danes, who dwelled alike in euery town with the Engliſh, though formerly they had ſought the deſtruction of all, and ſtill lay in wait attending for the ſpoile of his true ſubiects, who apt enough vnto euil, lerned the beaſtly ſinne of quaffing, and emptying of cups, which King Edgar was enforced to redreſſe, by enacting a law againſt exceſsiue drinking, ordaining a ſize by certaine pinnes ſet in the pot, with penalties to any that ſhould preſume to drinke deeper then the marke.

cap 38. Sect. 8.

Cron. Wald.

(5) His policie was no leſſe prudent (but much more ſucceſsefull) for the deſtruction of Wolues, that in his daies did great annoiance to the land; for the tribute impoſed vpō the Princes of Wales by the Engliſh King Ethelſtan (as we haue ſaid) he wholy remitted, and in lieu thereof, appointed certaine numbers of Wolues yeerely to bee paid; and Ieuaf, or Iage Prince of North-Wales, did for his part pay him yeerely three hundred, which continued for three yeeres ſpace, but in the fourth was not a Wolfe to bee found, and ſo the tribute ceaſed.

Marianus. Alred Riual. Ran. Higd.

(6) His Nauie roiall, containing three thouſand and ſixe hundred ſhips, he diuided into three parts, appointing euery of them to a ſeuerall quarter to waffe the Seas, and ſecure the coaſts from Pirats, and forraine enemies, wherein himſelfe euery ſummer would ſaile with thoſe in the Eaſt parts, vnto thoſe in the Weſt, and ſending them backe to their charge, would with the Weſt ſaile into the North, and with the northerne fleete compaſſe againe into the Eaſt, whereby the ſeas were ſcowred, and his Kingdom exceedingly ſtrengthned.

Edgars honeſt vigilancy.

(7) The like cuſtome vſed he in the winter ſeaſon in his ieyſts, and circuits throughout his Country, ſo to take account of the adminiſtration of his lawes, and the demeanour of his great men, eſpecially of his Iudges, whom ſeuerely he puniſhed, ſo often as he found the execution of their places ballanced either with bribery or partiality; ſo that there was neuer leſſe robbery, deceit or oppreſſions, thē in the raigne of this worthy King.

Edgars league with diuers Kings.

(8) His ſtate thus flouriſhing in peace and proſperity, he cauſed diuers Princes to bind themſelues vnto his allegiance, but perchance it may iuſtly be doubted, whether in ſuch performance of homage and ſeruice, as Malmsbury, Florentius, Randulphus, Marianus, Houeden, and other writers affirme to haue beene at the City Cheſter, where (they ſay) Kennadie King of Scots, Malcolme of Cumberland, Maxentius an Arch-Pirate, with the petty King of Wales, Duffnall, Griffith, Huual, Iacob, and Iudithil, did with oares row his Barge vpon the riuer Dee, from his Pallace to Saint Iohns Church, and thence againe backe to his Pallace, himſelfe the while ſteering the helme, and ſaying in his glory that then his ſucceſsors might trulie account themſelues Soueraigne Kings of England, when they enioyed ſuch a Prerogatiue of ſublimity, and ſupreme honour: although (ſaith M. Fox) he might much better, and more Chriſtianlike haue ſaid, God forbid that I ſhould reioice, but in the Croſſe of our Lord Ieſus Chriſt.

Gal. 6.14.

(9) Warres he had none in all his raigne; onely towards the end, the Welſhmen moued ſome rebellion, which to preuent, hee aſſembled a mighty Army, and therewith entred into the County of Glamorgan, ſharply puniſhing the ringleaders thereof, but his ſouldiers doing great harms in the country, laden with ſpoiles for the returne, the King out of his bounty commanded all to be againe reſtored, whereby hee purchaſed ſingular loue and honour of the inhabitants.

Monaſtery la by King Edg.

(10) To his magnanimity was ioined much deuotion, but moſt eſpecially towards the Monks, for whom, and for Nunnes hee built and repaired forty ſeuen Monaſteries, intending to haue continued their number vnto fifty, as himſelfe teſtifieth in theſe words of his Charter.

Ex chart. Ed.

The Monaſteries, aſwell of Monks as of Virgins haue beene deſtroied, and quite neglected throughout England, which I haue now determined to repaire to the glory of God for my ſoules health, and ſo to multiply the number of Gods ſeruants and handmaides: and now already I haue ſet vp forty ſeuen Monaſteries with Monks and Nunnes in them, and if Chriſt ſpare me life ſo long, I am determined in offering my deuout munificence to God, to proceed to fifty, euen to the iuſt number of a Iubilee.

M. Fox in his Acts and Monuments.

And by this his Charter did not onely approue the enlargement of S. Maries Monaſterie in Worceſter, and the reſtoring of Votaries in ſtead of married Prieſts, but himſelfe either new founded or repaired many others, as the houſe of Ely, Glaſenbury, Abington, Burgh, Thorney, Ramſey, Wilton, Wenton, Winchorne and Thumſtocke with great coſt, and large endowments, hauing the Clergie in an high and reuerent eſteeme, and moſt of all his Confeſſor Dunſtan: but with this wheate, there were tares growing, though the late Monkiſh Writers bind them vp for good corne: for ſome men tell (ſaith Randulphus Higden) that Edgar in his beginning was cruell to Citizens, and lecherous to maidens, whereof theſe his actions enſuing beare ſufficient witnes.

(12) A like offence hee committed againſt the virgine Ethelfleda, the daughter of Ordmar a Duke among the Eaſt-Angles, who for her ſurpaſsing beauty was ſurnamed the White; on whom he begat his eldeſt ſonne Edward; for which fact as M. Fox affirmeth, hee did his ſeuen yeeres penance inioined by Dunſtan: and indeed by Oſberne it appeareth, that Edward was not legitimate, where he writeth, that the child begotten of the harlot, he baptized in the holy fountaine of regeneration, and ſo giuing his name to bee called Edward, did adopt him to bee his ſonne. With whom agree Nicholas Triuet in his Engliſh ſtory, written in French, Iohannes Paris in his French ſtory, written in Latine, both of them calling Edward a ſonne illegitimate; as alſo doth Vincentius and Antoninus, howbeit William of Malmsbury, Mathew Paris, Mathew of Weſtminſter, Randulphus and others, will haue her his firſt and lawfull wife, and Edward in true matrimony to haue deſcended from them.

(13) An other inſtance of his laſciuious life is produced by the forenamed Writers, and thus both occaſioned and acted. It chanced Edgar to heare a Virgine and daughter to a Weſterne Duke, exceeding dingly praised for her incomparable beauty, the touch of which string from his eare resounded to his heart, and as a bait it drew him presently into those parts; where comming to Andeuer, commanded the damsell to his bed: The mother tender of the Virgins honour, brought in the darke her maid, but not her daughter, who, all as well pleased the King in his sinnefull dalliance: the day approching, this late laid maid made hast to arise, but the King loth to part yet with his supposed faire Lady, demanded why she made such hast? who answered him, that her taske was great, and hardly would her worke be done, if day should preuent her ere she rose; but yet being staied aboue her howre, vpon her knees she made this humble request, that shee might be freed from her shrewde dame, alleadging, it was not fitting, that the woman who had tasted the pleasures of a Kings embracements, should endure a seruitude vnder the rule of any other. The King perceiuing the deceit, and therewith moued to wrath, yet could not recall what hee had done (or rather vndone) and therefore turned his conceiued wrongs vnto a iest; but so, that hee both sharpely checked the deceiuer, and kept this damsell, (whose night-worke and pleasance had fully wonne him) for his Concubine, whereby she ruled them that lately had the command of her: and to vse the words of Malmsbury, he loued this Concubine most entirely, keeping true faith of his bed to her alone, vntill the time he married for his lawful wife Elfrida the daughter of Duke Ordgarus.

(14) His last lasciuious Act, was as Dauids ioyned with bloud, and wrought in manner as followeth. Fames lauish report of beauteous Elfrida (the paragon of her sexe, and wonder of Nature) the only daughter of Ordgarus Duke of Deuonshire, sounded so lowd in those Westerne parts, that the Eccho thereof was heard into King Edgars Court, and entred his eares, which euer lay open, to giue his eyes the scope of desire, and his wanton thoughts the raines of will: to trie the truth whereof, hee secretly sent his minion or fauourite Earle Ethelwold of East-Anglia, who well could iudge of beauty, and knew the diet of the King; with Commission, that if the Pearle proued so orient, it should bee seized for Edgars owne wearing, who ment to make her his Queene, and Ordgarus the Father of a King.

Ethelwold a iolly young Gallant, posted into Deuonshire, and gueſt-wise visited Duke Ordgarus his Court, where seeing the Lady surpassing the report, blamed Fames ouer-sight for sounding her praise in so base and leaden a Trumpet; and wholy surprised with her loue, himselfe beganne to wooe the Virgin, yea, and with her Fathers good liking, so as the King would giue his assent. Earle Ethelwold returning, related that the maide indeed was faire; but yet her beauty much augmented by babling reports, and neither her feature or parts any wise befitting a King. Edgar mistrusting no corriuall in his loue, nor dreaming false fellowship in wooing, did with a sleight thought passe ouer Elfrida, and pitcht his affections the faster another way. Earle Ethelwold following the game now a foot, desired Edgars assistance to bring it to a stand, pretending not so much for any liking to the Lady, as to raise his owne fortunes to be her fathers heire, to which the King yeelded, and for his minion solicited Ordgarus, who glad to be shrowded vnder the fauours of such a fauourite, willingly consented, and his daughters destinies assured to Earle Ethelwold.

The marriage solemnized, and the fruits thereof a short time enioyed; the fame of her beauty beganne againe to bee spread, and that with a larger Epithite then formerly it had beene: Whereupon Edgar much doubting of double dealing, laid his angle faire to take this great gull; and bearing no shew of wrong or suspect, inuited himselfe to hunt in his Parks, and forthwith repairing into those parts, did not a little grace his old seruant, to the great ioy of Ordgarus the Duke: but Ethelwold mistrusting the cause of his comming, thought by one policy to disappoint another: and therefore reuealing the truth to his wife, how in his proceedings hee had wronged her beauty, and deceiued his Soueraigne, requested her loning assistance to saue now his endangered life, which lay in her power, and of the meanes he thus aduised:

Ethelwolds speech to Elfrida.

"Like as (said he) the richest Diamond rough and "vncut, yeelds neither sparkle nor esteeme of great "price, nor the gold vnburnished giues better lu-"stre then the base brasse; so beauty and feature "clad in meane aray, is either sleightly looked at "with an vnfixed eye, or is wholy vnregarded, and "held of no worth; for, according to the Prouerbe, "cloth is the man, and man is the wretch: then to "preuent the thing that I feare, and is likely to proue "my present ruine, and thy last wracke, conceale thy "great beauty from King Edgars eye, and giue him "entertainement in the meanest attires: let them "(I pray thee) for a time bee the nightly curtaines "drawne about our new-Nuptiall bed, and the day-"ly cloudes to hide thy splendent Sunne from his "sharpe, and too too piercing sight, whose vigour & "raies will soone set his waxen wings on fire, that "ready are to melt at a farre softer heat. Pitch (thou "seest) defileth the hand, and we are forbid to giue "occasion of euill: vaile then thy faireneſse with "the scarfes of deformity, from his ouer-lauish and "vnmastered eye; for the faireſt face drawes euer "the gaze, if not the attempts, and natures endow-"ments, are as the bush for the wine, which being "immoderately taken doth surfet the sense, and is a-"gaine cast vp with as loathing a tast. Of these dregs "drunke Amnon after his fill of faire Thamar, Herod "of Miriami, & Æneas of Dido; yea, and not to seeke "examples farre off, King Edgars variation in his vn-"fixed fast motion doth easily bewray it selfe: for "could either holy Wolfhild, beautifull Ethelfled, or "the wanton Wench of Andeuer, keepe the needle "of his compasse certaine at one point? nothing lesse, "but it was still led by the load-stone of his euer "mutable and turning affections. But thou "wilt say, hee is religious, and by founding of Mo-"nasteries hath expiated those sinnes. Indeed ma-"ny are built; for which time and posterities must "thanke holy Dunstan, from whose deuotion those "good deeds haue sprung: but is thy person holi-"er then sacred Wolfhilds; thy birth and beauty grea-"ter then Ethelfled the White, daughter also to a Duke? "the former, of an holy Votary, hee made the sinke "of his pollution; and the later is branded to all "ages, by the hatefull name of a Concubine, and her "sonne among vs esteemed for a Bastard. These "should bee motiues to all beauteous and ver-"tuous Ladies, not to sell their honours at so low "and too-late repented a price. Neither think (sweet "Countesse) that thy husband is iealous, or suspects "thy constancy, which I know is great, and thy selfe "wholy complete with all honourable vertues: but "yet consider I pray thee, that thou art but young, & "maist easily be caught, especially of him that is so "old a Master of the game: neither perswade thy "selfe of such strength, as is able to hold out so "great an assault; for men are mighty, but a King is "much more. I know thou art wise, and enough "hath been said, onely let mee adde this, that euill "beginnings haue neuer good ends: and so with a "kind kisse, hoping hee had wonne his Wife to his "Will, prepared with the first to welcome King Edgar.

Lady Elfrida thus left to her selfe, began seriously to thinke vpon this Curtaine Sermon, whose text she distasted, being taken out of an ouer-worne and threed-bare cloth prouerbe, as though her fortunes had been wholly residing, and altogether consisting in her parentage and apparell, but nothing at all in any parts of her selfe, Elfrida alone.

"Hath my beauty (thought she) been courted of « a King, famoused by report, compared with Helen, « and now must be hid? Must I falsifie and bely Na- « tures bounties, mine owne value, and all mens re- « ports, only to saue his credit, who hath impaired « mine, and belied my worth? And must I needs de- « foule my selfe, to be his only faire foule, that hath « kept me from the State and seat of a Queene? I « know the name of a Countesse is great, and the « Wife of an Earle is honourable, yet no more then « birth and endowments haue assigned for me, had « my beauty been far lesse then it is. He warnes me of « the end, when his owne beginnings were with tre- « chery; tels me the examples of others, but obserues « none himselfe: he is not ielous, forsooth, and yet I « must not looke out; I am his faire, but others pitch, « fire, wine, bush, and what not? Not so holy as Wolf- « hild, nor so white as Ethelsled; and yet that must now « be made far worse then it is. I would men knew the « heate of that cheeke wherein beauty is bla- « zed, then would they with lesse suspect suffer our « faces vnmaskt, to take aire of their eies, and wee no « whit condemnable for shewing that which cannot « be hid, neither in me shall, come of it what will.

And thus resoluing to bee a right woman, desired nothing more then the thing forbidden, and made preparation to put it in practise. Her body shee endulced with the sweetest balmes, displaied her haire, and bespangled it with pearles, bestrewed her breasts and bosome with rubies and diamonds, rich Iewels glittering like starres depended at her necke, and her other ornaments euery way sutable. And thus, rather Angell, then Lady-like, shee attended the approach and entrance of the King, whom with such faire obeisance and seemely grace shereceiued, that Edgars greedie eye presently collecting the raies of her shining beauty, became a burning glasse to his heart, and the sparkle of her faire falling into the traine of his loue, set all his senses on fire: yet dissembling his passions, he passed on to his game, where hauing the false Ethelwold at aduantage, he ranne him through with a Iaueline, and tooke faire Elfrida to his wife.

Ethelwold slaine.

(15) These were the vertues and vices of this King, little in personage, but great in spirit, and the first vnresisted Monarch of the whole Land, whom all the other Saxons acknowledged their supreme, without diuision of Prouinces or title. He raigned sixteene yeeres and two moneths in great tranquillity and honour, and died vpon tuesday the eighth of Iuly, the thirty seuenth of his age, and yeere of Christ 975. whose body with all funerall solemnitie was buried in the Abbey of Glasenburie.

The fifteenth, saith Higden.

His Wiues.

(16) Ethelsled, the first wife of King Edgar, was surnamed in the Saxon English Eneda, in Latine Candida, which with vs is White, because of her exceeding great beauty. Shee was the daughter of a Duke amongst the East-Angles, named Ordmar, and was married vnto him the second yeere of his raigne, and the eighteenth of his age, being the yeere of Christs Natiuitie 961. She was his wife not fully two yeeres, and died the fourth of his raigne, in Anno 962.

Ethelsleds parents.

(17) Elfrida, the second wife of King Edgar, was the widow of slaughtered Ethelwold, of whom wee haue said. She was daughter to Ordgarus, and sister to Ordulfe, both of them Dukes of Deuonshire, and the Founders of Tauestoke Abbey in that Countie: a Ladie of passing great beauty, and as ambitious as faire: for after the Kings death, she procured the murther of King Edward her sonne in law, that her owne sonne Ethelred might come to the Crowne: and afterwards to pacifie his and her first husbands ghost, and to stop the peoples speeches of so wicked a fact, she founded the Abbeys of Ambresbery & Wherwell, in the Counties of Wiltshire and South-hampton.

Elfridas second wife.

His Children.

(18) Edward, the eldest sonne of King Edgar and Queene Ethelsled his first wife, was born in the fourth yeere of his fathers raigne, and a little before his mothers death, in the yeere of Christ Iesus 962. He was a child disposed to all vertue, notwithstanding great meanes was made by his mother in law for the disinheriting of him, and the preferment of her owne son to the succession of the Crowne; yet by prouident care taken in the life time of his father, he succeeded him after his death, as right heire both of his kingdome and conditions.

Edward the eldest sonne.

(19) Edmund, the second sonne of King Edgar, and the first of Queene Elfrida his second wife, was borne in the seuenth yeere of his fathers raigne, being the yeere of grace 965. He liued but foure yeeres, and died in his infancie, in the twelfth yeere of his fathers raigne, and was honourably enterred in the Monasterie of Nunnes, at Ramsey in Hampshire, which King Edgar had founded.

Edmund the second sonne.

(20) Ethelred, the third sonne of King Edgar, and the second of Queene Elfreda his second wife, and the last of them both, was borne in the eighth yeere of his fathers raigne, and yeere of saluation 966. He was vertuously inclined, beautifull in complexion, and comly of stature; at the death of his father being but seuen yeers old, and at his brothers murther ten: which deed he sore lamented, to the great discontentment of his mother, who for his aduancement had complotted the same, and wherein at those yeeres he vnwillingly succeeded him.

Ethelred the third sonne.

(21) Edgith, the naturall daughter of King Edgar, had to her mother a Lady named Wolfhild, the daughter of Wolfhelm, the sonne of Byrding, the sonne of Nesting, the two latter bearing in their names the memorie of their fortunes: the last of them being found in an Eagles nest, by King Elfred as he was on hunting. This Edgith was a vailed Nunne in the Monastery of wilton, and according to some Authors, made Abbesse thereof by her father at fifteene yeeres of age, saith her Legend. She died the fifteenth day of September, the yeere of her age twenty three; the sixt of her brother King Ethelreds raigne, and of Christ Iesus 984. By all which accounts it is manifest, that she was borne before Edward, and by Master Fox proued, that for him, and not for her, King Edgar did his seuen yeeres penance. She is greatly commended for her chastitie and beauty, which later she somewhat augmented with more curious attire then to her profession was beseeming: for which Bishoppe Ethelwold sharply reproued her; who answered him roundly, that God regarded the heart more then the garment, and that sins might bee couered as well vnder rags as robes.

Edgith.

This Edgith, as Iohn Capgraue reporteth, after the slaughter of her brother Edward, the holy Archbishop Dunstan would haue aduanced to the Crown, & inuested her against Ethelred the lawfull heire, had she not by the late experience of Edwards fall, vtterly refused that title, which neither belonged to her right, nor was safe for her person to vndertake. Her body was buried at Wilton, in the Monastery and Church of Saint Denisse, which her selfe had caused to bee built.

CHAPTER XLIII.

Great were the troubles & ſidings that preſently enſued the death of King Edgar, about the election of one of his ſons to ſucceed; Queene Elfrida with Alferus Duke of Mercia, and many other Nobles combined for young Ethelred, diſauowing Prince Edward as illegitimate, and therfore not reputable for ſucceſſion: againſt them and Ethelred ſtood Dunſtan and the Monkes, holding their ſtates dangerous,& their new-gotten footing vnſure, if in the nonage of the King, theſe their oppoſites ſhould rule all vnder him; whereas Edward was altogether wrought in their mould; whoſe title they abetted, as being lawfully borne, and begot in the nuptiall bed of Queene Ethelfleda. Their claimes thus banded amongſt theſe Stateſ-men, began to be diuerſly affected among the Commons, and had put the game to the hazard, if the wiſedome of Dunſtan had not ſeene to the chaſe; for a Councell being aſſembled to argue their rights, the Archbiſhop came in with his banner and croſſe, and not ſtaying for further debating de iure, did de facto, preſent Prince Edward for their lawfull King; and the aſſembly conſiſting moſt of Clergy-men, perſwading peace, drew the approbation of the reſt, and ſo was the Prince admitted and proclaimed their Soueraigne.

(2) He beganne his raigne at twelue yeares of age, in the yeare of Saluation 975, and was ſoone after by Archbiſhop Dunſtan crowned King at Kingſton vpon Thameſis: being the thirtie one Monarch (ſince Hengiſt) of the Engliſhmen. His beginning was miſerably afflicted with barrenneſſe of the ground, famine amongſt his people, morraine of cattle, and to their further terrour, a fearefull Comet appeared: which men thought to bee ſignes from heauen, as ſent from God, for the ſinnes committed againſt the married Clergy, whoſe cauſe was much pitied, eſpecially of the Nobles, & whoſe complaints of wrongs they inſtantly vrged, that without deſerts they were expulſed from their ancient poſſeſſions; a thing which neither God nor goodmen euer allowed, and was contrary to the preſcript rule of Chriſt, that wils vs to doe, as wee would be done vnto: whereto the Monkes anſwered, that Chriſt reſpected neither the perſon nor place, but onely them that tooke vp the Croſſe of Penance and followed him, as themſelues in their ſingle life pretended to doe. But they good men little knew the incumbrances of wiuing; for otherwiſe they would haue felt, that the condition of the married, was more truly a ſuffering of the Croſſe, and enduring of Penance. Wil. Malmſb. Fox.

(3) Theſe Church men thus diuided and rent, were diuerſly ſided as affection did moue, and that not onely of the meaner ſort, but euen of the Nobles & great Ones; for the Mercian Duke Alferus fauouring the iuſt cauſe of married Prieſts, deſtroied the Monaſteries in his Prouince, caſt out the Monkes, and reſtored againe the ancient reuenewes to them & their wiues: contrariwiſe, in Eaſt-Anglia the Prieſts went to wracke, where the Monks were maintained by the authority of Edelwin their Duke, who in their quarrell, with the aſsiſtance of his brother Alfred, and of Brightnoth Earle of Eſſex, raiſed a mighty Army, and ſtood with that power for their defence. Wil. Malm. Simon Dun. Ran. Higd. Iohn Capgraue. Iornalenſis in vita Edgari.

(4) The fire thus blown from a ſparke to a flame, was feared to mount higher, if not quenched in time, and therefore by mediation, armes laid aſide, the cauſe was referred to be heard in Councel, & at Wincheſter firſt the aſſembly was held, where after long diſpute, and much againſt the Monkes, it was greatly ſuſpected their ſide had gone down, but that the matter was referred from them to the Roode, placed vpon on the refectorie Wall, where the Councell ſate. To this great Oracle S. Dunſtan, deſired them deuoutely to pray, and to giue diligent eare for an anſwere: who, with as great bounty, as they in deuotion, made it not ſquemiſh to giue them this aduice; God forbid it ſhould be ſo, God forbid it ſhould be ſo (ſaid he,) you iudged well once, and to change that againe is not good.

Dunſtans counſell.

This was authority ſufficient to ſuppreſſe the Prieſts, who now with their wiues went downe the wind; and indeed too blame they were to ſuſpect this their Iudge, who neuer was heard to giue wrong ſentence before: but they, vnſatisfied men, thought once more to blow the coale, though therewith they were likely to burne their owne lips; for perſwading the people, that this was but a ſubtile practiſe of the Monks, in placing behind the wall a man of their owne, who through a truncke vttered thoſe words in the mouth of the Roode; it was therfore inſtantly deſired, that the cauſe might once more come to ſcanning.

The Prieſts' ſuſpition of the Monkes.

An. Do. 977. (5) This laſtly was granted, and a great aſſembly congregated at Cleue in Wiltſhire, whither repaired the Prelates with moſt of the States of the land, beſides Gentlemen and Commons an innumerable ſort.

This Synode being ſet, and the controuerſie propounded, a hote and ſharpe diſputation enſued, and a while was maintained with many bitter inuectiues, ill beſeeming ſuch perſons: But whether through the weakeneſſe of the foundation, or the ouer-preſſe of weight, or both, the ioyſts of this vpper-loft, wherein the Councell was held, ſuddainly brake, and downe fell the flore with all the people thereon, whereof many were hurt, and ſome ſlaine outright, onely Archbiſhop Dunſtan then Preſident, and mouth for the Monkes remained vnhurt: for the Poſt whereon his chaire was ſet (and not without miracle) ſtood wholy vntouched.

Polychr. lib. 6. c. 12

Thus by this fall, fel the cauſe of the ſecular Prieſts; and the Monkiſh foundations vnderpropped with more ſurer pillars, Dunſtan vnburdened of many imputations, the peoples affections drawne to the Monkes, and the Prieſts at liberty now to accompany their wiues without any cure, though not without care; and all this was wrought by the prouidence of Dunſtan, and his ſtrange preſeruation on the poſt; no leſſe wonderfull then that which with the like truth is related of him, how when a huge beam of a houſe was ſuncke out of the frame, and like to ruinate the whole building, with onely making of the ſigne of the Croſſe thereon, with his fingers hee made it returne to his former place: ſo wonderfully potent was he in ſuch woodden miracles. To which, why ſhould wee not giue credite, ſince the very Harpe which hee had touched could worke miracles? as when of it ſelfe it ſounded melodiouſly that Hymne, Gaudent in cœlis anima Sanctorum, &c. Yea ſith the bleſſed virgine Mary her ſelfe, is ſaid to haue come to ſolace him with her ſongs, Cantemus Domino Socia, &c. For, as for Angels ſinging familiarly vnto him, and Diuels in ſhape of dogs, foxes and beares, whipped by him, that was but ordinary; as likewiſe his making the ſhee-diuel to roare, when comming to tempt him to dalliance, in ſhape of a beautifull laſſe, hee caught her by the noſe with hote burning pincers, and ſo ſpoilde a good face. But to leaue thoſe figments wherewith our Monkiſh ſtories are ſtuffed to the deluding of their Readers, and diſhonouring of thoſe, whom thereby they thinke to magnifie; let vs looke backe to yong Prince Edward.

(6) Who in all princely parts was an Imitator of his Father, and for his modeſt gentleneſſe worthily fauoured of all men: but as enuy is alwaies the attendant of vertue; ſo had he them that much maligned his life, namely, the fauourites of Prince Ethelred, whereof Queene Elfrida his mother was chiefe, who laſtly betraied him, and that in this maner.

(7) King Edward for his diſport was hunting in a forreſt neere vnto the ſea, vpon the ſouth-caſt ſhore of the County Derſet, and in the Iland Purbeck; not farre off, vpon a ſmall riuer, ſtood pleaſantly ſeated a faire and ſtrong Caſtle called Corfe, where his mother in law Queene Elfrida, with his brother Prince Ethelred, were then therein reſiding: Edward that euer had beene louing to both, held it a kind office, now being ſo neere to viſite them with his preſence, and thereupon either of purpoſe or chance ſingled from his attendants, hee ſecretly ſtole from them all, and came alone to the caſtle gate.

(8) The Queene who had long laine in wait for occaſions, now tooke this as brought to her hand, and therefore with a face as meaning no guile, ſhee humbly and cheerefully gaue the King welcome, deſiring him to grace her and her ſonne with his preſence for that night; but hee with thanks refuſed the offer, as fearing leaſt his company would ſoone find him miſsing, and craued onely of his mother a cup of wine, that in his ſaddle hee might drinke to her and his brother, and ſo bee gone. The cuppe was no ſooner at his mouth, then a knife in his backe, which a ſeruant appointed by this trecherous Queene ſtroke into him; who feeling himſelfe hurt ſet ſpurs to his horſe, thinking to eſcape to his more faithfull company.

(9) But the wound being mortall, and he fainting through loſſe of much bloud, fell from his horſe, and one foot entangled in the ſtirruppe, hee was thereby rufully dragde vp and downe through woods and lands; and laſtly left dead at Corfes-gate: which hapned the eighteenth day of May, after hee had raigned three yeares and ſixe (ſome ſay eight) monethes, the yeare of his age ſixeteene, and of Chriſt Ieſus 979. His body found, was firſt buried at Warham without all funerall pompe, but after three yeeres by Duke Alferus remoued, and with great celebrity enterred in the Minſter of Shaftesbury: and for this vntimely death, he gained the ſurname of Martyr.

(10) Queene Elfrida ſore repenting her cruell and ſtep-motherly fact, to expiate her guilt, and pacifie the crying bloud of her ſlaine ſonne, buik the two ſaid Monaſteries of Almesbury and Worwell in the Counties of wilt-ſhire and Southampton, in which later ſhe liued with great repentance and penance vntill the day of her death, and in the ſame lieth her body enterred.

Theſe and other the like foundations built vpon the occaſion of rapine & bloud, howſoeuer they may ſhew the ſorrowfull repentance of their founders: yet their ſtones being laide with the ſimmond of murther, and the morter tempered with bloud, haue felt the wrath of him, who by his Prophet hath pronounced, that from the wall the ſtone ſhall crie, and the beame out of the timber ſhall anſwere it; Woe vnto him that buildeth a towne with bloud, and erecteth a City by iniquity.

CHAPTER XLIIII.

Ethelred the ſonne of King Edgar, & brother to King Edward the Martyr, at the age of twelue yeers entred his gouernment ouer the Engliſhmen, the yeere of mans ſaluation, 979, and was the two and thirtieth Monarch ſince King Hengiſt: he was crowned King at Kingſton vpon Thameſis the foureteenth of April, being Eaſter day, by the hands of Dunſtan Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, who did it much againſt his will.

(2) He was a man neither forward in action, nor fortunate in proceedings, and therefore commonly called the Vnready: his youth was ſpent in idlenes, feeding his ſenſes with all voluptuous baites, his middle yeares with a careleſſe gouernment, maintaining ciuill diſſenſions, and his latter end deſeruingly in continuall reſiſtance of the bloud-thirſty Danes. With theſe imputations by writers hee is taxed, though we find no ſuch iuſt cauſe in recording his life; but to ſuch extreames are euen great Monarches themſelues brought, that their breath and dignity once left and laid downe, they are ſubiect to the cenſures of euery affectionate and malignant reporter. And that this King lay lyable to ſuch mens humors, the working of Dunſtan euer againſt him, is a ſufficient witnes, who not onely did refuſe to act his Coronation, but would haue preferred Lady Edgith a baſtard before him to the Crown, as we haue ſaid. And beſides the generall quarrell of the Monkes and married Prieſts, to which later himſelfe and his Abetters were better inclined, his iuſt indignation conceiued againſt the Biſhop of Rocheſter, and that not pacified without the Biſhops ſubmiſsion and payment of money, was cauſe inough for thoſe Monkiſh Writers to brand the Lords Annointed with their marks of infamie, vnto whom they impute the miſeries of thoſe times, and the deſtruction of the Engliſh by the intruding Danes.

(3) Theſe Danes had kept quiet euer ſince the diſliked raigne of King Edwy, without any notable attempts, for the ſpace of twenty two yeares: but now perceiuing the hearts of the ſubiects to bee drawn from their Soueraigne, they thought it a ſufficient occaſion to forward their intendements; and omitting no time, in the ſecond of his raigne with ſeuen ſhips they arriued vpon the coaſt of Kent, ſpoiling the Country, but moſt eſpecially the Iland Thanat, from whence they did great hurt likewiſe to the towne of Southampton. An.Do.980.

The Engliſh led in diſlike of young Ethelreds gouernment, were the rather drawne to impute theſe and other aduerſities to this vnfortunate Prince, by reaſon of a prediction of Dunſtan, who had propheſied, That they ſhould not bee free from bloud and ſword, till there came a people of an vnknowne tongue, that ſhould bring them to thraldome: and that opinion was skrewed deeper into their fearefull conceit, by a cloud appearing of bloud and fire, immediately after his vnaffected Coronation. Polycr. lib. 8. cap. 13 heart of the City is now, was then neither beautiful, nor orderly built; what time alſo raged a ſickneſſe till then vnknowne in England, which was a ſtrong burning feuer, and bloody fluxe, as alſo ſcarſity of victuals, and murraine among cattle. This hand of God thus correcting the ſinnes of all, was receiued as ſent for the offences of ſome few, and wholly imputed to the King and his Raiſers; Dunſtan ſtill propheſying further woes to the land, when himſelfe ſhould be dead.

(4) The next yeere, thoſe rouing Danes entred the Britiſh Seas, and coaſting to Cornwall deſtroied there the Abbey of Saint Patrick, Porland in Deuonſhire, and many other places vpon thoſe ſhores; the like was done vnto Cheſhire by the Norway-Pirates, which broke into thoſe parts in the ſame yeare. (5) And theſe calamities were ſeconded with others as fearefull; for in the yeare 982. the City London was miſerably deſtroied and defaced by fire, whoſe beauty then chiefly extended from Ludgate weſtward; for, that within the walles, and where the An.Do.982. Th. Rudburne. John Stow.

Polychron. lib. 6. cap. 13.

(6) The Danes hereupon more boldly aſſaulted each ſhore, and in ſo many places at once, that the Engliſh were to ſeeke, where firſt to withſtand. In the Weſt they were encountred by Goda Earle of Deuonſhire, as ſaith Simon Dunelmenſis, by whom they were ouerthrowne, though with the loſſe of his life, as alſo of Sternwold a man of great eſteeme and valour in thoſe parts, who ſerued there vnder him.

(7) In the Eaſt their leaders Iuſtine and Guthmond warred with better ſucceſſe; for at Malden in Eſſex they gaue Brightnod the Earle, a great and bloody battaile, wherein himſelfe with moſt of his people were ſlaine. The Danes thus proſpering, more boldly went forward; and where they ſet their tallants, there they held faſt, and lay on the land like vnto Graſhoppers. Theſe euils King Ethelred could not redreſſe, his ſtrengthes being ſmall, and his ſubiects affections leſſe; therefore calling to Counſell his Stateſmen & Peeres, demanded their aduice what was beſt to bee done. Some few of theſe proffered the King their aſſiſtance, but more of them perſwaded vnto a compoſition, whereof Siricius Archbiſhop of Caterbury was chiefe; and in fine, ten thouſand pounds paid to the Danes for their departure.

(8) This golden Mine once entred, was more eagerly digged into, by theſe ſtill-thirſting Danes, who finding the branch ſo beneficiall at firſt, hoped the veine in following, would proue farre more bountifull, and therefore regardleſſe of promiſe, the next yeere prepared themſelues againe for England, and with a great fleete diſpatched to ſea: the newes whereof ſtrucke ſuch terror into the Engliſh hearts, that deſpairing of hope, they accounted themſelues the bond-ſlaues of miſery: The King therfore with much adoe prepared a Nauie, whereof hee made Elfrick Earle of Mercia Admirall; who ſetting from London vnto the ſeas, had power ſufficient to put backe the enemy: but hee once a traitor could neuer proue true; for, hauing been baniſhed, forgiuen, and now taken into fauour, found meanes to bee falſe, and to betray his charge; and ſending the enemy intelligence of his power and intents, gaue the way to their eſcape; and another fleete of Danes encountring with the Kings, at firſt hee fainedly and faintly fought againſt; and laſtly, turned to their ſide; through which treaſon many Engliſhmen died, and the Kings Fleete and power was greatly weakened; but he eſcaping due puniſhment himſelfe, left his ſonne to anſwere the fault, whoſe eyes King Ethelred cauſed to be put out.

At what time alſo other of the Danes with ninety foure ſhips ſailed vp the riuer Thameſis, and laid their ſiege againſt London, giuing it a great aſſault; but the Citizens thereof ſo manfully defended themſelues, that they chaſed the Danes thence to their ſhame and great loſſe: yet fell they ſo foule vpon Eſſex, Kent, Suſſex, and Hampſhire, that the King was enforced to compound a peace, with the

(13) King Ethelred thus rid of theſe his vnlooked for gueſts, ſought to remoue thoſe leigers that lay in Cumberland, whither hee repaired, and with ſore warre waſted the Country, before whoſe ſword the Danes were not able to ſtand; which ſomewhat encouraged the ſpirits of his people, and bettered their conceits towardes him: but farre this ſunne paſt not without a cloud, nor was his ſucceſſe entailde to be fortunate.

(14) For the next yeare, thoſe Danes that departed from Kent, came now from Normandy with their full ſailes, and landing in Exmouth, their firſt and greateſt fury was againſt the City of Exceter, which when they fiercely beſieged, they were ſo valiantly beaten by the Citizens, as that enraged aboue meaſure with the ignominy of that repulſe, they thence as a ſodaine floud bare downe all that ſtood in their way; and then plainely beganne to appeare the riſe of the Danes, which euery where lorded it, where they had to doe, and the fall of the Saxons, whoſe ouertopped Monarchy, and weake walles now wanted props to hold vp the weight; for the Captains of the Engliſh (ſaith Higden) wanting lore in deeds of Arms, their direction neuer proſpered; if ſhips were made they neuer ſped well, but were either chaſed of the enemy, or deſtroied by tempeſt; if the Nobles euer aſſembled to conſult of the State, that time was rather ſpent in whetting the ſpleene each againſt other, then iointly agreeing how to redreſſe their preſent danger, or to repreſſe the common enemy: for moſt of the Nobles were allianced into the Daniſh bloud, whereby not onely the ſecret of thoſe conſultations were reuealed, but being imploied in ſeruice, many of them reuolted to the enemy. The Clergy as backward as any, denied the King their aſsiſtance, pleading their exemptions from warre, and priuiledge of the Church, when the land lay bleeding and deploring for helpe, and ſcandalized all his other proceedings for demaunding their aide: to theſe were ioined ſcarſity, hunger and robberies. Theſe miſeries cauſed the ſummes of their compoſitions to bee augmented, whoſe laſt was ſixteene thouſand, now twenty thouſand, immediately twenty four, then thirty, and laſtly, forty thouſand pounds, vntill the land was emptied of all the coine; the Kingdome of her glory; the Nobles of courage; the Com-

(15) The Danes thus preuailing, did not a little glory in their fortunes, and grieued the poore Engliſh, whoſe ſeruice they emploied to eare and till the ground, whileſt themſelues ſate idle, & eate the fruit of their paines, abuſing the wiues and daughters of their hoſts where they lay, and yet in euery place for feare and reuerence were called the Lord-Danes, (which afterwards becam a word of deriſion to ſuch ſturdy and lazy lozels) ſo that the like daies of miſerie the land neuer felt. To redreſſe which, the carefull King Ethelred was farre too weake, and therfore intending to doe that by policy, which he could not by ſtrength, he deuiſed a deſperate ſtratagem that proued the deſtruction of the Saxons royall bloud, and conqueſt of the land to another nation.

(16) For ſeeking to disburden the Realme of theſe deuouring Danes, which by open force hee could no waies doe; he attempted in a bloudy maſſacre to deſtroy them, giuing a ſecret commiſsion vnto euery City within his dominions, that at an appointed time they ſhould ſet vpon, and kill all the Danes; the day was the thirteenth of Nouember, being the feſtiuall of S. Bricius, the yeare of Chriſt Ieſus 1002, and preſently after his marriage with Emma, the flower of Normandy; in confidence of which affinity, hee preſumed to do what he did. His commaund was accordingly performed, and with ſuch rigour, that in Oxford the fearefull Danes for refuge tooke into the Church of S. Frideſwyd, as into a Sanctuary of venerable antiquity and priuiledge among ancient Kings; but they in fury regarding neither place nor perſon, ſet the Church on fire, wherein were burned a great ſort of thoſe Danes with many rich ornaments, and the Library thereof vtterly defaced. At which time (if Malmsbury ſay true) King Ethelred himſelf was in that City, and had ſummoned a Parliament both of Danes and Engliſh, with which euen the King was much grieued: and therefore at his very great coſt beautifully repaired the Church, and all the loſſes accruing by the fire, endowing it with large priuiledges and donations, as appeareth by his owne Charter, mentioning the tenour of that Daniſh ſlaughter.

In this maſſacre, Lady Gunhild, ſiſter to Swaine King of Denmarke, a great and continuall friend to the Engliſh, with her husband and ſonne, together were ſlaughtered, although ſhe lay in hoſtage vpon conditions of peace, whoſe husbands name was Palingus (ſaith Malmsbury) an Earle of great might, & both of them Chriſtians.

(17) Newes brought into Denmarke of this ſuddaine ſtratagem, no neede there was to vrge them to reuenge, or to adde more fuell vnto that ouer kindled fire; for preparation being made, the yeere enſuing, Swain with a great Nauy landed in the weſt, ſpoiled the Country, and gaue aſſault to the City of Exceter, which by the trechery of one Hugh a Norman (whom in the fauour of the Queen, King Ethelred had made Gouernour of that City) he razed and leuelled with the ground, all along from the Eaſtgate to the Weſt.

This treaſon and ſtirres great of themſelues, but made much more rufull in the relating, cauſed Ethelred preſently to muſter his men; ouer whom hee made Earle Edrik (for his couetouſnes ſurnamed Streton) his Generall, who bare a braue ſhew till it came to the puſh, and day of battle: but then to couer his treaſon, he fained himſelfe ſicke, and left his ſouldiers to ſhift as they could. The Danes hereupon rifled Wilton, and paſsing forward tooke Salisburie in their way, to which they were as welcome as water into ſhips; but hearing that the King himſelfe in perſon was preparing to giue them battle, they left the land, and tooke againe to ſea.

(18) The next yeare following, (which was the twenty foure of King Ethelreds raigne, and of grace, one thouſand and foure,) King Swaine with a mighty fleete of ſhips arriued vpon the coaſts of Norffolke, where landing his men, hee made ſpoile of all before him, and comming to Norwich ſacked the City, with great ſlaughter of the Citizens; then tooke he Thetford, and ſet it on fire, notwithſtanding hee had entred a truce with them: but for want of victuall which then was ſcarſe in the land, he returned to ſea, and ſo into Denmarke.

King Ethelred seeing no truth in their promises, nor quietnesse in State, his landthus exhausted of prouision and coine, thought it best to aduenture once for all, and to commit his cause vnto God, by the fortune of warre. To which end hee gathered his power, and comming vnlooked for, when the enemy was altogether vnprepared, and taken at disaduantage, he had made an end of the quarrell if wicked Edrick had not perswaded him from fight, and

The Danes forrage the Countries before them (25) Neither rested they there long in quiet, ere, as people wholly deuoted to spoile, they brake into Buckinghame, Bedford, and Northampton-shiers, the chief Towne of which last, they set on fire after much slaughter of the Inhabitants; and thence entring Wiltshire depopulated all before them, which was the seauenth Shire in number that they had laid wast like a solitude.

(27) But King Swaine hearing of the dissensions,

An.D.1013. and weakenesse of the land, in the yeare of Grace, 1013, with a great number of ships arriued in the mouth of Humber, and entring Trent landed at Gainsborough; whose terrour stroke so deepe into the Northumbrians conceites, that they with them of Lyndsey yeelded themselues to the yoake of his subiection, so that now ouer all the North from Watling street he raigned sole King, and exacted pledges from them for their further obedience. From the North hee sought to spread his wings further into the South, and leauing his sonne Canute to take charge of his shippes, and new conquered countries, sped himselfe through Mercia to Oxford and Winchester, bringing all vnder the power of his commaund: with which gales of his fortunes, hee was so puffed vp, that thinking nothing vnpossible for him and his Danes to doe, in the heat of his courage he came vnto London, and presently begirt the walles with a strait siege.

(28) In the City lay vnfortunate King Ethelred, who (as Simon Monke of Durham reporteth) had with him, and vnder his pay Turkillus the Danish Prince before spoken of, and forty fiue Danish ships to defend the coasts. King Swaine at his first comming fiercely assaulted the City, hoping his fortunes would haue proued as before; but the presence of the King, and London the eye of the land, made the Citizens aboue measure couragious, who beat the Danes from their walles, and sallying forth of the Gates, slew them on heapes, so that Swain himselfe was in great danger, had hee not desperately runne through the midst of his enemies, and by flight escaped their swords; marching both day and night in great feare vntill hee had entred Bath, where Ethelmere Earle of Deuonshire with his Westerne people submitted themselues vnto him. But this last ouerthrow, and want of victuals, caused him after he had receiued a certaine summe of money, to hast into Denmarke, minding with more power, and better aduantage to prosecute the quarrell.

(29) Not long it was ere he returned, and immediately was met by the English, where betwixt them was strucke a fierce battaile, which had been with good successe, had not the treasons of some hindered it, in turning to the Danes. King Ethelred therefore seeing himselfe, and land betraied in this manner, to those few true English that were left, he vsed this speech as followeth.

"to feare the losse of our Kingdom, and you the "extinct of the English nations renowne; therefore "seeing the enemies are at hand, and their hands at "our throats; let vs by foresight and counsell saue "our owne liues, or else by courage sheath our "swords in their bowels: either of which I am wil- "ling to enter into, to secure our estate and nation "from an irrecouerable ruine.

(31) This lamentable Oration deliuered from the passions of a iustly-pensiue King, touched the hearers to the heartes, and asmuch distracted their afflicted minds: to abide battaile they saw it was bootlesse, the treason of their leaders so many times defeating their victories; to yeeld themselues to the enemy, would but beginne their seruitude and misery; and to flee before them, their eternall ignominy and reproch.

Thus their opinions were canuased, but nothing put in practise, whereas meane whiles the Danes went forward with victories, and had got the most part of the land, yea and London also by submission; wherewith vnfortunate Ethelred more and more dejected, sent his wife Emma with his two sonnes by her, vnto her brother Richard Duke of Normandy, and for his owne safest refuge committed himselfe vnto Turkil the Dane, in whose shippes he remained a while at Greenewich, and from thence went into the Isle of Wight, where he abode most part of the winter, and thence sailed into Normandy to his wife and brother, leauing the Danes lording it in his realme.

(32) These were the daies of Englands mourning, shee being vnable to maintaine her defenders, and yet enforced to nourish and cherish her deuourers: for the Danes in two factions most cruelly afflicted the land like two milstones crushing & grinding the grain. Swayn as an absolute King, extorted of the English both victuals and pay for his souldiers: and Turkil on the other side, in defence of the English, commanded the like for his ships and men; so that the Danes had all, and the English maintained all. Neither were churches free from their spoils, (whom other Conquerors haue held most impious to violate,) but either suffered the flames of their consuming fire, or were forced to purchase their standings with great summes of money. Such composition King Swaine demaunded for the preseruation of S. Edmunds Monastery in Suffolke; which because the Inhabitants refused to pay, he threatned spoile both to the place, & to the Martyrs bones there enterred; in the midst of which iollity (saith Houeden) he suddainely cried out that he was strucke by S. Edmund with a sword, being then in the midst of his Nobles, and no man seeing from whose hand it came; and so with great horrour and torment, three daies after vpon the third of February ended his life at Thetford (others say at Gainsborough:) but with his death died not the title of the Danes, who immediately aduanced Canutus his sonne for their King.

(33) The English that liked nothing lesse then bondage, especially vnder such tyrannizing intruders, thought now or neuer the time to shake off the yoake; and therefore with great ioy and hast sent into Normandy for their native King. Ethelred now not vnreadie for the recouering of his right, forestowed no meanes either to hasten or strengthen the enterprize, and hauing the assistance of his brother of Normandy, in the Lent following landed in England, vnto whom resorted the people from all parts, accounting it their greatest ioy to see the face of their King.

(34) Canutus then at Gainsborough, Souldier-like mustered and managed his men, and holding it good policie to keepe that by bounty, which his father had got by tyranny, made no spare to purchase the hearts of the English; by which meanes those of Lyndsey became his Creatures, with an agreement to find him both horse and men against their owne King and Country.

Ethelred therefore now raging for reuenge, with a mighty host entered Lyndsey, where hee burnt all the Country, and put the inhabitants to the sword. Canute not able to resist this puissant Army, held the sea more safe for him then the land; and entring Humber, sailed to Sandwich, where being sore grieued at the miseries of these his confederates, required King Ethelreds friends with the like, and commaunded that those pledges which had beene deliuered by the Nobles vnto his Father, should haue their noses slit, and their hands cut off; which cruelty acted, hee sailed to Denmarke, as hopelesse of any good issue in England.

He is chased by Ethelred.

Wil. Malm.

(35) But Turkil the Dane, retained (as we said) into King Ethelreds pay, seeing successe so sodainely altered, sore repented him of his reuolt from the Danes, and knowing now the time to recouer his reputation, with nine of his shippes sailed into Denmarke, instantly importuning Canut to addresse againe for England; alleadging the feares and weaknesse of the people, the beauty and fertility of the land, an Eden, in respect of their owne barren seat, and (which did most moue) himselfe would assist, when the English least thought it: with these and the like hee spurred him on, who of himselfe was forward in a full curriere.

Turkil inciteth Canut against England.

Canutus therefore with the aide of his brother Harrold, rigged forth a Nauie of two hundred saile, all furnished with souldiers and abiliments of warre, whose terror landed in England before him, and his power by report made greater then it was; and to encrease the terrour of this fearefull enemy, the sea with a spring-tide brake into this land, and destroyed both townes and many inhabitants; a signe foreshewing (as was thought) the successe of that fleete, borne hitherward vpon those waues; and to encrease the English miseries, thirty thousand pound was then collected by way of Tribute to pay the Danish auxiliary Nauy lying before Greenewich. The States also conuening in a grand Councell at Oxford to determine vpon the great affaires of the Kingdom, were diuided into factions, and two Noblemen of the Danes there murthered by practise of Edrick the Traitor. These (I say) were accounted ominous amongst the English, that made each mole-hill to seeme a mountaine, and euery shadow the shew of an enemy.

(36) In the meane while Canutus had landed at Sandwich, and giuen a great ouerthrow to the English; entred Kent, and by his sword had made way through the Countries of Dorset, Sommerset, and Wilton.

Wil. Malmsbury. Henry Hunt. Mat. Westminster. Simon Dunel.

Ethelred lying dangerously sicke at Cosham, the managing of these warres was transferred to Prince Edmund his sonne, who preparing to meete the enemie with his Army in the field, had sodainely notice that Edrik his brother in-law ment to betray him into his enemies hands; which newes strucke a great astonishment vnto his heart, and caused him to retrait his host into a place of security; whereby Edrik perceiuing his trecherous purposes were discloased, gaue more open proofe of his intendments, flying to the enemy with forty of the Kings shippes; whereupon all the west Countries submitted themselus vnto Canutus.

(37) By this time King Ethelred had recouered his sicknesse, and minding reuenge on his most wicked sonne Edrik, with purpose to trie his last fortunes by hazard of fight, summond all his forces to meete him at a certaine day and place; where being assembled, he was instantly warned not to giue battaile, for that his owne subiects ment to betray him.

An. D. 1016.

King Ethelred euer vnfortunate in this, to find treasons amongst them that ought him most trust, withdrew himselfe to London, whose seruice against the Danes he had lately seene, and therefore accounted his person most sure in their walles. Prince Edmund with his power posted ouer Humber, where obtaining Earle Vtred to side in his quarrell, entred the Countries of Stafford, Leiceſter, and Shropſhires; not ſparing to exercile any cruelty vpon theſe inhabitants, as a condigne recompence for their reuolt. Neither did Canut for his part ſpare the Kings ſubiects, but through Buckingham, Bedford, Huntington, Nottingham, Lincolne, and Yorkeſhires, made ſpoile of all, ſo that the miſerable Engliſh went to wracke on all ſides; inſomuch that Vtred alſo forſaking Edmund, became ſubiect to Canut: whereupon Edmund haſted to London to ioine his ſtrength with his Fathers, and Canute with no leſſe ſpeed ſailed about the Coaſts into Thameſis, preparing his Armie for the ſiege of London.

(38) At which time King Ethelred, either faln into relapſe of his laſt ſickneſſe, or tired with the many troubles, and daily renued treaſons againſt him, gaue vp his ghoſt, and found reſt by death, which neuer hee could attaine by life, the twenty third of April, and yeere of our Saluation 1016, when he had moſt vnfortunately raigned thirty ſeuen yeeres, and nine daies: his body was there buried in the Cathedrall Church of S. Paul, and bones as yet remaine in the north-wall of the Chancell in a cheſt of grey-Marble, reared vpon foure ſmall pillers, couered with a copped ſtone of the ſame, adioining to another of the like forme, wherein Sebby King of the Eaſt-Saxons lieth intombed.

(39) Of Parſonage he was very ſeemely, and of countenance gratious, affable and courteous to his Subiects, and a maintainer of iuſtice among them, as by his excellent Lawes which himſelfe made, and by his ſharpe, but godly and wiſe cenſures againſt vnlearned, bribing, delaying, partiall Iudges & Lawyers, and their purloining officers (at large ſet down by M. Fox) is very apparant. Very louing and tender affectionated he was to his brother King Edward; for whoſe death hee made ſuch lamentation, that his mother beat him with a taper of waxe that ſtood before her, yea and ſo ſore that he could neuer after wel endure the ſight of a taper. Fauourable he was to the married Prieſts, and leaſt eſteemed the opulent and idle liues of the Monkes, whoſe pens therefore (as in ſuch caſes we euer find them partial) haue been very lauiſh in his diſpraiſe, accuſing him with ſloth and vnreadineſſe of Armes, of voluptuouſnes and lechery, couetouſneſſe, pride and cruelty: whereas in following the records of his life, laying aſide the Daniſh maſſacre, we find no ſuch ſinnes, neither any mention of Concubine that euer hee kept, or name of child vnlawfully begot, hauing had many by his wiues, which were as followeth.

Fox Martyrologe in King Egelreds life ex Hiſt. Iornalenſ.

His Wiues.

Elgiua the firſt wife, by ſome called Elſlede,

(40) Elgiua, the firſt wife of King Ethelred, was the daughter of an Engliſh Duke named Thored, who is reported in the hiſtory of that time, to haue done great ſeruice againſt the Danes. She was married vnto him when hee was ſeuenteene yeeres of age, in the ſixt of his raigne, being the yeare of grace 984. and was his wife ſeauenteene yeares, who dedeceaſed in the twenty foure of his raigne, and of Chriſt Ieſus, 1003.

Emme the ſecond wife.

(41) Emme, the ſecond wife of King Ethelred, was the daughter of Richard the ſecond Duke of Normandy, and ſiſter of Duke Richard, and Duke Robert Father to William the Conqueror; her mother was ſiſter to Herfaſt the Dane, Grandfather of William Fitz-Osbert afterward Earle of Hereford. She was a Lady of paſsing beauty, and therefore commonly called the flower of Normandy; married vnto him in the twenty and fift yeare of his raigne, & yeere of Saluation, 1003. with whom ſhee liued thirteene yeeres, and ſuruiuing him was remarried to King Canute the Dane.

His Iſſue.

Ethelſtan the eldeſt ſonne.

(42) Ethelſtan, the eldeſt ſonne of King Ethelred and of Queene Elgiua his firſt wife, was borne about the eight yeare of his Fathers raigne, and yeere of Chriſt, 986: hee liued vnto the age almoſt of twenty fiue yeeres, (being then by great likelihood) cut off by vntimely death in the warres of the Danes, raging then moſt extreamely, which was the thirtie third of his Fathers raigne, and of Chriſts Natiuitie 1011.

Egbert the ſecond ſonne.

(43) Egbert, the ſecond ſonne of King Ethelred, and Queene Elgiua his firſt wife, ſeemeth to haue beene borne two yeeres after his brother Ethelſtan, in the tenth yeare of his Fathers raigne, and yeare of our Lord 988, and to haue deceaſed in the very prime of his youth before the death of his father, or of his elder brother, and before hee had done any thing in his life worthy of remembrance after his death.

Edmund the third ſonne.

(44) Edmund, the third ſonne of King Ethelred & Queene Elgiua his firſt wife, was borne in the eleuenth yeare of his fathers raigne, and of Grace 989 and of all his fathers Children proued to be the only man that ſet his helping hand to the redreſſe of the eſtate of his Country diſtreſſed by the miſerable oppreſsions of the Danes, which hee purſued with ſuch exceeding toile, and reſtleſſe hazards of his body, as he was therefore ſurnamed Iron-ſide; and when hee had followed thoſe warres with great courage the ſpace of ſeuenteene yeeres vnder his Father, being come to twenty ſeuen of his owne age, hee ſucceeded him in his Kingdome and troubles, as preſently ſhall be ſhewed.

Edred the fourth ſonne.

(45) Edred, the fourth ſonne of King Ethelred, and of Queene Elgiua his firſt wife, was born about the foureteenth yeare of his fathers raigne, being the yeare of Grace 992. His name is continually ſet downe, as a witneſſe in the teſtees of his fathers Charters, vntill the thirtie fift yeare of his raigne, by which it appeareth that hee liued vnto the two and twentieth yeere of his owne age, although I find no mention of him, or of any thing done by him in any of our hiſtories, and it ſeemeth he died at that time, becauſe his name is left out of the Charters after that yeare.

Edwy the fifth ſonne.

(46) Edwy, the fift ſonne of King Ethelred, and Queene Elgiua his firſt wife, ſuruiued his father and all his brethren, and liued in the raigne of Canute the Dane, who being iealous of his new-gotten eſtate, and fearefull of the dangers that might accrew vnto him by this Edwy, and ſuch others of the Engliſh bloud roiall, practiſed to haue him murthered, which was accordingly done by them, whom hee moſt fauoured, and leaſt ſuſpected, the yeare of our ſaluation, 1017.

Edgar the firſt ſonne.

(47) Edgar, the ſixt ſonne of King Ethelred and of Queene Elgiua his firſt wife, was borne about the twentieth yeere of his fathers raigne, beeing the yere of our Lord God nine hundred ninetie and eight. He ſeemeth by the Teſtees of his fathers Charters, to haue beene liuing in the one and twentieth of his raigne, but beeing no more found in any of them after, may be ſuppoſed by all coniectures, to haue died in, or, about the ſame yeere, beeing but the eleuenth after his owne birth, and the ſeuenth before his fathers death.

The eldeſt daughter.

(48) The eldeſt daughter of King Ethelred and Queene Elgiua his firſt wife, although her name bee not to bee found in any writer of thoſe times, appeareth notwithſtanding, to be married to one Ethelſtan, a Noble man of England, who was the principall Commander of Cambridge-ſhire men, at the great battle fought betweene them and the Danes, wherein the Engliſh-men had the ouerthrow; and this ſonne in law of King Ethelred, with the reſt of the chiefe Leaders, were ſlaine in the yeere of Chriſts Natiuity 1010. being the two and thirtieth of his father in lawes raigne.

Edgith the ſecond daughter.

(49) Edgith, the ſecond daughter of King Ethelred and Queene Elgiua his firſt wife, was married to Edrik Duke of Mercia, who for his couetouſneſſe in getting was ſurnamed Streattone: This Edrik was the ſonne of one Egelrik ſurnamed Leofwin, an elder brother to Egelmere the grandfather of Goodwin Duke of the Weſt-Saxons; and beeing but meanely borne, was thus highly aduanced by this King; notwithſtanding he he was euer a traitor to his Countrie, and a fauourer of the Danes, betraying both him, and King Edmund his ſonne to King Canut, that he thereby might gette new preferments by him; who worthily rewarded him as a traitor and put him to death.

Elfgine the third daughter.

(50) Elfgine, the third daughter of King Ethelred and of Queene Elgiua his firſt wife, was the ſecond wife of Vtred ſurnamed the Bold, ſonne of Earle Waldeſe the elder, Earle of Northumberland, by whom ſhee had one onely child, a daughter, named Aldgith, married to a Noble-man called Maldred, the ſonne of Crinan; ſhee was mother of Coſpatricke, who was Earle of Northumberland in the time of William the Conquerour, and forced by his diſpleaſure to fly into Scotland, where hee abode and was anceſtor to the Earles of Dunbar and of March in that Countrie.

Gode the fourth daughter.

(51) Gode, the fourth and youngeſt daughter of King Ethelred and Queene Elgiua his firſt wife, was firſt married to one Walter de Maigne a Noble-man of Normandy, greatly fauoured by King Edward her brother; who liued not long after the marriage, and left iſſue by her a ſonne named Rodulfe, whom King Edward his vncle created Earle of Hereford. This Earle Rodulfe, died the one and twentieth of December, in the thirteenth yeere of his vncles raigne, and was buried at Peterborough; leauing iſſue a young ſonne named Harrald, created afterwards by King William the Conqueror, Baron of Sudeley in the Countie of Glouceſter, and Anceſtor to the Barons of that place ſucceeding, and of the Lord Chandois of Sudeley now being. This Lady Gode, after the deceaſe of the ſaid Water de Maigne, was remarried to Euſtace the elder, Earle of Bulloigne in Picardy, a man of great valour in thoſe parts of France; and a moſt faithfull friend to King Edward her brother; which Earle was grand-father to Godfrey of Bulloigne, King of Ieruſalem; albeit it ſeemeth he had no iſſue by this Lady.

Edward the ſeuenth ſonne.

(52) Edward, the ſeuenth ſonne of King Ethelred, and his firſt by Queene Emme his ſecond wife, was borne at Iſlipe in the County of Oxford, and brought vp in France all the time of his youth; with his vncle Richard the third of that name, Duke of Normandy, miſtruſting his ſafety in England vnder King Canute the Dane, although he had married his mother; but hee found the time more dangerous by the vſage of his brother Elfred, at his beeing heere in the raigne of King Harrald ſonne of the Dane. Notwithſtanding hee returned home, when Hardiknut the other ſonne (beeing his halfe brother) was King, and was honourably receiued and entertained by him, and after his death ſucceeded him in the Kingdom of England.

Elfred the eight ſonne.

(53) Elfred, the eight ſonne of King Ethelred, and his ſecond by Queene Emme his ſecond wife, was conueied into Normandie for feare of King Canute, with his eldeſt brother Edward, and with him returned into England to ſee his mother, then beeing at Wincheſter, in the ſecond yeere of King Harrald ſurnamed Harefoote; by whoſe practize hee was trained towards London, apprehended by the way at Guilford in Surrey, depriued of his eie-ſight, and committed priſoner to the Monaſtery of Elie: his Normans that came with him moſt cruelly murthered, and hee himſelfe ſoone after deceaſing, was buried in the Church of the ſaid Monaſterie.

CHAPTER XLV.

Anno D.1016.

EDmund, the third ſonne of King Ethelred, and the eldeſt liuing at his Fathers death, ſucceeded him both in his dominions, & in his troubled eſtate againſt the Danes; entring his gouernement in the moneth of April, and crowned at Kingſton vpon Thameſis, by Liuingus Archbiſhop of Canterbury, the yeere of mans ſaluation 1016. Notwithſtanding, a great part of the Engliſh, conſidering the puiſſance of the Danes, both feared and fauoured Canut, eſpecially, a great part of the Clergy, who at Southampton ordained him their King, ſwearing to him the fealty of true ſubiection; but the Londoners ſtood moſt firme to Prince Edmund, and were principall Actors for his election. Polyer. lib. 6. ca. 37.

(2) In reuenge whereof Canutus who had beſieged ged the Citie before the death of King Ethelred, caused his ships now to be towed, and drawne vp the *Thames*is vnto the west side of the bridge, and from the riuer with a deepe and large Trench encompassed the City, shutting vp all entrance or egresse of any: but the Citizens manfully stood in resistance, whereto the comming of their new King for their succour, did not a little encourage them, and daunted the Danes, who now thought it best to breake vp their siege and be gone: and the rather(saith the Author of Encomium Emmæ) for that King Edmund sent Canute a peremptory challenge of single combate, which he neither accepted, nor yet staied the siege to trie his chance; but waying his anchors sailed along the Coast to the Ile of Sheepie, where he wintred with his Nauie and men.

Proffer of single combat.

(3) But loth to lose opportunity, when time serued for warre; on the sodaine he assailed the west of England, and brought much of those parts vnder his commaund: to meet whom the restlesse Ironside prepared, and with such small power as his leasure would admit to leauie, he hasted into Dorsetshire, where Canut was forwarding his owne fortunes, and at Penham neere Gillingham, each met other in the field, wherein a sore battaile was fought, and bloudy to the Danes, where many of them were put to the sword, and the rest to flight.

An.D.1016. In the Rogation weeke.

(4) Canute immediately tooke into Winchester, to secure himselfe from danger, and the rest escaped towards Salisbury, and there begirt the Citie with a strait siege. King Edmund as ready to saue, as they to destroy, made presently thitherward with his small and ouertired company; whom Canut, waiting for aduantage, followed with a great host, and in Worcestershire, at a place called Sheroston, in the sight of his enemy pitched his battaile. To the aide of Edmund came many of the English, so that his Army was greatly encreased, and their courages inhaunsed, which made the Danish souldiers somwhat to droope.

Polydor.

(5) Notwithstanding, vpon the twentieth of Iune, 1016. their battailes ioined, and with equall fortune continued all the day, vntill the night constrained them to part.

Simon Dun. Matt. West.

(6) But their bloud not cold, the next day they buckled together againe with no lesse courage then before, till at length the Danes were going down, & the English in great forwardnes of victory: which when the Traitour Edrik perceiued, he cut off the head of a souldier, whose name was Osmearus, like vnto King Edmund both in haire and countenance, and shaking his bloody sword with the halfe-gasping head, cried vnto the host of the English: Flie yee wretches, flie, and get away, for your King is slaine, behold here is his head, therefore seeke now to saue your owne liues.

Wil. Malmsbury. Edricks treason.

(7) But Edmund hauing present notice of this treacherous stratageme, and seeing his men ready to giue ouer the fight, hasted himselfe where he might be best seene, encouraging his Army to stand to it like true Englishmen, and posting from ranke to ranke, both performed the parts of a wise Generall, and vnderwent the dangers of the meanest souldier: his men seeing his presence, & the apparant treachery of Duke Edrik, bent their bows against the traitour, and had shot him to death, had he not presently auoided to the enemy: but the night approching, parted againe the battaile of this second day: Duke Edrik excusing his fact, as beeing meerely mistaken in the countenance of the man, and thirsting to saue the bloud of the English; was taken againe into fauour, and bare himselfe outwardly faire for his Country.

Edriks excuse.

(8) The third day appearing, both the Armies prepared for battaile, but yet stood still without any attempt, onely refreshing their wearied, and almost tired bodies, and burying the dead slaine in the two daies fights before.

(9) The night following, Canutus in great silence brake vp his Campe, and marched very fast towards London,, against whose Citizens he carried great spleene, and most earnestly desired the conquest of the Citie, which in a sort was still besieged by the Danish ships.

Canut marcheth to London.

(10) The Centinels the next morning certified King Edmund (who was addressing himselfe for the battaile) of the suddaine departure of his enemies, whereupon hee as ready to preuent their designes, followed them by tract euen vnto London: where with small adoe, hee remoued their siege, and entred the City in manner of triumph. The Danes thus discomfited, great hope was conceiued, that these faire proceedings would haue a prosperous end.

Dislodged by Edmund.

(11) Edmund, therefore following the aduantage of their discouragements, two dayes after at Brentford bad them battaile, and that with their great ouerthrow; notwithstanding, in passing the *Thames*is at the same place, he lost many of his men, who were drowned before they could recouer the shore: vpon which losse the Traitor Edrike plaied, who earst had much feared the downefall of the Danes. For hereupon hee perswaded his brother in law King Edmund to come to truce with Canute, which as he confidently affirmed, should be to the great benefite and contentment of Edmund: Canute himselfe so plotting it, that by his meanes hee might continue his hopes, and bring his enemy into his danger.

Edrik wicked counsell.

Henry Hunt.

(12) The affaires thus standing, King Edmund returned into the West, and Canute with spoiles vnto his shippes that were in Medyway, not far from Rochester, where he a while lay still to learne what Edmund meant to doe; who contrariwise louing nothing lesse then to linger his businesses, made preparation against those truce-breakers that had wasted the Country in their returne, and with a great Army entred Kent, where he pitched down his tents neere vnto Oteford.

Edmunds preparations.

Canut, who had prepared himselfe in most warlike array to meete his approch, beganne the battaile in a furious manner, which continued verie bloudy for foure howres space, vntill the foot of his vaward beganne to shrinke, which when hee perceiued, he drew his horsemen for their aide: but whilest the one gaue hastily back, & the other made as slowly forward, the array of the whole army was broken, and the Danes slaine on all hands: for it is reported that Canute lost foure thousand fiue hundred men, and King Edmund onely six hundred; the rest of these Danes trusting to their legs, whom if Edmund had pursued in chase, it is thought, that day had ended the warres betwixt those two Nations for euer: but Destiny, that would haue the Saxons downe, who had raised themselues by the fals of the Britaines, made Edrik her instrument, & mall of the English, who kept King Edmunds hasty foot from following his enemies, by guilefull vrging the danger of ambush, and the ouer-wearied bodies of his souldiers, so that Canute thereby had leasure in safety to passe ouer into Essex.

(13) Where beginning againe, with the increase of his power to despoile al the Country before him, brought feare to the inhabitants, and to himselfe submission of many English. King Edmund therefore made preparation thitherward, and at Ashdone three miles from Saffron-Walden, gaue battaile to Canute, wherein a bloudy slaughter ensued, though a while with equall chance of foile or of victory, vntill lastly the Danes beganne to giue backe, which when the euer-traiterous Edrik perceiued, he went with his strength, vnto their side, and maintained their battaile, which otherwise was at point to be lost, whereby the Danes regained the day, and the betraied English, the ouerthrow. There died of Edmunds Nobility, Duke Alfred, Duke Goodwin, Duke Athelward, Duke Athelwin, and Earle Vrchell, with Cadweth Bishop of Lincolne, and Wolsey Abbot of

The remembrance of which field is retained vnto this day, by certaine ſmall hilles there remaining, whence haue beene digged the bones of men, Armour, and the water-chaines of horſe-bridles.

(14) King Edmund thus traiterouſly forced to retire from the field, on foot marched vnto Glouceſter with a very ſmall Army, leauing Canut ouerſwollen in conceit for this his great victorie, vnto whom then the Londoners ſubmitted, and ſo did many other great townes of Name; after which hee followed Edmund into the Weſt; who now like a Tygar robbed of her Whelpes, ſeeking the reuenge of his loſt day, gathered a moſt puiſſant Army, meaning to trie the vttermoſt chance of Fate, or Battaile. Their hoſtes meete at Dearhurſt neere vnto the riuer Seuerne, where they were reſoluedly bent to eſtabliſh the ones title with the others downefall; and now being ready to ioyne, a certaine Captaine of vncertaine name, ſtept forth (as is reported) betwixt the two Armies, and vttered in effect this ſpeech.

" (15) Many battailes haue beene fought, and " too much bloud already ſpilt for the ſoueraignitie " of this Land, betwixt theſe two fierce Nations, " and the valours of the Generals, Captaines and " Souldiers ſufficiently tried; wherein euen fortune " her ſelfe ſeemeth to haue beene conquered; for " if one Battaile were wonne, it was not long kept, " neither the loſer ſo weakened, but that hee had " both courage and power to winne the next: what " is the marke then that you aime at? is it honour " and fame? Titles indeed which accompany war; " but neither long enioyed, nor much attained vn- " to by the common Souldiers, by whoſe valours " and bloud it is for the moſt part wonne. Let " him therefore that would weare the Diademe, " beare the hazard himſelfe, without the confuſi- " on of ſo many men, and either trie the fortune " of a ſingle combat, who ſhall commaund, and " who obey, or diuide betwixt them the King- " dome, which may ſuffice two, that hath main- " tained ſeuen.

(16) Some affirme that this ſpeech was Duke Edriks; but I hardly belieue ſo good a motion ſhould proceede from ſo bad a man; by whom ſo euer vttered, it was acceptably receiued by Edmund and Canut, who thereupon in ſight of their Armies, entred into a ſmall Iland, embraced about with the armes of Seuern, called Alney, adioyning vnto the City Glouceſter, where thoſe princes in complete Armour at firſt aſſailed each other moſt dangerouſly on horſebacke, and after as valiantly on foot. The Ironſide was ſtrong, and fought for his Kingdome; the Dane not ſo tall, but euery way as ſtout, fought for his honour, and ſo the combate continued with an abſolute reſolution, till at length Canute hauing receiued a dangerous wound and ſeeing himſelfe ouermatched in ſtrength, wiſhed a comprimiſe, and thus ſpake to Edmund with a loud voice.

" What neceſsity ſhould thus moue vs moſt valiant " Prince, that for the obtaining of a Title, we ſhould " thus endanger our liues? better it were to lay ma- " lice and Armour aſide, and to condiſcend to a lo- " uing agreement: let vs therefore now become ſworne " brothers, and diuide the Kingdome betwixt vs, and " in ſuch league of amity, that each of vs may vſe the o- " thers part as his owne; ſo ſhall this land be peacea- " bly gouerned, and we iointly aſsiſtant to each others " neceſsity.

Whereupon they both caſt downe their ſwords, imbracing as friends with the great ioy and ſhouting of both their Armies, who ſtood before doubtfully wauering betwixt hope and feare, and looking for their owne fortunes, according to the ſucceſſe of their Champions.

Thus was the Kingdome diuided betwixt thoſe two Princes; Edmund enioying that part that lay coaſted vpon France, and Canute entring vpon the reſt. The Kingdome parted betweene them.

(17) Thus then the Saxon Monarchy ſpent to the laſt period, and their tottering crowne faſt graſped with a hard Daniſh hand, was ſuddainelyy torne from the Ironſides helmet, by his complotted and haſtned death. For Duke Edrick a very compound of treaſons, glutted with the fauours of both theſe Kings, to ſcrue himſelfe deeper into Canut his conceit, contriued the end of renowmed Edmund: who being retired to a place for natures neceſsity, was thruſt from vnder the draught into his body with a ſharpe ſpeare; which done, the treacherous Edrick cutting off his Soueraignes head, preſented it to Canut with theſe fawning ſalutations. All haile, thou now ſole-Monarch of England; for, here behold the head of thy Copartner, which for thy ſake I haue aduentured to cut off. Edmund murthered. A ſpit, ſaith Higden.

Canute though ambitious inough of ſoueraignety, yet of princely diſpoſition, abaſhed, & ſore grieued at ſo vnworthy and diſloiall an attempt, repliied, and vowed, that in reward of that ſeruice, the bringers owne head ſhould be aduanced aboue all the peeres of his kingdome. Which high honour whiles this prodigious wretch greedily expected, (and indeed for a time, ſaith Malmesbury, hee found ſome ſhew of fauour with the King:) ſoone after, by the Kings commaund, his head bad his ſhoulders farewell, and was placed vpon the higheſt Gate to ouerlooke London. Canutus puniſheth the traitors Wil. Malmsbury.

(18) The traiterous death of this worthy Prince, as ſome affirme, was acted at Oxford; yet the Author that wrote Encomium Emmæ, and liued the ſame time, blancheth the matter, ſaying that hee died of a naturall death in London: God minding his owne doctrine, that a Kingdome diuided in it ſelfe, cannot long ſtand, and pittying the Engliſh, tooke away Edmund, leſt if the Kings had continued long together, they ſhould both haue liued in danger, and the Realme in continuall trouble. Old Manuſc. Fabian. Ran. Higden.

That hee died in London, Simon the Monke of Durham agreeth, and ſaith further, it chanced about the Feaſt of S. Andrew: and Marianus is of the ſame opinion, being the yeere of Chriſt, 1016. Whenſoeuer, or howſoeuer, his Raigne was but ſeuen monethes, and his body buried at Glaſtenbury; neere vnto his Grandfather King Edgar. Simon Dunel. Marian. Scotus. Edmunds raigne. Polychr.

(19) He was of perſonage tall, for courage, hardy, ſtrong of limmes, and well could endure the trauels of warre, inſomuch that ſome deeme the ſurname Ironſide, giuen him onely vpon that occaſion. With him fell the glory of the Engliſh, and the aged body of their ſore bruiſed Monarchy ſeemed to bee buried with him in the ſame Sepulchre. The feature of Edmund.

His Wife.

(20) Algith, the wife of King Edmund, was the widow of Sigeferth, the ſonne of Engrin a Daniſh Nobleman of Northumberland; which Sigeferth, with his brother Morcar, was murthered at Oxford by the treaſon of the neuer-faithfull Edrick: & this Lady being of great beauty, and noble parentage after the death of her husband, and the ſeiſure of his lands, was by King Ethelred, cõmitted in charge to the Monaſtery of Malmesbury, where Edmund ſeeing her, grew in great loue, and there married her againſt the liking of his father, in Anno 1015. Algith.

His Iſſue.

(21) Edward the eldeſt ſon of King Edmund, and Queen Algith his wife, was ſurnamed the Outlaw, becauſe he liued out of England in Hungary as a baniſhed man, through the raigne of Canut, and of his ſonnes the Danes. But when his vncle King Edward the Confeſſor, had obtained the Engliſh crown, Edward the outlaw.

he was by him recalled, and moſt honourably in his Court enterained, till laſtly, hee was taken away by death in the City of London, the yeere of Chriſt, 1057. He married Agatha ſiſter to Queene Sophia, wife to Salomon King of Hungary, and daughter to the Emperour Henrie the ſecond; by whom hee had Edgar, ſurnamed Etheling, confirmed heire apparant by Edward Confeſſor, his great Vncle; which title notwithſtanding, proceeded no further, for that hee was depriued thereof by Harold his Protector.

The daughters of this Edward, as after ſhall be ſaid, were Margaret and Chriſtian, the younger of which became a vaied Nunne at Ramſey in Hampſhire, where ſhee in that deuotion ſpent her life, and was there interred.

Margaret the elder, and afterward ſole heire vnto the Saxon Monarchy, married Malcolme the third of that name, King of Scotland, and commonly called Canmore: from which princely bed in a lineall deſcent, our high and mighty Monarch, King IAMES the firſt, doth in his moſt roiall perſon vnite the Britaines, Saxons, Engliſh, Normans, and Scotiſh imperiall Crownes in one.

(22) Edmund, the ſecond and yongeſt ſonne of King Edmund, and of Queene Algith his wife, after his fathers deceaſe being a Child, was with his brothe Edward, ſent by Canute to Olaue King of Swedon his halfe brother, to the intent, that he by murther ſhould make them both away: but this King taking pitty on the innocent Childrens eſtate, ſent them to Salomon King of Hungarie, to the intent to haue them ſaued, where they were receiued with great fauour and honour: and Mathew of Weſtminſter reporteth, that this Prince married the daughter of the ſame King; and other Writers of theſe times, that he died in the ſame Country without any iſſue of his body.

(23). Theſe two ſonnes of the Ironſide thus poſted away, and the crowne already ſet vpon the Danes head, had not the meanes of themſelues to diſplace it, nor the Engliſh, hearts to aſsiſt them to their right: ſo that they rather ſecured themſelues from violent deaths in this their exile, then made claime to that which was vnrecouerable; and left the Danes quietly to poſſeſſe the land, which ſo long they had moleſted with their ſturdy Armes.

THE ORIGINALL OF THE DANES, THEIR MANNERS, RELIGION, AND INVASIONS OF ENGLAND, THE *RAIGNES OF THEIR KINGS HERE, VN-*TILL THE CROWNE REVERTED AGAINE TO THE SAXONS; WORNE BY KING EDWARD THE CONFESSOR, AND AFTER HIM BY HAROLD THE LAST KING OF THEIR RACE.

Chapter I.

THe Spirite of God in his ſacred writings, to ſhew his all-commanding power ouer Kingdomes and Nations, compareth the tranſmigrations of people from country to country, vnto the tranſfuſion of wine from veſſel to veſſell: and thoſe that are at reſt with ſinne, to the ſetling vpon their lees, as Moab did, againſt whom hee curſed that hand that was negligent in his worke of reuenge, and the ſword that was not ſheathed in their bloud. Euen ſo the ſinnes of the Saxons growne now to the full, and their dregs as it were ſuncke vnto the bottome, they were emptied by the Danes from their owne veſſels, and their bottles broken that had vented their red & bloody wines: in lieu whereof, the Lord then gaue them the cuppe of his wrath, whoſe dregs hee had formerly (by their own hands) wrung out vpon other nations.

(2) For theſe Saxons that had enlarged their kingdomes by the bloud of the Britaines, and built their neſts high vpon the Cedars of others, (as the Prophet ſpeaketh) committed an euill couetouſneſſe vnto their owne habitations, and were ſtricken by the ſame meaſure that they had meaſured vnto others. When as the Danes often attempting the lands inuaſion; and the ſubuerſion of the Engliſh eſtate, made way with their ſwords through all the Prouinces in the realme; and laſtly aduanced the crowne vpon their owne helmets; which whiles it ſo ſtood, was worne with great honour, eſpecially of Canutus the firſt and their greateſt.

(3) As touching this Nations originall, and firſt place of reſiding, ſeeing themſelues know nothing at all, we cannot determine, but ſuppoſing them with Franciſcus Irenicus, to be a branch of the ancient Germans, and knowing them by the teſtimonies of al others, to inhabite in the ſame Country among them, we need not to doubt, but that their conditions and cuſtomes were much alike. Of the former, what we haue obſerued, is already ſet downe, where we ſpake of our Saxons; & now of theſe later, what is ſuppoſed for truth ſhall be produced.

(4) Theſe Danes ſo often mentioned by our hiſtorians, for the great afflicters of the Engliſh ſtate and peace, were a people deſcended from the Scythians, as Andrew Velley a learned Daniſh Writer reporteth: but Dudo of S. Quintin (an ancient Author) will haue them to come from Scandia, an Iland ſituated north-ward, not farre from the continent of Denmarke: which his opinion ſeemeth vnto ſome to be ſtrengthned by Ptolemie the Alexandrian, who in his Geography placeth the people Dauciones (the ſuppoſed Anceſtors of thoſe Danes) in this Iland Scandia, at ſuch time as himſelfe wrote, which was in the raigne of Hadrian the Emperour, and about the yeere of Chriſts natiuity 133. But whereſoeuer the roote had beginning, the branches did farre ſpread themſelues into the vpper Germany, and parts of Norway, and Sweyden, whoſe faire fruit more particularly filled that promontory, which tongue-like lieth into the Ocean on the north, being anciently called of the learned, Cimbrica Cherſoneſſus, where, (as Tacitus ſaith) was the vttermoſt end of Nature, and of the world; a ſtrange conceit indeed; and yet more ſtrange was their opinion, who were perſwaded that the ſound and noiſe of the Sunne was there heard at his dailie riſing and ſetting in thoſe ſeas. But from more warrantable witneſſes it is reported, that this was the very place which the Iutes and Angles abandoned, when they remoued their Colonies for Britaine.

(5) In this place then the Danes laid firſt the foundation of their Kingdome; which, from the word Mare, ſignifying not a limit, but a region, was named Den-marc. But touching the former part of that compounded name, the truth and original occaſion is not ſo ſoone found out: for the ſearching eye of truth hath long ſince ſeene into the receiued fable of Danus their firſt King, and Giant-like ſonne of Humblus; though though Verſtegan of late holds it more certaine in the ſearch of originals, to follow the grounded opinion that ancient Tradition hath held, then at randome to ſeeke them elſe-where: as theſe Danes (ſaith he) from Dan, and the Britaines from Brute; which truely for truth I hold much alike, and will herein make doubt as many more of riper iudgement before me haue done.

(6) For Goropius Becanus deduceth the name Dane from Da-hen, ſignifying a Henne, or rather (as ſome will) a fighting Cocke; Iunius, from Den, ſignifying Firre-trees, which doe there abound. Andrew Velley from a people in Scythia named Daha, of whom Ioſephus maketh mention in his eighteenth booke, and placeth them by the Saca.

Ioſephus Antiq. lib. 18. cap. 6.

Ethelward our Engliſh hiſtorian will haue them named from the faire City Dovia. And Ionas Iacobus Venuſinus, a diligent ſearcher of Antiquites, out of Pomponius Mela, findeth the names of certaine Bays, opening into thoſe parts, which now the Danes inhabite, to haue beene ancientlie written CDAN and CDANONVM; which Orthographie and Pronuntiation to the Latines was both harſh and hard, and therefore they added a vowell, and wrote it CODANVM and CODANONIA, whereof (it may be thought) theſe people giuen much to piracies, were knowne and called by that name, as breaking out of thoſe Codanian ſeas. Some others from Ptolomie haue thought, that from his Dauciones placed in Scandia, and corruptly ſo written for Danciones; the name of theſe Danes hath beene deriued; whereto the neereneſſe of the place induceth much.

(7) For Nations Originals may well bee compared vnto a ſpring, whoſe current ſurcharged with continuall ſupply of more, firſt filleth the neere Chanels; which done, they paſſe further, and at length are (oftentimes) diuided into many and great "ſtreames: and euen ſo theſe Danes, (ſaith Dudo "of S. Quintins) after they had in heat, and laſciui-"ous luſt ingendred an innumerable offſpring, ſwar-"med out of Scandia like bees out of their hiues, & "that both on diuers occaſions, and in very barba-"rous manner; for growne to ripeneſſe of yeeres, & "falling at ſtrife with their Fathers and Grand-ſires, "yea, and moſt commonly, among themſelues for "lands and liuely-hood, neceſsity compelled them "to disburden the land thus ouerflowed, for the bet-"ter maintenance of the reſidue, and to baniſh by "lot (after their ancient cuſtome) a multitude of their "youth, that might conquere by their ſwords, in "forraine Realmes, places to liue in.

Theſe then thruſt out of their owne, fell vpon other lands with no leſſe danger then the falling of a ſword out of the ſheath, or rather, as the breaking in of a tempeſtuous ſea vpon the neighbouring grounds, ſore diſtreſſing their neighbour nations, & among them England not the leaſt, as ſhalbe ſaid.

(8) And yet their name was not much notified to the world before the raigne of Iuſtinian the Emperour, about the yeere of mans ſaluation, 570, but then rouing vpon the coaſts of England, & France; in exerciſing Piracies, were noted by writers by the name Wiccingi, for that Wiccinga in the Saxon tongue, as Alfricus witneſſeth doth ſignifie a Pirate; they were alſo called Pagani, for that they were not Chriſtians; but by the Engliſh Deniſcan, and alſo Heathon-mon, as being Ethnicks.

(9) The manner of their Religion, or rather ſuperſtition and Idolatry, was much like vnto the other Germans and Saxons, whoſe principall God and Nationall reputed-Patron, was Thur, vnto whom the fourth day of the weeke for his ſeruice was aſſigned, whereof as yet it beareth his name Thurſday; who in his robes was ſet vpon a ſumptuous bed, the Canopie whereof was beſpangled with ſtarres of gold; vnto him they performed their chiefe deuotions, and aſcribed all their fortunes in their affaires; as the foreſaid Dudo doth more particularly relate. They (ſaith he) ſacrificed vnto Thur, whom they worſhipped in old time as their Lord, for whom they killed not many ſheepe, oxen, or other cattle, but offered vnto him mens bloud, thinking that to be the moſt pretious oblation of all others; whom, when the Prieſt by caſting of lots had deſtinated to death, they were all at once deadlie ſmitten vpon the head with oxeyokes; and euery one thus choſen by lot, hauing at one ſtroke his braines daſhed out, was laid along on the ground, and there with a narrow prying was ſought out the Fibra, or veine of the heart on the left ſide, whence drawing the bloud, as their cuſtome was, and therewith beſmearing the heads of their deereſt friends, forthwith they hoiſe ſailes, thinking their Gods well pleaſed with ſuch ſacrifices, and fore-deeming happie ſucceſſe to their intended voiage.

(10) Ditmarus the Biſhop (ſomewhat ancienter then Dudo) recordeth another deteſtable ſuperſtition vſed by the Danes to purchaſe the fauour of their Gods. Becauſe (ſaith he) I haue heard wonderfull reports of the ancient ſacrifices which the Danes and Normans vſed, I will not let them paſſe vntouched. In thoſe parts there is a place, and the chiefe it is of that Kingdome, called Lederum, in a Prouince named Selon, where euery ninth yeare, in the moneth of Ianuary, after the time in which we celebrate the Nativity of our Lord, they all aſſemble together, and there they kill and ſacrifice vnto their Gods ninety and nine men, and as many horſes, with dogs, and alſo cocks, in ſtead of hawkes, aſſuring themſelues that hereby their Gods are fully pleaſed and pacified. And thus much may ſerue for a taſt and view of their cuſtoms, names and originals.

CHAPTER II.

THough many were the Piracies of the Danes on the coasts of France and this our Island in former times; yet their arriuall heere, which gaue first breath to their ensuing conquests, was not till the wane of the Saxon Monarchie, about the yeere of Christs Incarnation scuen hundred eighty seuen, in the raigne of Brightrik King of the West-Saxons: in whose dominions, after some proffer at Portland, they first came to land at Teigne-mouth in Deuon-shire; beeing sent then with three Ships onely, to espie the wealth of this Countrie, the forces of the Inhabitants, the commodities of the Hauens, and aduantage of arriuall for a greater power, which was to follow them. The Kings Lieuetenant and Prefect for that place, vnderstanding of their landing, went himselfe to demand the reason thereof; and attempting to lay hands on some to carrie them to the Kings presence, hee was there slaine; which they tooke as a fortunate presage of the victories wherewith they afterward ouerranne this Kingdome; though for the present the inhabitants enraged with the losse of their Chiefe, addressing them in great numbers to reuenge, forced some to lose their liues by the sword, the rest to saue them by flight to their ships.

(2) Notwithstanding their former preparations, they were contented to deferre their returne till the dayes of King Egbert; whose raigne (as elsewhere we haue touched) they disquieted with three seuerall inuasions; the first in the North, , the second in Wales, the last in Kent; in all which, the King though with many losses, and hazards of his owne person, yet with great resolutions persisted, till hee had disburdened his land of so dangerous guests. But those Flesh-flies hauing once tasted the sweet, though often beaten off, would not long bee kept away, but could easily take, or make occasions of fresh attempts; insomuch that after their first footing they continued here their cruelties, rapine and spoile the space of two hundred and eighteene yeeres, neuer intermitting, till they had got the garland vpon their owne heads. The way whereunto was made vpon this ensuing occasion.

(3) Osbright a Northumbrian Viceroy, deputed by the West-Saxons, by chance, as hee followed his disport in Hunting, came to the house of a Noble man, named Beorn-Bocador, whose Lady of passing feature (in his absence) gaue him honourable entertainement, and intreated both himselfe and traine, to repose themselues there a while, after their wearisome delights. The Vice-roy already ensnared with her beauty, accepted her courteous offer, not so much to taste her meates, as to surfeite his eyes with her rare beauty, and lasciuiously to dote in his owne affections. The dinner ended, and all ready to depart, as though some weighty matters were to be handled, he commaunded an auoidance from the Presence, and taking the Lady into a withdrawing Chamber, vnder pretence of secret conference, greatly tending to the aduancement of her Lord & selfe, most vnnobly, being not able to preuaile by smooth perswasions, did by force violate her constant chastity. Which dishonour thus receiued, and her minde distracted like to Thamars, at her husbands returne, all ashamed to behold his face whose bed had so beene wronged, with flouds of teares shee thus set open the sluces of her passions. 2.Sam.13.19.

" (4) Had thy fortunes accorded to thine owne

" cing eye to looke into my guilty and defiled breast,
" which now thou maist see dissurnished of honour,
" and the closet of pure chastity broken vp; onely
" the heart and soule is cleane, yet feares the taine-
" ture of this polluted caske, and would haue passage
" (by thy reuenging hand) from this loathsome pri" son and filthy truncke. I must confesse our sexe

" more inuiolable and firme, both against allure-
" ments and enforcements: by whose constancy as
" our flexible weakenes is guarded, so our true ho-
" nours by your iust Armes should bee protected. O
" Beorn, Beorn, (for husband I dare not call thee) re-
" uenge therefore my wrongs, that am now made
" thy shame and scandale of my sexe, vpon that mon" ster, nay Diuell, Osbright, (O that very name cor-
" corrupts my breath, and I want words to deplore
" my griefe) who hath no law but his lust, nor
" measure of his actions but his power, nor priui-
" ledge for his loathsome life, but his greatnesse,
" whiles we with a selfe-feare, and seruile flatterie
" maske our basenesse with crouching obedience, &
" beare the wrongs of his most vile adulteries. Thou
" yet art free from such deiected and degenerate
" thoughts, nor hast thou smoothed him in his wick-
" ed and euer-working vices: be stil thy self then, and " truly Noble as thou art. It may be for his place thou
" owest him respect; but what? therewith the losse of " honour? thine affection, but not thy bed; thy Loue
" but not thy beloued, yet hast thou lost at once all " these, and he thy only bereauer: thou wast my stay whilest I stayed by thee; and now beeing downe, re-

"uenge my fall: the inſtinct of nature doth pitty our "weakneſſe, the law of Nations doth maintaine our "honour, and the ſword of Knighthood is ſworne by "to be vnſheathed for our iuſt defence; much more "the linke of wedlocke claimes it, which hath lockt "two hearts in one; but alas, that ward is broken, "and I am thy ſhame, who might haue beene thine "honour. Reuenge thy ſelfe therefore both on him "and mee, elſe ſhall this hand let out the Ghoſt that "ſhall ſtill attend thee with acclamations, till thou re-"uenge my ſtained bloud.

(5) Beorn vnwonted thus to bee welcommed, much amazed at his wiues maladies, with gentle words drew from her the particulars of her inward griefe, who reuealed (as well as ſhame, and teares, and ſobs, would ſuffer) the manner of the deed, ſtil vrging reuenge for the wrong. Beorn touched thus to the quicke, to pacifie his diſtreſſed wife, did not a little diſſemble his wrath, and excuſing the fact, with the power of a Prince that might command, and her owne weakneſſe vnable to reſiſt the ſtrength of a man: Commended much her loue and conſtancy; and alleadging his wrongs to bee equall with hers, if not greater, in regard of their ſexe, willed her to ſet her ſtring to his tune till fitte opportunity would ſerue to ſtrike: but ſhee diſtaſting that ſweet conſort, wreſted her paſſiō into ſo high a ſtrain, that nothing couldbe heard but reuenge & bloud.

(6) Beorn thus inſtigated by the continuall cries of his wife, whoſe rape already of it ſelfe had giuen ſufficient cauſe of wrath: firſt conſulting with his neereſt friends, was offered their aſsiſtance againſt that wicked and libidinous Prince, and then repairing to his Court, in preſence of them all, made knowne his vnſufferable wrongs, and with vtter defiance departed, threatning his death.

This Nobleman in his youth had been brought vp in Denmarke, and is reported to haue been allied into the Daniſh roiall bloud. Hee therefore accounted this nation the ſureſt vnto himſelfe, and the fitteſt in will and power to enter his quarrell: ſo comming to Goderick King of that Country, made his caſe knowne, inſtantly deſiring his aide againſt the villanie of Osbright.

Godericke glad to haue ſome quarrell to enter Britaine, leuied an Armie with all ſpeed, and preparation made for all things neceſſarie, ſendeth forth Inguar and Hubba two brethren to command in chiefe, ouer an innumerable multitude of his Danes: which two hee thought at this time the fitteſt for the attempt, not onely for their well approued reſolution and valour, but alſo for that hee knew them to bee, on particular motiues (which vſually more affect then doth a common cauſe) implacably enraged againſt the Engliſh, on an occaſion vnfortunately happning, but moſt lamentably purſued: which it will not bee amiſſe here to annexe.

* That is Leather-briche.

(7) A certaine Daniſh Nobleman of the roiall lineage named * Lothbroke, Father to this Inguar & Hubba, being vpon the ſhore, his Hawke in flying, the game fell into the Sea, which to recouer, hee entred a little Schiffe or Cock-boat, nothing foreſeeing the danger that immediately did enſue: for a ſodaine tempeſt ariſing, carried the boat into the deepe, and droue him vpon the coaſt of Norffolke, where hee came to land at the Port called Rodham, and was no ſooner ſeene, but hee was taken for a ſpie; and preſently ſent to Edmund, King then of that prouince, who in his anſweres ſufficiently cleared that ſuſpition, when alſo declaring his birth & miſfortune, he was honourably entertained in the Court of the Eaſt-Angles: whom the King much eſteemed for his other good parts; but for his dexterity and expertneſſe in hawking, held him in a ſpeciall regard; inſomuch that the Kings Falconer named Bericke, conceiued both ſuch ſecret enuie and deadly hatred thereat, that hauiug him alone in a wood, he cowardly murthered him, & hid his dead body in a Buſh.

(8) Lothbroke in the Kings preſence and Court was ſoone miſt and diligent inquiſition made could not bee found vntill his Spaniell, which would not forſake his dead Maſters corps, came fawninglie vnto the King, as ſeeming to begge reuenge on ſo bloody an Act, which he did more then once, & at length being obſerued, and followed by the trace, the dead body was found; and Bericke conuicted for the murther, his iudgement was to bee put into Lothbrokes boat, and that without either tackle or Oare, as he therein arriued, and ſo left to the ſeas mercy to be ſaued by deſtiny, or ſwallowed vp by iuſt deſert.

Murther will

But behold the euent; the Boat returned to the ſame place, and vpon the ſame coaſt arriued from whence it had beene driuen, euen in Denmarke, where Bericke being known, and hands laid on hm, to free himſelfe from the puniſhment of his butcherly fact, he added treaſon to murther, laying it to the charge of innocent King Edmund.

(9) In reuenge whereof, and likewiſe in Godericks quarrell, Inguar and Hubba, ſons to the murthered Prince, being now made Generals of the Army of the Danes, firſt arriuing at Holderneſſe, burnt vp the Country, and without mercy maſſacred all before them, ſparing neither ſexe, nor calling, nor age; and ſurprizing Yorke, which Osbright had taken for his refuge, there ſlew that luſtfull Prince with all his forces, and poſſeſſed that City; and afterwards burſting into Norfolke, ſent this meſſage vnto King Edmund. That Inguar the moſt victorious Prince, dread both by ſea and land, hauing ſubdued diuers Countries vnto his ſubiection, and now arriued in thoſe parts where hee meant to winter, charged Edmund to diuide with him his riches, and to become his vaſſaile and ſeruant.

The King aſtonied at this ſtrange and vnexpected Ambaſſage, conſulted with his Councell, where one of his Biſhops (then his Secretary, and a principall man) vſed perſwaſions to him to yeeld, for preuenting greater miſchiefe; who notwithſtanding returned this anſwere: Goe tell your Lord, that Edmund the Chriſtian King, for the loue of this temporall life, will not ſubiect himſelfe to a Heathen and Pagan Duke. Whereupon Inguar and Hubba, with the furious troupes of their Danes, purſued the King to Thetford; and (as Fabian ſaith) to Framingham, others to Halesdon; where he pittying the terrible ſlaughter of his people, yeelded himſelfe to their perſecutions; and for that hee would not deny Chriſt, and his Chriſtian faith, was bound to a tree or Stake, and with their arrowes ſo ſhot to death: whoſe body was afterward there buried, and thereupon tooke the name of S. Edmunds-bury; as wee haue formerly touched in his raigne, Lib. 7. cap. 11.

(10) Whether theſe were the very true cauſes, or ſome other, which drew theſe Danes hither, moſt certaine it is and too lamentable experience ſhewed, that hither they came (by Writers account) about the yeere of Chriſt eight hundred, and in the daies of King Brightrick. Neither want there Authors who aſcribe certain predictions to haue forerunne the yeere 800. made vnfortunate by their firſt attempts; fore-ſhewed ſeuen yeeres before, by ſhowers of bloud falling from heauen, and bloudy Croſſes markt therewith vpon the garments of men, reported by the learned Alcuinus, who was inſtructor to Charles the Great, and borne in the county of Yorke, where this wonder happened: which himſelfe ſaw & teſtified vnto Ethelbert King of that Prouince, as Malmsbury hath written, and was thought by Houeden, Higden, Fabian and others, to haue beene ſent for ſignes before their bloudy aſſaults, which beganne at the day-ſpring of the Saxons Monarchy, when it promiſed a moſt faire aſcent to their heires ſucceeding, but mounted to the higheſt, againe declined as the ſetting Sunne, and fell vnder the cloudes of their owne ruines, ſo carried by the iuſt reuenging hand of God: for thoſe Saxons hauing by bloud and warre vnſeated the Britaines tunes of their land and right, by bloud and warre, were by these Pagan-Danes so vncessantly molested, that no place was freed from their tyranny, nor any state sure, long to hold that, which they enioyed, nor their liues secured from a daily expectation of their sauage swords.

(11) Whose many inuasions and cruell proceedings against this land and nation, are already shewed in the raignes of these Saxon Kings, who then felt their heauy strokes in warre, hauing nothing almost memorable otherwise, to enlarge their fames and stories with, besides these their valours in resisting so mighty and almost vnrepugnable an enemie. Therefore omitting to repeat such things as in their successions are handled, we will fall neerer the time of the wished harueſt of their full Conquests: some what remembring the Reader here, of those bloudie affaires, which the English at seuerall times felt and endured.

(12) Such was the murther of holy Edmund King of the East-Angles, with Danish arrowes martyred to death as hee stoode bound vnto a stake, euer-calling on the name of Iesus: Of Ella and Osbright Gouernours of Northumberland by them slaine, and that Prouince for a long time after by them enioied, and made subiect to their furies: Of Burdred King of Mercia, by them expulsed, who with his Queene Ethelswith, were forced to abandon their Kingdome, leauing it to the possession of these Pagan intruders, and to seeke their securities in forreine Countries, where at Rome in Italy hee died, and at Padua his wife, as hath beene said: Of Ethelred King of the West-Saxons, that in one yeeres continuance fought nine bloudie battles against them, in the last whereof at Merton hee receiued his deaths wound, and this Kingdome an vncurable blow: Of Elfred that most famous and learned King of the West-Saxons also, driuen by them to such distresse, that hee was forced to leaue his Princely Court, and to remaine secret in a poore Cow-heards house vnknowne and disguised, in the Isle of Ethelingsey in the County of Sommerset; and thence to aduenture himselfe among the Danish host, as a base Minstrell and Contemptible make-sport; till hee had perfectly learned their secrets, and after with his sword through the thickest of those Enemies, made a way to his owne most glorious Monarchie.

(13) To speake nothing of the desolations left in euerie Prouince, Towne, and Place, where they came, laying all leauell with the ground, as prints of their foote-steppes where they had troden: Their cruell and mercilesse dealings towards holy and religious persons, with the ruination of Churches, and other places for Oratorie, is most lamentable to bee rehearsed or remembred: and among many others, the faire & beautifull Monasteries of Braaney, Crowland, Peterborow, Ely, and Coldingham, were made subiect to their desolations: In the last whereof, Lady Ebbe with her chast Nunnes, to auoid their sauage and filthie pollutions, cutte off their owne noses and vpper-lippes, least the baite of their beauties should prooue the bane of their honours & honestie.

The most greeuous tribute and exactions laied vpon the poore Inhabitants in generall, and great sums of money, paied in such afflicted & vnseasonable times, imposed by the name of Dane-gilt, did from ten thousand, arise to forty thousand pounds, yeerely gathered for them in England. Their sturdy behauiour and Lord-like carriage against the English, in all places where euer they soiourned, was with such subiection of the poore Owners, that they abused both wife, daughter, and maide, and were of all called the Lord-Dane, till lastly they were Lords indeede of the Land, and swaied the Scepter at their owne pleasures; which how it was attained vnto, wee haue before declared, and how it was worne and continued, wee are now presently to speake.

Some say forty eight thousand, Langues saith fifty.

CANVTVS THE FIRST DANISH KING RAIGNING INENGLAND AND THE THIRTIE FOVRTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN, HIS ACTS, RAIGNE, WIVES AND ISSVE.

CHAPTER III.

An.D.1017. THe ſailes of the Danes thus ouer-filled with the gales of their ſwelling fortunes, and themſelues arriued at the Port of their long ſought ſoueraignety, caſt anker as it were at the hauen of their wiſhed deſire, and prepared themſelues to a ſetled reſt: for Canutus poſſeſt of halfe the Kingdome by compoſition with Edmund, now after his death ſeazed vpon the whole; and that all things (as was pretended) might proceed with iuſtice, and concord, he called a Counſell of the Engliſh Nobility at London; wherein was propounded, whether, in the agreement betwixt Edmund and him, any claime of title to the Crowne, had beene reſerued, for King Edmunds brethren or ſonnes. The Engliſh that had paid a very deere rate for their ouerbold reſiſtance before, not daring now to buy, with too late repentance, the wrath of this Dane, abſolutely anſwered, No; and hauing learned to appeaſe Princes with flattery, offered their ſwords againſt any ſuch claimes, and tooke themſelues the Oath of alleagiance vnto Canutus; who beeing a very wiſe and politike Prince, thought neuer the better of them for ſuch their doings; whoſe truths thus failing towards their naturall Princes, could neuer (hee well knew) ſtand firme for him or his forreine poſteritie.

Polychr. li. 6. c. 18.

Feare makes flatterers.

(2) But being thus cleered of all other oppoſites, hee prepared with great roialty for his Coronation, which was performed at London, by the hands of Lyuingus ſurnamed Elſtane, Archbiſhop of Canterburie, in the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus 1017. beeing the ſecond King of Denmarke of that Name, the firſt of England, and the thirty fourth Monarch of this Land. His firſt deſignes for the eſtabliſhment of the Crowne to himſelfe and Daniſh iſſue, was a care to preuent others neere vnto the claime, and therefore, taking counſell with Edrike, baniſhed Edwin, who for his melancholy and regardleſſe deportment, was commonly called, the King of Churles, ſon of King Ethelred, and brother of Edmund; notwithſtanding, hee was guilefully recalled, and treacherouſly murthered by his owne men, whoſe bodie they buried at Tauiſtocke in Deuon-ſhire.

Canutus takes policies to ſtrengthen his Crowne.

(3) One cloud thus ouer-blowne, two others appeared, far more dangerous in Canutus ſight; namely Edward and Edmund the ſonnes of the Iron-ſide, whom albeit their yongue yeeres might haue freed from ſuſpition of conſpiracies, and their gentle diſpoſitions from enuying his glory, yet the bright raies of a Diadem ſo dazeled his ielous eie, that euer he ſaw (to his owne ſeeming) the reflection thereof ſhine from their faces: but aſhamed (ſaith Higden) to lay hand on them himſelfe, ſent them to his halfe brother of Sweden, to be made away, as we haue ſaid. In the doubtfull times betweene Edmund and Canute, when the ſcale of warre was held of either hands alike, Queene Emma had ſent Edward, and Alfred (her ſonnes by King Ethelred) vnto her brother Duke Richard of Normandy; whereby (wee ſee) the Land was emptied of the Engliſh bloud Roiall, and the Crowne left for the Dane without competition.

(4) Who now ſeeking to hold faſt the Scepter thus graſped, ſought the alliance of the Norman Duke by the eſpouſing of his ſiſter, faire Emma; a ſuite ſounding but harſhely in the eares of the Engliſh, yea and moſt of all vnto her ſelfe, as deeming the linke of loue verie ſlender, that might bee broken by the ſame hand, which was the death of her Husband: Notwithſtanding, withstanding, after good deliberation, knowing him childlesse of any lawfull successor, vpon couenants agreed, that the issue of her body by him, should inherite the English Crowne: the suit was granted; hoping also, if that failed betwixt them, to establish her other sonnes by King Ethelred.

Canutus marries Queene Emma

This prouident respect so pleased the subiects, that it both drew the hearts of the English vnto Canutus, and their loue vnto Emma in a surpassing measure, as the booke penned to her praise, and written in that age, intituled Encomium Emmæ, sufficiently doth shew.

(5) Neither was her louing care limitted onlie to her sonnes, but further extended towards the Common-wealth, being much pestred then with his Danes, that lay lazie and idle as drones in the hiue: who at her instigations were sent into Denmarke; & lest they should through discontents make any stirres either here or there, had a largesse (to buy their contentment) of foure score and two thousand pounds.

(6) Canutus his next care for the maintenance of his owne safety, and the continuance of his new got Empire, was the establishment of good lawes (which if duly executed, are the very sinewes and strongest guards of all States) to be administred and practised both on the English and Dane alike: wherefore calling a Parliament of his Peeres vnto Oxford, there established many wholsom Acts both for the Clergy and Laitie to obserue; some of which were diuulged by the praise-worthy care of a studious Antiquarie, and a few as touching Religion, as a relish of the rest, we thinke it not amisse to giue the Reader a tast of.

(7) And first, for the celebration of Gods most diuine seruice it was ordained, that all decent ceremonies tending to the encrease of reuerence and deuotion, should be vsed, as need required.

That vpon the Lords Sabbath, publike Faires, Markets, Synods, Conuenticles, Huntings, & all secular actions should not bee exercised, vnlesse some weighty and vrgent necessity required it.

That euery Christian should thrice in the yeere addresse himselfe to the receiuing of the blessed sacrament of the Lords Supper.

That if a Minister of the Altar killed a man, or else committed any notorious crime, hee should be depriued both from his order and dignity.

That the married woman conuicted for adultery should haue her nose and eares cut off.

That a widow marying within the space of twelue moneths after her husbands decease should lose her iointer.

(8) These & many other were made, wherby sinne was much restrained, and this realme peaceably and iustly gouerned. As likewise sundry other Countries were by his godly and roiall care; as in especiall is recorded of a yong Gentleman of the Danish roiall bloud, named Odin, whom King Canute brought ouer with him into England, to be here trained vp in learning, where he profited so well, as also by his trauaile through France (whereby hee much encreased both his knowledge and experience) that he attained the surname of Sapient, and the Philosopher, and therefore was called Odin-char, for the deere esteeme wherein all men held him. This man by his preaching in Finland, Zeland, Scandia, and Sweuland, conuerted great multitudes to the faith of Christ.

(9) But in Denmarke things proceeded not so wel; for in the absence of Canutus, and yeer of Christs humanity 1019. the Vandals sore annoied his subiects: hee therefore, in the third of his raigne, with a great host of the English passed ouer the seas, and bad his enemies battaile, which, as Mathew of Westminster writeth, went sore against him the first day; and preparing againe for the next, Earle Goodwine, who was Generall of the English, attempted a great enterprize: for in the dead of the night, hee with his souldiers set vpon the Campe of the Vandals, and with a great slaughter of their souldiers, made the two Princes, Vlfus and Anlaue to flie the field.

Canute ignorant of this acted enterprise, had notice in the morning that the English were fled, for that their station was left, and not a man found: wherfore following the tract, euen to the enemies campe; by streames of bloud, and dead bodies of the Vandals; hee saw the great ouerthrow that the English had giuen them, for which he euer after held them in great estimation. Henry Hunting. Polydor. Fabian.

(10) Albertus Krantius, the Danish historian, reporteth that Olanus King of Sweyden, hauing assisted Canute against Edmund the Ironside, and seeing himselfe to be neglected in the composition betwixt them, moued such stirres in Denmarke, that Canutus was forced thither againe; where by the prowesse of his English hee repulsed Olanus, who lastly was slaine by his owne subiects. Alb. Krantius.

(11) William of Malmesbury and Mathew of Westminster record, that in the yeere 1032. he vndertooke an expedition into Scotland, with prosperous successe against Malcolme the King thereof, with two other Princes called Melbeath and Ieohmare. But being at length ouerburdened as it were with his own greatnesse, and surfeited with glory, which sometimes he had so greedily desired (as euen the greatest earthly delights haue their fulnes) hee resolued on a more placable course of life, and to affect a higher and heauenly glory, which hath neuer satiety or end. And therefore his deuotion being great vnto Godward, on a zealous intent, (such a zeale as S. Paul commended in the deuout Israelites) hee tooke a iourney to Rome, to visite the sepulchres of S. Peter and Paul in the fifteenth yeere of his raign; & thence sent his letters to his English Bishops and Nobility, beginning thus. An. D. 1028. Wil. Malmsbury. Mat. Westminster Rom. 10. 2.

(12) Canute King of all England, Denmarke, Norway and Sweyden, to Ailnothus Metropolitan, &c. Wherein hauing first set downe the reason of his pilgrimage to Rome, which was especially to honour S. Peter, as hee had beene taught by Wisemen, that S. Peter had receiued from Christ the great power of binding and loosing, and was also the Key-bearer of heauen-gates, for which cause (lest S. Peter should not open the same vnto him when hee should come thither) he held it most behouefull for him to procure his Patronage more then all the rest of Saints; then making relation of his honourable entertainement with the Emperour, Pope, and other forreine Princes, sheweth what complaint hee had made against the excesiue exactions and huge summes of money extorted by the Pope from the English Arch-Bishops, at such time as they receiued their Palles from Rome; for redresse whereof, and of other abuses, the Pope in a solemn assembly of foure Arch-Bishops, twenty Bishops, and an innumerable multitude of Princes and Nobles obliged himselfe: And thence proceedeth in vowing the whole remainder of his life and reigne, to the onely seruice of God, and due administration of Iustice to his people; to which end, hee first giues command to his Counsellours, that thence forward they dare not, for whatsoeuer respect, to giue way or conniuence to any the least iniustice in his Kingdom; and next to his Officers of Iustice, that as they tender his roiall fauour and their own liues, they swerue not from Equity in execution of their places, in respect of any man whosoeuer, no not, for the enriching of the Kings owne Cophers, because (saith hee) I hold it not needefull, that treasure should bee heaped together for mee, by any vniust exactions: and so concludeth with a strict charge to all his Bishops and Iustices, vpon their allegiance both to God and himselfe, to take order in his absence, that Gods Church, and his Ministers, bee not defrauded of their Tithes and rights, whereof he vowes at his returne to take a most seuere account. *Wil. (13) By this his great care of his owne saluation, and his peoples tranquillity, we may see the zeale of those darke daies, to haue beene accompanied with the workes of true pietie; whose carnall applications of the spirituall texts, may well condemne these cleerer times, and daies of more brightnes, wherein wee know, that this Key-keeper of heauen, is no other but the verie Christ, who hath the Key of Dauid, which openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth. And that this Kings zeale might bee further seene, by his magnificke workes, he beganne to manifest it euen at Rome, where giuing many large gifts vnto *S. His Munificence

(14) In Essex hee built the Church of Ashdon, where hee had the victory against King Edmund. In Norfolke the Abbey of S. Benets, which Saint he greatly reuerenced; and in Suffolke with an especiall deuotion built and endowed the Monastery of S. Edmund, which Saint he most dreadly feared: for it is reported, that the seeming-ghost of Edmund often affrighted him; for which cause, as also to expiate the sinnes of his father, who had done great dammage to his possession, hee inuerged the same with a deepe ditch, and offered vp his Crowne vpon the Martyrs Tombe. Most rich and roiall Iewels hee gaue the Church of Winchester, wherof one, is recorded to bee a Crosse, worth asmuch as the whole reuenew of England amounted to in one yeare: vnto Couentry hee gaue the Arme of S. Augustine the great Doctor; which he bought at Papia in his returne from Rome, and for which hee paid an hundred talents of siluer, and one of gold.

(15) The magnificent greatnes of this glorious King, so ouerflowed in the mouthes of his flatterers, that they extolled him, with Alexander, Cyrus, and Cæsar, and to be possessed with power, more then humane: to conuict these his fawning ouerprizers, being then at Southampton, he commanded (saith Henry of Huntington) that his chaire should be set on the shore, when the sea beganne to flow, and then in the presence of his many attendants; spake "thus to that Element. Thou art part of my do-"minion, and the ground whereon I sit is mine, nei-"ther was there euer any that durst disobey my com-"maund, or breaking it, escaped vnpunished; I "charge thee therfore presume not into my land, nei-"ther wet thou these robes of thy Lord: but the Sea (which obeyeth only one Lord) giuing no heed to his threates, kept on the vsuall course of tide, first wetting his skirts; and after his thighes; when suddainely rising to giue way for the still approching waues, he thus spake in the hearing of all: Let the worlds inhabitants know, that vaine and weake is the power of their Kings; and that none is worthy the name of King, but he that keepes both heauen, earth and sea in obedience, and bindeth them in the euerlasting law of subiection. After which time he would neuer suffer the Crowne to bee set vpon his head, but presently crowned therewith, the picture of our Sauiour on the Crosse at Winchester: vnto such strong illusions were those godly Princes lead, by the guides that euer made gaine of their deuotions.

His humility.

(16) From the example of this Canutus (saith Peter Pictauiensis Chancellor of Paris) arose the custom to hang vp the Armor of worthy men in Churches, as offerings consecrated vnto Him, in whose battails they had purchased renowne, either by victory and life, or in their Countries seruice attained to an honourable death. And surely, howsoeuer this King is taxed of ambition, pride and vaine-glory, for which some haue not stucke to say, that he made his iourney to Rome, rather to shew his pompe and riches, then for any humble deuotion or religious intent, yet by many his intercurrent actions and lawes of piety enacted, hee may iustly bee cleared of that imputation; as also by the testimony of Simon Monk of Durham, who reporteth his humility to be such, that with his owne hands he did helpe to remoue the body of S. Aelphegus at the translation of it from London vnto Canterbury, whom the Danes (notwithstanding his Archiepiscopall & sacred calling) before had martyred at Greenwich: and by the testimony of Guido, Polydore, Lanquet, and others, he was a Prince of such temperance and iustice, that no other in this West of the World was so highly renowned, or might bee compared vnto him in heroicall vertues, or true humility.

(17) Saxo Grammaticus, & Albertus Krantius the Writers of the Danish histories, deduce Canutus by a lineall succession through the line of their Kings in this manner: Hee was (say they) the sonne of King Swaine (surnamed Tingskeg) by Sigred his wife, the widow of Erick, by whom she had Olafe Scotconning King of Sweyden: vnto which Sweyne she bare also Ostrid a daughter, the mother of Thira, the mother of King Sweyne the yonger. The elder Sweyne was the sonne of King Harold, surnamed Blaatand, by Gonhild his Queene, who bare him also Iring King of Northumberland, and Gonhild Queene of North-Wales. The father of Harold was King Gormond, whose Queene was Thira the daughter of King Ethelred, the twenty third Monarch of England, who bare vnto him the said Harold, and another Canute both most valiant Princes; which two Gallants inuading this land, were (for their braue resolutions) by their Grandfather proclaimed heires apparant to all his dominions: the credite of which relations I leaue to my forenamed Authors; but Canute (the elder brother) died very soone after, being deadly wounded in the siege of Dublin in Ireland; where perceiuing death at hand, hee gaue strict charge to his attendants, to keepe the same verie secret till the City were taken, that so neither his owne Army should bee daunted, nor the enemy encouraged by the losse of the Generall. Gurmo, his aged Father, (to digresse but in a word) so incredibly loued him, that hee had vowed to kill with his owne hands any person whosoeuer that should tell him the newes of his sonnes death: which when Thira his mother now heard of, shee vsed this policie to make it known to the King her husband. Shee prepared mourning apparrell for him, and all other things fitting for funerall exequies, laying aside all Regall robes, and ceremonies of princely state, without intimating any cause of this sad solemnity; which the old King no sooner perceiued, but he lamentably cried out, woe is me, I know my sonne is dead; and with excessiue griefe he presently died. But to returne from that Canutus, to close vp the raigne of this our Monarch in hand.

others, ſhee vſed in bringing forth Harold her ſecond ſonne, who was (ſay they) the ſonne of a Sowter; notwithſtanding I thinke the condition of the mother, who liued in diſdaine, and died in diſgrace, rather cauſed this report to be blazed, then any ſuch baſenes of birth in the ſonnes.

(20) Emma, the ſecond wife of King Canute, was the widow of King Ethelred the Vnready; and from the time of her firſt marriage was called in England, Elfgiue, after the name of moſt of the former Queens, which had ſucceeded Saint Elfgiue. Shee was married vnto him in the moneth of Iuly, and yeere of Chriſt Ieſus one thouſand and ſeuenteene, being the firſt yeere of his raigne: whoſe wife ſhee was eighteene yeeres, and ſuruiuing, kept ſtill at Winchester, vnto which Church ſhee gaue nine Manours, according to the number of thoſe firy Plow-ſhares that ſhee was forced to goe vpon, for her purgation, in the raigne of Edward her ſonne, as ſhall bee ſaid. This Church ſhee adorned with many goodly veſtures, and verie rich Iewelles: and deceaſing in this City the ſixt of March, the yeere of Grace one thouſand fiftie and two and ninth of her ſonne King Edwards raigne, was buried in the Church of S. Swithine neere vnto Canutus her husband.

His Iſſue.

(21) Sweyn, the eldeſt ſonne of Canute by Lady Alfgiue, was borne before his father was King of England, and before his fathers death, was conſtituted King of Norway, lately conquered from King Olafe the Martyr; where hee beganne his Raigne, in the yeere of mans ſaluation one thouſand thirty and fiue, being the eighteenth of his fathers Raigne in England; and after he had with diſlikes ruled that Realme, the ſpace of fiue yeeres, hee was reiected of the Norwegians his ſubiects, and deceaſing without heire of his body, left the Kingdome to the natiue heire, Magnus, the ſonne of Olaffe, who had beene wrongfully diſpoſſeſſed by Canute.

(22) Harold, the ſecond ſonne of King Canute and of Lady Alfgiue, was alſo born before his father obtained the Engliſh Crown, & for his exceeding ſwiftnes was ſurnamed Hare-foote: He remained with his father in England, after he had diſpoſed of Denmark to Hardi-canute, and Norway to Sweyne, his brethren, expecting ſomething in reuerſion. But perceiuing at his fathers death, that England was alſo appointed to his brother Hardi-canute, hee tooke the aduantage of his abſence, and aſſumed the Soueraignety of this Kingdome to himſelfe.

(23) Hardi-Canute, the third ſonne of King Canute, and his firſt by Queene Emma his wife, was borne about the beginning of his fathers Raigne, and towards the end of the ſame, was conſtituted King of the Danes, and deſigned to ſucceede him after his death in the Kingdome of England: But beeing abſent then in Denmark, was diſappointed by his brother Harold, who ſucceeded his father, after whoſe death he alſo ſucceeded him.

(24) Gunhilda, the daughter of King Canute, and of Emma his Queene, was the firſt wife of Henrie the Third, Romane Emperour, ſonne of the Emperour Conrad, the ſecond of that name ſurnamed Salike: ſhee was a Lady of a ſurpaſsing beauty, which either mooued her husbands mind vnto ielouſie, or the ouer-lauiſh report thereof to breede ſurmize of incontinencie; for accuſed ſhee was of adulterie, and to defend her cauſe by combat, none could be found, till laſtly her Page, brought with her from England, ſeeing no other would aduenture for her innocencie, entred the liſt, himſelfe but a youth, in regard of the other Combatant beeing a Giant-like man; yet in fight at one blow, cutting the ſinewes of his enemies legge, with another he feld him to the ground, where preſently with his ſword, hee tooke his head from the ſhoulders, and ſo redeemed his Ladies life. After which hard vſage, the Empreſſe Gunhilda forſooke her husbands bed, and by no meanes could bee brought againe vnto the ſame, but tooke the holy vaile of a Nunne in the Town of Burges in Flanders; where ſhe ſpent the reſt of her life, and after her death was buried in the Collegiate Church of S. Donatian, being the principall of that town, where her Monument remaineth beſides the north dore of the ſame Church vnto this day.

(25) Another Lady of the like ſanctity, is reported to be the daughter of King Canut, and the ſecond wife of Godeſcalke Prince of the Vandals; by whom he had Henry King of that Nation. They both are ſaid to haue ſuffered Martyrdome for the faith of Chriſt; he firſt at the City of Lenzim, and ſhe after at Michelenburg, being moſt cruelly tortured to death with whips. This Lady vpon ſundry ſtrong inducements cannot be reputed legitimate, which moued Andrew Velley, a Daniſh Writer in our time, to be therin of a diuers opinion from Adam of Bremē, and Helmoldus who liued fiue hundred yeeres before him.

HAROLD, THE SECOND DANISH KING RAIGNING INENGLAND, AND THE THIRTIE FIFT MONARCH OF THE LAND, HIS RAIGNE, AND ACTS.

Chapter IIII.

An.D.1036.

Mat. Weſtminſter.

Wil. Malmſ.

ANVTVS being dead, & Hardicanute his ſonne by Queene Emma then in Denmarke; Harold his elder (but baſe brother) foreſlowed not the opportunity offered; for ſeeing himſelfe in his fathers life time neglected, and by will at his death, England with that of Denmarke heaped vpon Hardicanut: as quicke in apprehenſion, as hee was of footmanſhippe (whereof aroſe the ſurname Hare-foot,) made ſtrong his ſide by the Londoners, and Danes, Mercians, & Northumbrians very many, yea and ſome great Perſonages amongſt them, affecting his claime: but Goodwin of Kent who had the Queene and her treaſure in keeping, ſtood in his way, pretending himſelf Guardian of her Children, & the will of Canutus, who appointed his ſonne by her to ſucceede.

Peter de Ickan.

Henry Hunt.

(2) The oppoſition grew ſtrong, and the factions ripened, euen ready to ſeede, onely the lingering of Hardicanute gaue leaue vnto Harold to better his ſide by daily ſupplies, and the feares of ciuill ſedition moued the Nobility to argue with wordes and not weapons, the title depending betwixt theſe two brethren. At Oxford they met, where the preſence of the one, downe-peized the abſence of the other, ſo that their voices went onely with Harold, and preſently proclaimed and conſecrated him King.

Floriacenſis.

(3) He beganne his raigne the yeere of Chriſts humanity, 1036. and was very ſolemnly crowned at Oxford by Elnothus Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, though for a time, hee was very vnwilling to performe that ſeruice; for it is reported, that hee hauing the regall ſcepter and Crowne in his cuſtody, with an oath refuſed to conſecrate any other for King, ſo long as the Queenes children were liuing; For (ſaid he) Canutus committed them to my truſt and aſſurance, and to them will I giue my faith and allegiance. This Scepter and Crowne therefore I here lay downe vpon this Altar; neither doe I denie, nor deliuer them to you; but I require by the Apoſtolike authority, all Biſhops, that none of them preſume to take the ſame away, neither therewith that they conſecrate you for King: as for your ſelfe if you dare, you may vſurpe that which I haue committed to God on this his Table.

Notwithſtanding that great thunderclappe was allaied with the ſhowres of golden promiſes, of his iuſt and religious Gouernment intended, though preſent experience manifeſted the contrary.

Encom. Emma.

(4) For ſaith the auncient Writer of the booke called Encomium Emmæ: Harold no ſooner was eſtabliſhed King, but that he ſought means how to rid Queen Emma out of the way, and that ſecretly, for openly hee durſt not attempt any thing againſt her: Shee in ſilence kept her ſelfe quiet, looking for the iſſue of his deſignes. But Harold malitiouſly purpoſing, tooke counſell how hee might traine into his Haye the ſonnes of Queene Emma, that ſo all occaſion of dangers againſt him might at once for all bee cut off: many proiects propounded, this laſtly tooke effect; that a letter ſhould be counterfeited in Queen Emma's name, vnto her ſonnes Edward and Alfred, to inſtigate them to attempt the crowne vſurped by Harold, againſt their right, the tenure whereof we haue thought good here to inſert.

(5) Emma, Queene onely in name, to Edward "and Alfred her ſonnes, ſendeth motherly gree"tings. Whileſt ſeuerally wee bewaile the death "of our Soueraigne, my Lord and your Father, and
"your ſelues (deare ſonnes) ſtill more and more diſ-
"poſſeſſed from the Kingdome, your lawfull inhe-
"ritance; I greatly maruaile what you determine to do,

"doe, ſith you know, that the delay of attempts "giues the vſurper more leaſure to lay his foun- "dation, and more ſafely to ſet thereon his in- "tended buildings; for inceſſantly hee poſteth "from towne to towne, and from City to Ci- "ty, to make the Lords and Rulers thereof his, "either by threates, prayers, or preſent rewards. "But this in priuate they ſignifie, that they had ra- "ther one of you their Natiues ſhould raigne ouer "them, then this vſurper & Daniſh ſtranger. Wher- "fore my deſire is, that either of you ſecretly, and "with all ſpeed come vnto mee, whereby wee "may aduiſe together what is to be done in this ſo "great an enterpriſe: then whoſe good ſucceſſe, I "deſire nothing more. Faile not therefore to ſend "word by this my meſſenger, how you meane to "proceed: and ſo fare yee well, my deereſt bowels, & "very inwards of my heart.

(6) Theſe letters thus carried and cunningly deliuered, were digeſted as ſauouring of no falſhood; and by the bringers, others returned, that Alfred ſhould come ſhortly ouer to attend his mothers deſignes: theſe, brought vnto Harold, the coaſtes were fore-laid, and longing expectation attended the prey. Alfred as forward to ſet on his voyage, made Baldwin Earle of Flanders his; and ſome few Bullogners increaſing his Fleet, hee tooke the ſeas for England: where comming to ſhore, Earle Goodwin met him, and binding his aſſurance with his corporall oath, became his liege-man, and guide to Queene Emma; but being wrought firme for Harold, trecherouſly led theſe ſtrangers a contrary way, and at Guilford lodged them in ſeuerall companies, making knowne to the King what he had done: who forthwith apprehended them euen in their beds, and in the morning as chained priſoners, committing them to ſlaughter, contrary to the wonted manner of military decimation, did ſpare and exempt onely euery tenth man for ſeruice or ſale: Prince Alfred himſelfe was ſent priſoner to the Iſle of Ely, where hauing his eyes inhumanely put out, liued not long after in torment and griefe. Rend. Higden, in Polychr. lib. 6. cap. 21.

(7) Some adde vnto the former, an other, much more horrible kind of cruelty, as that his belly was opened, and one end of his bowels drawn out, and faſtned to a ſtake, his body pricked with ſharpe needles, or poinards, was forced about till all his entrails were extracted, in which moſt ſauage torture hee ended his innocent life. Wil. Cathel.

(8) Harold thus freed from one, the other hee thought would no further attempt; and therefore the more boldly ſet himſelfe againſt their mother Queene Emma, whoſe goods he confiſcated, and baniſhed her out of the Realme: who thus diſtreſſed, was honourably receiued, and for three yeeres ſpace maintained by Baldwin Earle of Flanders. Henry Hunting.

(9) The Dane then ſeeing his hazards thus preuented, ſought ſo to ſecure himſelfe, and with ſixeteene ſhippes of the Daniſh Fleete kept the ſeas, which continued euer in a readineſſe, and waffed from Port to Port; to the maintenance whereof, he charged the Engliſh with great paimẽts, to their no little grudge & repining; wherby he loſt the loue of his ſubiects before it had well taken root in their hearts.

10) Neither yet held hee on long in theſe diſroiall courſes, for that his ſpeedy death did cut off the infamy of a longer life; and is ſaid to haue died at Oxford in the moneth of Aprill, the yeer of Chriſt Ieſus, 1040, after hee had raigned foure yeeres & ſome moneths: whoſe body was at firſt interred at Weſtminſter, hauing beene neither in warres ſo hardy, nor in gouernment ſo proſperous, as his Father Canut before him had beene, nor left behind him eyther wife or children, to ſuruiue his perſon, or reuiue his name. *Malmſb. HARDICANVTE, THE THIRD DANISH KING THAT RAIGNED IN ENGLAND, AND THE THIRTIE SIXT MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH-MEN, HIS RAIGNE, AND DEATH.

Monarch

CHAPTER V.

An.D. 1040.

Simon Dunel.

Mat. Westminster.

THE States of the land, aswell English as Danes, that had stood for Harold, both in obtaining and keeping the Crowne, now seeing him fallen, thought it best to make way for their peace, before Hardicanut by his sword should purchase their subiection; therefore with all hast they sent into Denmarke, with proffers of the scepter, and their forward allegiance only vnto him. Those parts beyond seas, were not then so subiectiue, as to build his hopes there vpon any sure ground; for the Norwegians had thrust out his halfe-brother Sweyne, and had elected Magnus the son of Olaffe for their King; so that small assurance could he perceiue of any quiet common-weale among them: and therefore fore-slowing not the offer, immediately imbarked his men of warre, and with so fauourable a wind tooke seas, that he arriued vpon the coast of Kent, the sixt day after hee had set saile out of Denmarke; and with great pompe conueied to London, was there proclaimed Englands King.

(2) Hee beganne his Raigne in the yeere of Grace one thousand and forty, and was crowned in London by Elnothus Arch-bishoppe of Canterbury, beeing the thirty sixt Monarch of the English-men: his raigne was spent in doing nothing, vnlesse you will say, in doing euill hee did something.

(3) For no sooner had he a power to command, but he forthwith commanded the body of his halfe-brother the deceased King, to bee digged vp, and with spitefull disgrace to bee throwne into Thamisis, where it remained vntill a Fisherman found it, and buried it in the Church-yard of S. Clement without Temple-Barre, commonly called Saint Clement-Danes, for that (saith Stow) it was the burying place of the Danes: this crueltie shewed, was pretended for the hard vsage of Queene Emma his mother, though partly spiced with reuenge for his vsurpation of the Crowne against him.

John Stow in Survey of L

(4) Yet is worthily to bee commended, for the reuerent regard hee bare to his Mother, and louing affection to his Brother; for no sooner was hee risen out of the throne of his Coronation, but that hee sent honorable Embassage vnto Earle Baldwine, with many thankes to him, for her princely vsage, and for her to returne into England to her former estate, and place of Queene. His brother Prince Edward comming ouer to visite them both, was most honourably receiued, retained, and dismissed; and these are the vertues regardable in this King.

(5) But his vices were more, and concerned more persons; for a great Epicure hee was, and giuen much vnto Cuppes, whereby he trained the body to belly cheere, and sense to bee subiect to sloth and drunkennesse; foure times euery day were his tables spred, and plenteously with all Cates furnished, euer commanding that his courtiers, guests, and seruants, should rather leaue, for superfluity, then call, for lack: which howsoeuer it was in him accounted for Roiall bounty, yet it caused in the people (who vse to praise the Soueraignes vertues, but imitate his vices) a riotous loosenesse, and the Common-weale to lie sicke of consumptions, bred by such excesse of those grosse humours in her body.

Henry Hunt. Will. Malmsb. de rer. Ang. Rand. Higden. Polyer. l. 6. c.

(6) This wrought in him a careless neglect of gouernment in State, so that the whole managing thereof was committed to his mother Queene Emma, a woman extreamely couetous, and to Goodwin, the rich and politicke Earle of Kent; who seeing the present state carried wholy away with present pleasures ſures, thought that a fitte ſubiect for him to worke vpon; for the King not married (vnleſſe it were to his lewd will) and Edward likely to ſucceede, of an ouer ſoft temperature; hee thought theſe both might proue aduantageous to his ambition, and therfore bethought him, how the crowne might bee worne by him or his.

(7) Therefore, to ſeparate the hearts of the ſubiects from the Prince (then which, there can bee no greater a wound vnto both,) hee cauſed the King to impoſe heauy tributes vpon the Engliſh, onely to pay the Danes in his Fleete, appointing euerie common Souldier and Mariner, to receiue eight markes in money, & euery officer and Maſter twelue; which amounted to the ſumme of thirty two thouſand, one hundred forty ſeuen pounds: for the payment whereof, there was ſo great a grudge, that two of the Collectors, Thurſtane and Feader were ſlaine by the Citizens of Worceſter; which cauſed their City to be burnt, and part of the country ſpoiled by the Kings commaund, and their Biſhop Alfred expulſed the See, till with money hee had purchaſed his peace. This Biſhops hands (as was ſaid) were deepe in the murther of Prince Alfred, the Kings half brother, whom we ſpake of; yea, and Goodwin himſelfe was put to his purgation by oath, for the clearing of his ſuſpitions in that treacherous and brutiſh fact: which oath was the lighter vrged, and the eaſier receiued for his rich and bounteous gifts, immediately before preſented to the King, and that was a ſhippe, whoſe ſterne was of gold, with foureſcore ſouldiers therein placed, all vniformely and richlie ſuited. On their heads they al wore guilt Burgenets, and on their bodies a triple guilt habergion, a ſword with guilt hilts girded to their waſtes, a battaile-axe (after the manner of the Danes) on their left ſhoulders, a target with guilt boſſes borne in their left hands, a dart in the right, their armes bound about with two bracelets of gold, containing ſixeteene ounces in weight.

(8) Aimundus Bremenſis writing the Stories of thoſe times; ſheweth, that the three ſonnes of Canute were poſſeſſed of the three Kingdomes, England, Denmarke, and Norway, though the father by Will, had diſpoſed of the firſt otherwiſe; which moued Hardi-Canute much to maligne the roialtie of Harold, whoſe Crowne by birth and couenant belonged to him; and therfore with great preparation, intending to recouer his right, hee entred the Sea, and came into Flanders, where hauing notice of the vſurpers death, his rage was ſtaied, and he peaceably came in, and receiued the Crowne.

(9) And that Swein (called the Younger) King of Denmarke, to aſsiſt his vncle Hardi-Canute againſt Harold the vſurper of England's Crowne, with a great Armie prepared thitherward; and taking the Seas, were by tempeſt driuen vpon the coaſts of Hadeloe, where his Armie doing ſome hurt, was ſet vpon and diſcomfited by the ſouldiers of the Arch-biſhoppe: himſelfe amongſt them beeing taken priſoner, and brought into the preſence of the Arch-biſhop, was by him moſt honourably receiued, and conueied vnto Breme, who there entered a league with him, and with gifts and other complements, after a few daies, ſuffered him to depart; who likewiſe hearing of the death of King Harold, returned backe to his owne Countrey, where ſhortly after he was much moleſted by Magnus the ſonne of Olaf, then raigning King ouer the Norwegians.

(10) Hardi-Canute in England, hearing of thoſe ſtirres, thought it his part to aid his Nephew King Sweyn, againſt the inuaſions of Magnus: and therefore hee ſent one Sueno his kinſman, with an Armie of the Engliſh, to reeſtabliſh King Sweyn in his Throne. Theſe entred Norway, and the Field againſt the Norwegians, but by them were ſo ouerlaied, that hee left Magnus the vanquiſher, and returned againe for England; but before hee could arriue the Shore, King Hardi-Canute was dead, with whom dyed the iſſue of that warre; whoſe death was ſuddaine; and after this manner. Idem. M. S. Ad. 111.

(11) At the celebration of a great marriage, contracted betwixt a Daniſh Lord, called Canut-Prudan, and Lady Githa, the daughter of a Noble-man, whoſe name was Oſgot Clappa; in a ſolemne aſſembly, & banquet at Lambeth the eight of Iune, reuelling and carouſing amidſt his cups, hee ſuddainly fel down without ſpeech or breath: whoſe loſſe was the leſſe lamented for his exceſſe, riotouſneſſe, and vnwonted exactions: but chiefly becauſe a much better was then to ſucceede him; hauing himſelfe had neither wife nor child that is read off. Yea, ſo farre were all ſorts from bewailing him, that in regard of the freedome from the Daniſh yoke, which they attained by his deceaſe, euer ſince among the common people; the day of his death is annually celebrated with open paſtimes in the ſtreetes (as the old Romanes kept their fugalia; for chaſing out of their Kings,) which time is now called Hocktide or Huckstide, ſignifying a time of ſcorning or contempt, which fell vpon the Danes by his death. Simon Dun. Matth. W. ſ. Lambert Peramb. in Sandwich.

His body with all due obſequies was interred at Winchester by his fathers, after hee had voluptuouſly raigned two yeeres lacking ten daies, and departed his life and kingdome the yeere of Chriſt Ieſus, 1042.

(12) With the death of this King died all rule of the Danes in this land, and the ſacred ſparke of the Saxons fire (through three of their ſucceſsions) buried in their owne aſhes, beganne now to take flame and to burne moſt bright, which was Prince Edward (now commonly called the Confeſſor) the ſonne of King Ethelred; and albeit there were others betwixt him and the crowne, as namely, Edward and Edmund the ſonnes of the Iron-ſide, yet the one dying in Hungarie without iſſue of body, the other there liuing as a baniſhed man (by ſurname the Out-law) was neither ſo well regarded, nor thought ſo worthy of gouernement, as this other Edward was, whom therfore they ſent for, and with ſo great applauſe and acclamations proclaimed, that the preſent ioy ſeemed to prognoſticate a perpetuall happineſſe to the Engliſh, who had beene moſt miſerably afflicted by the Danes, for the ſpace of two hundred forty two yeeres; though this line againe failed, before it was well begunne. See booke 7. cap. 44. ſect. 9.

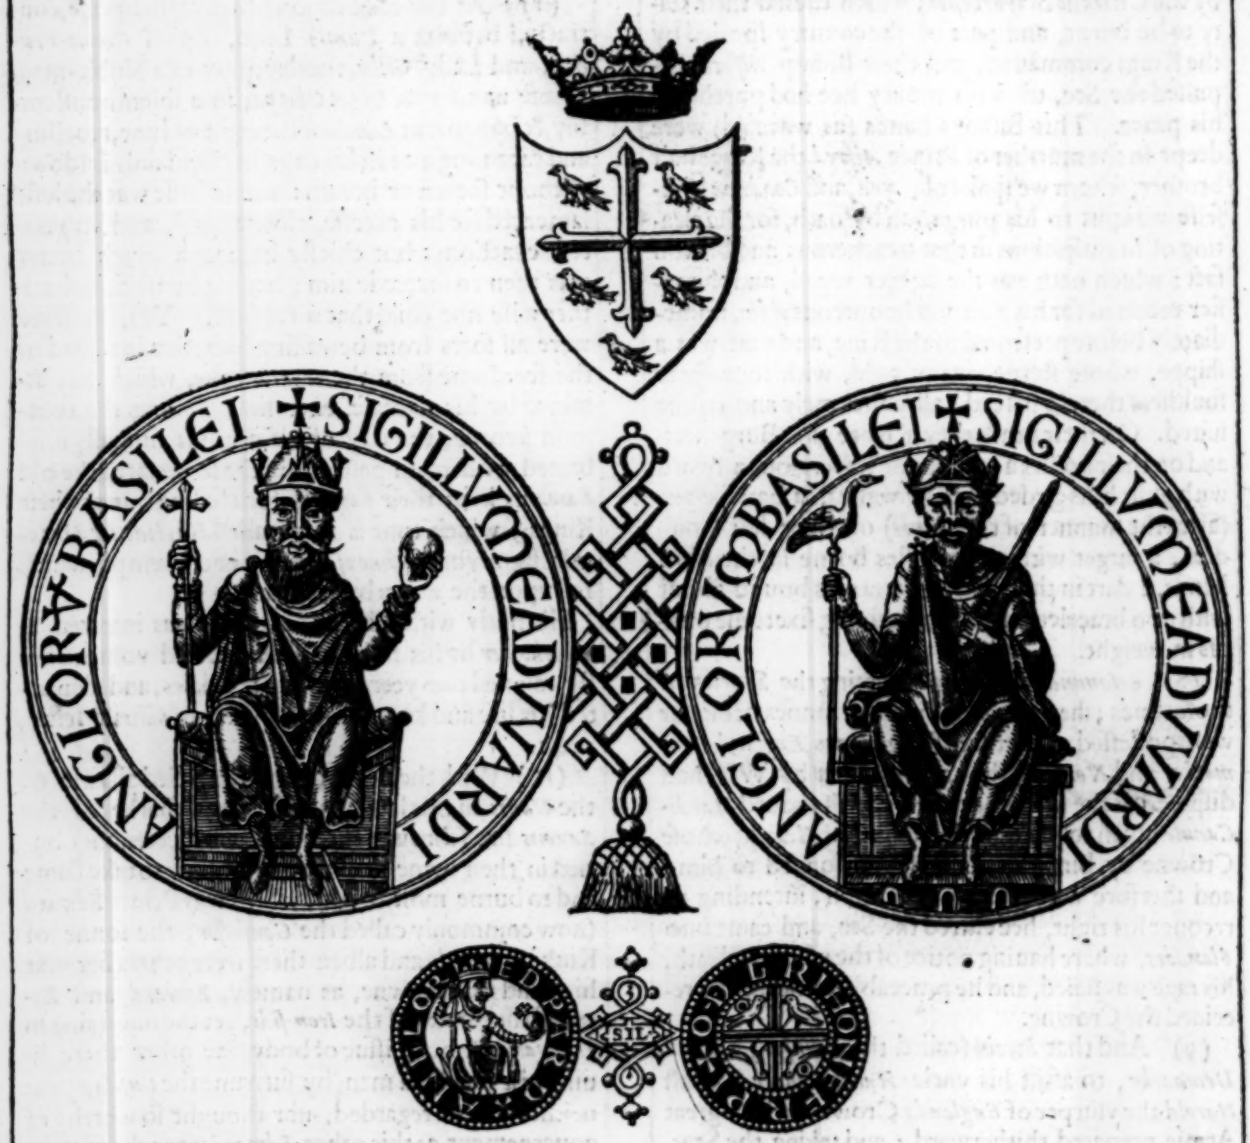
EDVVARD THE CONFESSOR,
SONNE OF KING ETHELRED, THE THIRTIE SEVENTH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN: HIS RAIGNE, VERTVES, AND MARRIAGE.



CHAPTER VI.

An. D. 1042. Henry Hunting.

EDward, the Third of that Name before the Conqueſt, halfe-brother to the deceaſed Hardi-Canute, and ſonne to King Ethelred by Queene Emma his wife, was by the prouident care of a Mothers affection, (when the variable ſucceſſe of Warre, doubtfully depended betwixt Edmund the Engliſh, and Canutus the Dane) ſent into Normandy to Duke Richard her Brother, there to bee ſecured from all domeſticall ſtirres: and now, before the dead corps could be enterred, with a generall conſent of the Nobles was elected their King.

(2) I know well that in the legend of this holy mans life, more things are recorded, then with ſafetie of truth may be either beleeued, or deliuered; as that he was choſen King by conſent of Parliament, when as yet he was in his mothers wombe, Ethelred his Father at the ſame time hauing many other ſonnes aliue; as alſo when the deſtroying Danes had extinguiſhed by their warres almoſt the whole Royall iſſue of the Engliſh, the holy Monke Brightwold, of Glaſtenbury deploring their loſſe, and the Lands miſerable eſtate, had in viſion this Edward, then an Exile, preſented vnto him by the Apoſtle S. Peter himſelfe, who then annointing him King in his ſight, telling him that his Raigne ſhould be peaceable, and twenty three yeeres for continuance; Brightwold yet vnſatisfied who ſhould next ſucceed, demanded the reſolution, and was anſwered by Peter, that the Kingdome of England was Gods owne Kingdome; for whoſe ſucceſſors himſelfe would prouide. With ſuch vaine predictions our otherwiſe true Stories are ouer-charged; which moued Cominæus the worthy French Hiſtorian, to tax the Engliſh with ouer much credulitie that way.

(3) But

(3) But moſt true it is, that the Engliſh Nobilitie diſclaiming all Daniſh ſubiection, preſently vpon the death of King Harold, enacted, That none of their bloud ſhould any more raigne ouer them: putting this their decree in execution by caſiering all Danes from the Caſtles, Forts, and Garriſon Townes throughout all the Land, whence ſome euen of their Bloud Royall were forced to depart. Then ſending ſecuritie into Normandy, with proffer of the Crowne vnto Prince Edward, had his conſent, and aſsiſtance of Duke William his coſen germane.

(4) This Edward (as elſewhere hath been ſaid) was borne at Iſlip neere vnto Oxford, and tenderly educated by Queene Emma his Mother; and after his Fathers death, for ſafety ſent into France; where, by his ſweet conuerſation hee gained the loue of all, and as much himſelfe affected thoſe ſtrangers, which was ſome blemiſh of policie in the face of his gouernment, when he had got the Diadem, as being of diſpoſition ouer-ſoft, and euer too pliant (an imperfection in a Soueraigne) to take the impreſſe of any ſtampe. In which mould, the aſpiring Goodwin Earle of Kent, doth caſt the fabrick of his owne deſignes; who had made away Alfred, his younger, but of a more reſolute ſpirit, that ſo the baſis of his owne piller (whoſe top in time he hoped to crowne) might be ſet, if not vpon, yet with the neereſt to the Throne.

(5) Hee therefore, the formoſt both in will and power, vſed both to eſtabliſh Prince Edward in his right, being ſeconded by Leofrick Earle of Cheſter, and Lyuingus Biſhop of Worceſter, and indeed with the generall aſsiſtance of all the Engliſh; who now were ſo iealous of all forraine powers, that they forbad an ouergreat traine of Normans, (though comming for his aid) to attend their new-choſen King.

(6) His Coronation was at Wincheſter, with great concourſe of people, and the celebration performed by Edſine, Archbiſhop of Canterbury, vpon the very day of Chriſt his reſurrection, (being alſo a new-riſing day to the Engliſh Nation) the yeere of grace 1042. himſelfe being aged then towards forty, and was in number the thirty ſeuenth Monarch of England, where he raigned with ſuch Iuſtice & Pietȳ, that he obtained the venerable name of Saint, and vnto poſterities is diſtinguiſhed from the other Edwards, by the adiunct Confeſſor.

(7) In the entrance of his gouernement, to witnes his loue to his people, hee ſought euery way the furtherance of their wealth, and afterwards remitted the moſt heauy Tribute of forty thouſand pounds yearly gathered by the name of Dane-gilt, which had bin impoſed by his Father, and payed for forty years continuance, out of the lands of all, except only the Clergie, becauſe, (ſay our ancient lawes,) the Kings repoſed more confidence in the prayers of holy Church, then in the power of Armies. Then, from the diuers Lawes of the Mercians, Weſt-Saxons, Danes, and Northumbrians, he ſelected the beſt, and made of them one body certaine, and written in Latin, (that all men of anie learning might know wheron to rely) to be the touch of his Common-wealths Pleas, and the ſquire by which he would haue euery right to be meaſured; being (in a ſort) the fountaine of thoſe, which at this day we terme the Common Lawes, though the formes of pleading & proceſſe therein, were afterward brought in by the Conqueſt.

(8) The raigne of this King by moſt writers records, was more ſpent in peace & works of true piety, thē in warres, and bloud, though ſome diſſenſions happened both domeſticall, and forreine: for about the yeare one thouſand forty fiue, and third of his Raign, a royal Nauy was rigged in Sandwich hauen, againſt Magnus King of Norway, who then intended to inuade England, and indeed had ſo done, if the wars of Sweyn king of Denmark had not diuerted his purpoſe.

(9) This Sweyn was the ſonne of Duke Wolfe by Oſtryd his Ducheſſe, ſiſter to Hardi-Canut, who as I find written in the manuſcript of Aimundus Bremenſis, being in poſſeſsion of two kingdomes, prepared his Nauy for the conqueſt of England alſo. But, (ſaith hee) King Edward gouerning that Kingdome with great Iuſtice and Loue, choſe rather his peace with proffers of Tribute; and promiſes that after his death the Crowne ſhould be his, yea though himſelfe ſhould haue children: howbeit this ſeemeth not to ſound for truth; For Sweyn ſending his Ambaſſadors vnto Edward to craue ayde againſt Magnus (his grieuous and mortall Enemy,) could obtain none; and Harold Harfager, the ſucceſſor of Magnus, and enemy to Sweyn, preſently thereupon ſent vnto Edward for a league of amity, which was ratified firmely betwixt them.

(10) Neither may wee thinke that euer hee meant his Crowne that way; for that beſides the decree enacted againſt all Daniſh claims, his deſire to eſtabliſh it in the Engliſh bloud is moſt manifeſt, by ſending for Edward his Nephew, the ſonne of Edmund Ironſide, remaining in Hungary, and that ſo long out of England that hee was called the Outlawe; who comming ouer, brought with him his wife Agatha, and children, Edgar a ſonne, and Margaret and Chriſtian his daughters; him Edward meant to haue made heire to the Crowne, had he not beene preuented by haſty death, whereupon the King deſigned young Edgar, his ſonne, the heire apparent, and gaue him the ſurname of Adeling, a name of great honor appropriated to the Princes of the blood, and men capable of the Crowne.

(11) Beſides theſe former attempts, certaine Daniſh Pirates entred the Port of Sandwich, which with all the Sea-Coaſts of Eſſex they ſpoiled, and in Flaunders made Marchandize of their prey. The Iriſh likewiſe with thirty ſixe ſhippes entred Seuern, and with the aſsiſtance of Griffith king of South-Wales burnt or ſlew all that they found; againſt whom Alfred Biſhop of worceſter went and fought, but with ſuch ſucceſſe, that many of his Souldiers were ſlaine, and the reſt put to flight; which made the Welſhmen far more bold, and Rese, the brother of Griffith, make many incurſions to fetch preyes out of England, till at length he was ſlaine at Bulenden, and his head preſented to king Edward at Glouceſter.

(12) His domeſticall moleſtations, were chiefly by Earle Goodwin and his ſonnes; and thoſe firſt ſpringing vpon this following occaſion. Euſtace the elder, Earle of Bulloigne, who had married Goda, ſiſter by the fathers ſide to King Edward, came into England to viſite him then lying at Glouceſter, and returning homeward, at Canterbury his Herbinger dealing roughlie with a Burgeſſe for lodgings, cauſed his owne death; which when his Lord heard of, thirſting for reuenge, he ſlew eighteene Citizens in the heat of his furie: the Canterburians in as great a rage gotte them to armour, and ſlew twenty of his retinew, wounding many more, and made the Earle to recoile; whoſe greeuous complaint comming to the King, he commanded Goodwin to ſee execution done vpon the offenders. Earle Goodwin not haſtie to follow his commiſsion, aduiſed the King to examine the cauſe before he maſſacred his true ſubiects at the inſtigation of Strangers; whereat King Edward was highly offended, and Goodwin thereby gained great loue of the Commons. This occaſioned Robert Gemeticenſis a Norman, firſt made Biſhop of London, and after Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, to ſpred the Curtaine of diſfauour betwixt Goodwin and the King, vrging his refuſall as an Act of Contempt, wherein more dangers might lie hid then were to be ſuffered; whereupon Edward called an aſſembly of Eſtates, appointing a day of meeting at Glouceſter.

(13) The Commons (whoſe common guiſe is, deadly to hate all ſtrangers, though many times well deſeruing) now ſeeing Earle Goodwin in danger for their good, were eaſily drawne to aſsiſt him and his cauſe, and in warlike manner garded his perſon, at Beuerſtane not farre from the King. The Eſtates aſſembled, and Goodwin ſent for, he refuſed to come, pretending ſeruice againſt the Welſh, then ready to make inroades, and that his preſence was more need-full there, then at Court; albeit the Welsh-men cleared themselues by sending their Ambassadors vnto the King. The suspitions increasing, great preparation on both sides was made; to assist the King came Leofricke the worthy Earle of Chester, Siward the stoute Earle of Northumberland, and Rodulfe Earle of Hereford his sister Godas sonne, by her first husband Walter de Maigne.

Rand. Higden. Matt. West. Simon Dun.

(14) To Goodwin repaired his people of Southerie and Kent, and to him were brought by Swaine his sonne, the men of Oxford, Sommerset, Hereford, Glouceſter, and Berk-shires; vnto whom, Harold his other sonne, ioined those of Essex, Norfolke, Suffolke, Cambridge, and Huntingdon-shires, so that his host was exceedingly great, and his mind thereby so inflated, that from Langton, where hee lay, hee sent a bold and Traiterous demand to the King, to haue Earle Eustace of Bulloigne with all his French and Normans (that kept then in the Castle of Douer) to bee deliuered vnto him, and his sonnes: which beeing (as good reason was) refused, the Battle was prepared, and brought to the verie point of hazard and ruine of all: For in that quarrell were assembled the greatest Peeres, and Lords of the Land, the Kings loue swaying very much with many, but yet the hatred towards Strangers possessing the hearts of more. The beginning thus doubtfull, and the end like to prooue dangerous; the matter both with great foresight and prouidence was referred vnto Parliament, to bee holden at London with all conuenient haste, whereunto pledges were both giuen and receiued on either parts.

(15) King Edward strongly guarded with an Army of the Mercians and Northumbrians, entred London, and Goodwin with his sonnes in warlike manner came into Southwarke to his owne house. But his Army wauering, and (as bad causes & consciences make men doe) suspecting the worst, by little and little shrunke away from him; which knowne to the King, he presently pronounced sentence of banishment vnto Goodwin and his fiue sonnes, without further proceeding by way of Parliament, as was determined. Goodwin therefore with great riches and his three sonnes, Swaine, Tostie, and Girth, sailed into Flanders, and Harold with his brother Leofwine, from Bristow passed into Ireland; who were no sooner gone, but the King proclaimed them Out-lawes, and gaue the Earldome of Harold vnto Algar, the son of Leofrick, Earle of Chester. This Leofricke is he, which at his Countesses request freed the Citie Couentrie of their importable tribute imposed, as we haue elsewhere said.

Booke 1. chap. 27.

(16) In the second yeere of Goodwins banishment, both himselfe and those his sonnes with him, hauing gotten ships conuenient for warre, in manner of Pirats came vpon the coasts of Kent and Sussex, doing much harme, and returning with spoiles: the like did Harold and Leofwin from Scotland, vpon the westerne coasts of Sommerset and Deuonshires, who thence coasting about the point of Cornwall, ioined their Fleet with their Fathers, in the Ile of Wight.

(17) Against them King Edward prepared, & himselfe, though aged, with a Nauie of sixtie ships well furnished for warre, meant to haue made an end of that businesse, by the destruction of his aduersaries: but the Nauies ready to ioine battell, God tooke the cause into his owne hand, and with a thicke fogge so ouer-spread the seas, that one Fleet could not thereby see another; in which, Goodwin and his complices by contrary windes were driuen to the place from whence they came. King Edward still in iealousie of Goodwins returne, rigged forth forty tall ships to secure the seas, which kept not so strong a watch, but that Goodwin got by them, solliciting the people of Kent, Sussex, and Surrey vnto his aid, and entring Thamesis, did the like vnto them in London, who accepted of his arriuage, though King Edward lay there: so that without disturbance his Nauie fell vp with the tide, through the south Arch of the Bridge, & a mighty army to his aid mustered vpō the same side of the riuer.

(18) The Nobilitie then seeing side against side, and all of them meere English, ready to hazard their bloud in the quarrels of strangers, wrought so with Edward and Goodwin, that they came vnto peace, and pledges were againe deliuered for the performance, whereof Wilmot the sonne of Earle Goodwin, and Hacun the sonne of Swaine his eldest, were sent to Duke William of Normandy; so great a trust he euer reposed in strangers. This Swaine, vpon a remorse of conscience for the bloud he had spilt, and especially for the slaughter of Beorne his cosen & interceſſor, who sued to the King for his peace, vndertooke a pilgrimage to Ierusalem, and in his returne died in Licia, whether through an extremity of cold, or by the hands of Saracens, that spoiled all they met, it is vncertaine.

Wil. Malmsb. Ran. Higden. Mat. Westmin. Simon Dun.

(19) Goodwin now restored, and in great credit with the King, cast the eye of disdaine vpon the Arch-Bishop Robert (as commonly fauorits emulate each others,) and himselfe being a man eloquent and politicke, so possessed the King both against him and his Normans, that he requited his owne banishment, with al theirs out of England, some few excepted, that were fauoured by the English: and now promising himselfe much honour and authority; was suddainly cut off by the stroake of death, surprizing him as hee sate at Table with the King vpon Monday in the Easter weeke, but died not till the Thursday following, which happened at Winchester, where hee was buried.

(20) Besides these former forraine and ciuil molestations, other calamities happened to the land; for in the yeare of Grace 1047. and moneth of Ianuary, there fell so great a Snow, which couered the ground vnto the middle of March, that Cattle & Fowles perished abundantly: and on the first day of that Month the yere following, a strange and terrible Earth-quake happened, which seemed to rent the ground asunder, and withall such Lightnings, as burnt vp the Corne, growing in the fields, wherby an excesiue Dearth followed: so that his raigne was neither so peaceable nor prosperous, as Brightwold the Monke dreamed it should be. But as all these were scourges sent from God vpon the Land for sin, so both Prince, Pastors, and people, had all seuerally their part thereof, as being iointly the causers of the same.

Ran. Higden.

(21) For the King, in case of these Strangers, put the Land more then once in danger to bee lost: and himselfe refraining the bed of his vertuous wife committed thereby the offence forbidden by the Apostle, and caused her his Queene, either to commit or be accused to haue committed adultery. The Clergie likewise altogether vnlearned, wanton, and vicious: for the Prelats neglecting the offices of Episcopall function, which was to tender the affaires of the Church, and and to feed the flocke of Christ, liued themselues idle, and couetous, addicted wholly to the pomp of the world, and voluptuous life, little caring for the Churches & soules committed to their charge: and if any told them (saith Higden) that their liues ought to be holy, & their conuersation without Couetousnes, according to the sacred prescript, and vertuous examples of their Elders, they would scoffingly put them off with, Nunc aliud tempus, alii pro tempore mores; Times haue mutations, So must mens fashions: and thus, (saith he,) they plained the roughnes of their doings with smoothnes of their answers. Briefly, the whole people were so loose and riotous, that as Gernasius Dorobornensis recordeth, they fell so fast to commit wickednes, as to bee ignorant of sinfull crimes, was then held to be a great crime it selfe. And by the testimony of Malmesbury, the sinnes of those times euidently foreshewed a generall destruction: for the Englishmen (saith hee) transformed themselues into the strange manners of the French, and that not onely in speech and behauiour, but in their deeds, and Charters: their vse was then to goe fantastically appointed, their garments reaching but to the mid knee; their heads shorne, and their beards shauen all but the vpper lippe, which grew with long mustaches; continually wearing massie bracelets of gold about bout their armes, carrying markes vpon their skinne pounced in of ſundry Colours; and the Clergie contenting themſelues with triuiall literature, could ſcarcely hacke and hew out the words of the Sacrament. Theſe then were Englands dolorous times both of blindneſſe & lewdneſſe, drawing downe Gods wrath for their deſtruction.

(22) But howſoeuer this King is reported to bee louing and facile towards ſtrangers, (which in it ſelfe is a princely vertue if it be opportunely and warily vſed:) yet to his owne Mother, and Wife, vnnaturally ouer rigorous, impriſoning and bereauing them both all Prince-like honour. Againſt Queene Emma, his Mother, were inſtigators Robert Arch-Biſhop of Canterbury, and Earle Goodwin of Kent, the two greateſt fauorites of the King. The cauſes obiected were, her marriage with Canut the Capitall enemy of England; her regardleſneſſe of ſuccouring himſelf and his brother in their exiles, whom (as was alleaged) ſhee contriued to haue made away; and that vnder colour of priuate deuotions, ſhe had vſed the company of Alwine Biſhop of Wincheſter ouer familiarly, to her great diſhonour and the Kings diſgrace: for theſe and the like, hee tooke away all her Iewels, and other ſubſtance, and committed her to ſafe cuſtody in the Abbey of Werwell.

(23) Indeed Malmsbury doth tax her to haue been inſatiably couetous, and that ſhee was more tenderly affectionate to her Daniſh, then Engliſh children, whereby her loue was meaſured to their fathers. But for the imputation of her incontinencie, ſhe waſhed it off with as ſharpe a triall as any that is recorded for truth, by vndergoing that ouer-hard law Ordalium, when in preſence of the King her Son, & many of his Peeres, ſhe paſſed ouer betweene nine plough-ſhares glowing red hot, bare-footed & blind-folded, without any hurt; vſing this ſpeech to her leaders, as not knowing ſhee was paſt all danger, O Lord when ſhall I come to the place of my purgation: but hauing her eyes vncouered and ſeeing her ſelfe cleerely eſcaped, fell vpon her knees, and with teares gaue thanks to her Deliuerer, whereby ſhe recouered, both the loue and her former eſtate of the King, with the good eſteeme and applauſe of the people: in memory whereof ſhee gaue nine Mannors (according to the number of plough-ſhares) to the Minſter of Wincheſter, (wherin ſhe had that triall,) and adorned the ſame with many rich ornaments; as likewiſe the King repenting the wrong he did her, beſtowed on the ſame place the Iland (ſo then it was) called Portland in Dorſetſhire, being about ſeuen miles in compaſſe: for ſo the chance, in thoſe daies, was ſet, that whoſoeuer loſt, the monks did winne.

(24) Neither were this Kings proceedings better with his owne Wife, howſoeuer ſome haue cloaked that Fraud (ſo the Apoſtle tearmes it) vnder the faire robe of Chaſtity. For hee marrying Editha, a Lady incomparable both for beauty and vertue, in whoſe breſt (ſaith Malmesburie) there was a Schoole of all Liberall Sciences, refuſed her Bed: but whether it were for his debility, or hatred to Goodwin her father, or loue of Virginity, I determine not; but am fully perſwaded, that the accuſation of Adultery wherewith Robert the Arch-biſhop did charge her, was more vpon enuy to her father, then truth of ſo foule a fact in her, whoſe vertues were ſo many, and ſo memorable, by report of Authors, that were eie-witneſſes themſelues; for Ingulphus that had oftentimes conference with her, doth thus of her relate.

There was giuen (ſaith hee) vnto King Edward for his Queene and Wife, the daughter of Goodwin, a moſt beautifull Damoſell, Egitha by name, excellent well learned; in her demeanure, and whole courſe of life a Virgine moſt chaſt, humble, and vnfeinedly holy, no way ſauouring of her Fathers, or Brethrens barbarouſneſſe, but mild, modeſt, faithfull, and innocent, nor euer hurtfull to any; inſomuch, that this verſe was applied to her:

Sicut Spina Roſam, genuit Godwinus Egitham.
From prickled ſtalke, as ſweeteſt Roſe:
So Egith faire, from Godwin growes.

All theſe notwithſtanding, the King expulſed her his Court and Bed, and that with no little diſgrace; for taking all her goods from her, euen to the vttermoſt farthing, committed her priſoner to the Monaſterie of Wilton, attended onely with one maid, where ſhee, for a whole yeeres ſpace almoſt, in teares and praiers expected the day of her releaſe and comfort: All which vnprincelie, and vn-Spouſlike vſage, as the King pretended, and ſaid, was, becauſe ſhee onely ſhould not liue in comfort, when as her Parents and Brethren were baniſhed the Realme: an vniuſt ſentence ſurely, and vnbefitting a Saint, thus to puniſh the ſinnes of the fathers vpon their children, contrary to the preſcript rule of God, who by his Prophet complaineth againſt ſuch iniuſtice, and regulateth it with this iuſt verdict, That ſoule that ſinneth ſhall die: and for her pure and vnuiolated chaſtity, himſelfe on his death-bed ſpake, ſaying, that openly ſhe was his wife, but in ſecret imbracings as his owne ſiſter.

(25) Yet behold the blindneſſe, and partiality of thoſe times, wherein for this his only refuſall of nuptiall duties, the penciles of thoſe that ſhould haue ſhewed his true face to poſterities, haue ſo enbelliſhed the portraiture and lineaments, that vnto the beholder he ſeemeth now no mortall creature; his miracles and foreſayings anſwerable to moſt of the Prophets. Which here to inſert in ſo worthy a ſubiect and holy Kings life, were both to fill vp with a needleſſe ſurcharge, whole leaues of Times waſte abuſes, and to breed a ſuſpicion of thoſe other things in him, which we know for ſound truth; as was his gift from God, through his holy inuocations, and touch of the place affected, to cure the diſeaſe called Struma, now the Kings Euill, which vnto this day in his ſucceſſors, hath been experienced vpon many ſuch healings, by the touch of thoſe gracious hands who haue held the Scepter, as Gods Vicegerents of this moſt bleſſed and happy Kingdome. That he had the ſpirit of Prophecie, many haue thought, as alſo the notice of his owne death, ſome conſtantly affirme; by a Ring ſent him from Ieruſalem, the ſame that hee long time before had giuen to a pilgrime: but theſe with his other miraculous cures, his ſight of the Danes deſtruction, and the Seuen Sleepers in the Mount Cellion beſides Epheſus, with infinite others, I leaue to his Legend-writers, and Aluredus Riualenſis to relate, who haue written his many miracles with no ſparing pen. Moſt true it is that of a little Monaſtery dedicated to *S. HAROLD THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, THE SONNE OF EARLE GOODWINE, AND THIRTIE EIGHT MONARCH OF THE ENGLISHMEN, HIS LIFE, RAIGNE, ACTS, WIVES, AND ISSVE.

CHAPTER VII.

THe people sorrowing for the death of their King, and the States-men perplexed for choice of a new, Edgar Athelings title was worthy of more vnpartiall respect then it found: for him they held too young for gouernment: besides, a stranger borne, scarce speaking English: and withall, the prophecies of Edward touching the alienation of the Crowne, the Interest of the Danes, and the claim that Duke William made, (both by gift and consanguinity,) bred great distraction of desires, and opinions; but nothing concluded for setling the State; no man either assuming or profering the Monarchiall diademe, because none had the power, or right to adorne therewith his owne head. In this Calme conference a sudden gale arose, which blew all the sailes spred for that winde into one Port. And that was Harold sonne to Earle Goodwine, a man (duly prizing his his many worthy parts) not vnmeet for a kingdom, who first succeeding his father in his Dukedome, and next Edward (his brother in Law) in his Kingdom, in patience, clemency, & affability bare himselfe most approuedly towards the vertuous, but with a Lions courage, and fierce countenance chastised the disordered, and indeede became another Maccabeus vnto the distressed Land. Whose kingly state before wee touch, it shall not bee amisse to lengthen his short raigne with his Acts and Life, as hee was a Subiect, both with, and against his Lord and Predecessor.

(2) That hee tooke part with his Father against Eustace of Bulloigne, and King Edwards hasty commission, wee haue shewed; himselfe then enioying the Earledom of Oxford, and so affected by those of Essex, Suffolke and Norfolke, Cambridge & Huntington-shires, that they sided in his cause against the King; But these designes failing, (as commonly it is seene all attempts of Subiects against their Soueraignes doe) hee learned by banishment, what was the losse of true honour, and by forbearance of battle (when halfe the Kingdome stood for him,) his dutie obliged vnto the Common-wealth. And growne againe into fauour with the King, carried himselfe answerably vnto both.

(3) Some iealousy conceiued, Edward without any cause, banished Algar the son of Leofrike Earle of Chester, who with the helpe of the Irish and Welchmen, vnder the conduct of Gruffith ap Llewelyn Prince of North-Wales (who had married his daughter,) did much hurt to the English, putting Rodulph Earle of Hereford to flight, with the slaughter of fiue hundred men, spoiled the City, burnt the Minster and became Masters of mis-rule in those parts. Against these was Harold sent, and with such manhood pursued his flying enemies, that passing through North-Wales, vpon the Snow-downes he pitched his Field: The Earle, and Prince Gruffith, not daring to abide his presence, fled thence vnto South-Wales, and again tooke into Hereford; whereof Harold hauing intelligence hasted thitherward (leauing sufficient in the Snow-downes to mate the Welsh), and recouering the City, with a deepe trench and high rampire fortified it about, where for the sauing of more bloud (and not vngratefull to Algar, who without grudge had resigned to him his Earldome, and whole Reuenewes at his returne from exile) a peace was concluded, and at Harolds request, Earle Algar and Prince Gruffith were pardoned.

(4) But Algar being again accused, & again aided by his old associate Gruffith, recouered his Earledome by force, whereat King Edward was highly displeased, but most against Gruffith, who euer was ready to assist any against him: whereupon Harold the second time appointed Generall, with a great host entred North-Wales, without sight of enemy, where he only burnt downe the stately Palace of Prince Gruffith, & so returned to the King. But long the Welsh were not quiet, nor the Prince pleased of the harms to him done. Wherefore making his forces verie strong he again molested the English.

(5) To restraine whom once more was Harold set foorth, who with such terrour burst into Wales, that Prince Gruffith, in secret stole from his Campe, leauing his Souldiers (if they would) to fight for themselues, whereupon his whole army yeelded themselues to Harolds mercy, and hauing Prince Gruffith in their hands, cut off his head, and sent it to Harold, giuing him pledges for assurance of peace, and the paiment of the ancient tribute which for a time had beene reteined: yet euer after hee carried so heauy a hand on the Welsh, that as Iohn of Salisburie in his Policraticon writeth, he ordained a law, that what Welsh-man soeuer, should with weapon passe ouer Offaes ditch, should haue his right hand cutte off by the Kings officer.

(6) All now in quiet, and Harold withdrawne to his Mannor of Bosehame vpon the riuage of the sea in the confines of Sussex, there for his recreation, one day hee tooke into a Fishers boate with small attendants, neither those very skilfull Mariners, when no sooner were they lanched into the deepe, but a contrary wind came about, and droue the boat vpon the coast of Ponthieu in France, where hee was taken by the Country people, and presented to Guido their Earle, who a while retained him his prisoner, in hope of gaine by his ransom, but Duke William requiring it, he was conueied into Normandy, where he cunningly perswaded the Duke, that his secret comming out of England, was purposely to enter a league of amity with him. The Duke then hauing present wars with the Britaines in France, tooke this his new friend and guest with him for his companion at Armes; whose ready policies followed with forward practise, wan him great estimation with the Duke; whereupon betwixt them a couenant was made for the reseruation of the English Crowne to the Norman, if it chanced King Edward to die without children; and the same ratified by Harolds corporall oath, with the affiancing of Lady Adeliza, the Dukes fift daughter, then a child and Harold a widower; which afterwards fell to his owne destruction, and the lands subuersion, as shall bee said.

(7) His last imploiment by holy King Edward, was against the tumultuous Northumbrians which had expulsed Tosto their Earle, and Harolds owne brother, where a peace was concluded without shedding blood, but with condition that Tosto should lose his Earledom: whereupō in great displeasure, he with his wife & children fled into Flanders, and euer after hated the person, and emulated the glory of Harold. The originall of these two brethrens quarrels beganne at Windsor, where in the presence of the King they fell from words vnto blowes, and that in such manner, as if rescue had not come, Tosto had died; for which disgrace, hee secretly hied him into the Marches of Wales, and neere the City Hereford at Portaflyth, where Harold had a house, then in preparing to entertaine the King, he slew all his brothers seruants, and them cutting peecemeale into gobbets, salted some of their limmes, and cast the rest into vessels of the meath and wines, sending his brother word, that hee had furnished him with poudred meats against the Kings comming thither; which barbarous act caused deseruedly his name to be odious vnto his Northumbrians, and was lastly repayed with his owne death.

(8) Now albeit some Heralds make Harold by birth but a Gentleman of one, and the first descent, which, were it so, should no whit blemish him who was more truely enobled with princely vertues; yet therein also it may seeme hee is mis-esteemed, seeing his Father was Goodwin a Duke by degree, the son of Wolnoth, and he the sonne of Egelmar, who was the sonne of Egelricke, surnamed Leofwine, and brother of Edrick Duke of Mercia, that married the daughter of King Ethelred of England, of whom wee haue spoken.

The mother of Harold was Githa the daughter of Duke Wolfe, and sister to Sweyne the yonger, King of Denmarke, by Estrich his wife, who was sister to Canute the great King of England; and himselfe the second sonne of her borne; whose elder brother was Sweyne, that died on pilgrimage in his returne from Ierusalem, and his yonger were Tosto, Wilnod, Grith, and Leofrick.

(9) A former wife Earle Goodwin had, whose name was Thira, the sister of Canute, a woman sold vnto wickednesse for making marchandize of Englands beauteous virgins into Denmarke; shee solde them there at deare rates, to satisfie her owne vnsatiate auarice, and the lusts of the lasciuious Danes, till a iust reward of Gods wrath fell on her by a thunderbolt falling from heauen, wherewith shee was slaine, to the great terrour of the beholders. One sonne by her Earle Goodwin had, who when hee was past childs age, riding vpon a horse (the gift of his Grandfather the King,) proudly giuing him the reines reine and ſpurre, was violently borne into the riuer Thameſis, and ſo ſodainely drowned. Thus much being premiſed of Harold before hee was King; his raigne, life and death, wee will now addreſſe to declare.

(10) Edwards life ended, and nothing determined touching his ſucceſſor, Harold the ſecond day after, being the day of his buriall, made himſelfe King, none of the Nobility diſliking what hee had done; for courteous hee was of ſpeech and behauiour, and in martiall proweſſe the onely man, as Wales well witneſſed, more then once; friended by affinity with many of the Nobles, and by his new marriage with Edgitha the daughter of Algar (ſiſter of the Earles Morcar and Edwin, and late wife to Gruffith ap Lhewelyn Prince of Wales) hee expected to bee both ſided and aſſiſted, if his cauſe came either to triall or voice.

Ran. Higden. Polycr. lib. 6. ca. 29

(11) And the time hee well ſaw fitted his entrance; for Sweyne King of Denmarke (moſt dread by the Engliſh) was entangled with the Sweden wars; and William the Norman (that made claime from King Edward) at variance with Philip the French King; the friends of Edgar in Hungarie, and himſelfe a ſtranger, ouer young for rule: all which concurrentes made Harold without deliberation, or order from the ſtate, to ſet the Crowne on his owne head, regardleſſe of all ceremony and ſolemne celebration; for which his act, as a violator of holy rites, hee too too much offended the Clergy.

Matth. Weſt.

(12) The day of his Coronation was vpon Friday, the fifth of Ianuary, being the feaſt of the Epiphany, and yeere of Saluation 1066: none either greatly applauding, or diſapprouing his preſumption, except onely for the omiſſion of manner and forme; to redeeme which, and to re-gaine the good will of all; no ſooner attained hee the ſeate roiall, but he remitted or diminiſhed the grieuous cuſtomes and tributes which his predeceſſors had raiſed, a courſe euer powerfull to winne the hearts of the Commons; to Church-men hee was verie munificent and carefull of their aduancements; and to grow more deepely into their venerable eſteeme, hee repaired their Monaſteries; but moſt eſpecially that at Waltham in Eſſex, which hee moſt ſumptuouſly new built, and richly endowed, giuing it the name of Holy Croſſe; vpon occaſion that ſuch a Croſſe found farre weſtward, was brought thither by miracle, vt tradunt: and therefore hee choſe out this place to powre forth his ſupplications, before hee marched to meete Duke William in the field. Moreouer, to ſatisfie ſuch Nobles as affected young Edgars iuſter title, he created him Earle of Oxford, and held him in ſpeciall fauour: in briefe, vnto the poore, his hand was euer open, vnto the oppreſſed he miniſtred iuſtice, and vnto all men was affable, and meeke: and all to hold that vpright which on his head he had ſet with an vn-euen hand: and depriued him of, vnto whom hee was Protector.

(13) Three ſeuerall reports are affirmed of Edwards diſpoſe of the Crowne: the firſt was to the Norman Duke, who made that the anker-hold of his claime; the ſecond was to young Edgar, vnto whom hee was great vncle; and the laſt vnto this Harold himſelfe: for ſo ſaith Edmerus, and alſo Marianus, who liued at the very ſame time, and writeth that Harold thereupon was ſacred and crowned by Aldredus Archbiſhop of Yorke; ſo that hereby hee is freed by ſome from the imputation of intruſion and wrong.

(14) His State thus ſtanding, and his ſubiects contentment dayly increaſing, preſently it was ſomwhat perplexed by an Ambaſſage ſent from the Norman, putting him in mind of his couenant, and oath, aſwell for the cuſtody of the Crowne to his behoofe, as for the ſolemnazion of the mariage contracted betwixt his daughter and him.

(15) Harold, who thought himſelfe now ſurely ſeated in the hearts of his Subiects, and therefore alſo ſure in his Kingdome, anſwered the Ambaſſadors, That he held their Maſters demaund vniuſt, for that an oath extorted in time of extremity, cannot bind the maker in conſcience to performe it, for that were to ioyne one ſinne with another; and that this oath was taken for feare of death or impriſonment, the Duke himſelfe well knew: but admit it was voluntarily, and without feare; could I (ſaid he) then a ſubiect, without the allowance of the King, and the whole State, giue away the Crownes ſucceſſion to the preiudice of both? ſurely a Kingdome is of a better account then to bee ſo determined in priuate onely betwixt two. With which kind of anſweres he ſent the meſſengers away.

Subiects

(16) The Norman, who till then thought England ſure to be his, and had deuoted his hopes from a Duke to a King, ſtormed to ſee himſelfe thus fruſtrated on the ſudden, and in ſtead of a Crown to haue ſcornes heaped on his head; therefore nothing contented with this ſleight anſwere, returned his Ambaſſadors againe vnto Harold, by whom hee laid his claime more at large; as that King Edward in the Court of France had faithfully promiſed the ſucceſſion vnto him, and againe afterwards ratified the ſame to him at his being in England, and that not done without conſent of the State, but confirmed by Stigandus Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, the Earles Goodwin and Syward, yea and by Harold himſelfe, and ſo firmely aſſured that his Brother and Nephew were deliuered for pledges, and to that end ſent vnto him into Normandy: that hee had no way beene conſtrained, hee appealed to Harolds owne conſcience, who beſides his voluntary offer to ſweare, contracted himſelfe to Adeliza his daughter (then but young, and now departed life) vpon which foundation the oath was willingly taken.

Rand. Higden. Polyc. lib. 6. ca.

(17) But Harold who thought his owne head as fit for a crowne as any others, meant nothing leſſe then to lay it downe vpon parley; and therefore told them flatly, that howſoeuer Edward and he had tampered for the Kingdome, yet Edward himſelfe comming in by election, and not by any title of inheritance, his promiſe was of no validity; for how could hee giue that whereof he was not intereſſed, nor in the Danes time was euer like to be? And tell your Duke (ſaid he) that our kingdome is now brought to a ſetled eſtate, and with ſuch loue and liking of the Engliſh, as that they will neuer admit any more a ſtranger to rule ouer them. And as touching the contract with his yonger daughter, hee well ſeeth, that God hath taken away that occaſion of alienating the Crowne; and ſurely his Law hath likewiſe prouided remedy againſt ſuch raſh vows; whoſe precepts I mean to follow: and therefore (ſaid he) will your Duke to weigh my eſtate with his own, both his and mine now in quiet, & ſufficient for two, and either of them, employment enough for one mans Gouernment, and therefore both of them too much to bee well gouerned by one, ſeeing that God himſelfe had ſet a ſea betwixt them. With theſe and the like ſpeeches hee ſhifted of the Dukes Ambaſſadors; without all princely entertainements, or courteous regard.

Gemeticenſis.

(18) The meſſengers returned, and Harolds anſweres declared, William lion-like enraged, caſteth his thoughts about plotting reuenge, and making ſome oddes euen that might impeach his deſignes, prepared all things for open warre. Harold likewiſe not ſleeping his buſineſſe, made ready his Fleete, muſtered his ſouldiers, and planted his Garriſons along the Sea-coaſt. But in theſe his proceedings, behold a great and fearefull Comete appeared (ſeldom a ſigne to Princes of fortunate ſucceſſe) vpon the twenty fourth of Aprill, and laſted onely ſeuen dayes, which drew the minds of the Engliſh, into great ſuſpenſe, now ready to enter into a double warre.

(19) For as William the Norman for his part claymed England by gift; ſo Harfager the Dane did by ſucceſſion; the rumors of both which, greatly terrified the heartes of the inhabitantes: and yet behold, a third terrour vnexpected, contrary to nature ture, and moſt mens opinions, ſuddainely aroſe, for Toſto the cruell Earle of Northumberland, and brother to Harold, expulſed by his people, and proſcribed by King Edward, fled into France, where by the inſtigations of William, whoſe wiues ſiſter hee had married (both of them the daughters of Baldwine Earle of Flanders,) he got for his reuenge a Fleet furniſhed with men at Armes, and thus prepared; his firſt fury was ſhewed in ſpoiling the Ile of Wight; then coaſting the ſhore, ſhrewdly endammaged Kent, whence hoiſing ſaile, fell foule vpon Lincolnſhire; where Morcar and Edwine Earles of Cheſter and Yorkeſhire, aided with the Kings Nauie, droue him from thence, though with ſome loſſe of their men.

(20) Toſto for more ſuccour fled into Scotland; where of King Malcolme he had but cold comfort, himſelfe being buſied with ciuill broiles; but howſoeuer his expectation there failed, yet his purpoſes were continued with the aſſiſtance of Harold Harfager (that is, the Faire-lockes) King of Denmarke, who with three hundred ſhippes had entred the riuer Tyne for Englands inuaſion, after his conqueſt of the Iles of Orknes. Toſto therefore ioining his Fleet to theſe Danes, in warlike brauerie, both of them enter the mouth of Humber, and drawing vp the riuer Ouſe, at Richhall landed their men, making ſpoile of the Country whereſoeuer they came. To meet with theſe, the foreſaid Earles Edwin and Morcar, in a tumultuous haſt raiſed their powers, but were ſo ouerlaid by the Norwegians, that many were ſlaine, and mare drowned, in paſsing ouer that riuer.

(21) The enemy grown proud by this late victory, haſted towards Yorke, the chiefe Citie of the North; where planting his ſiege, it was preſently yeelded vp, and hoſtages deliuered vpon both parts for the performance of couenants. The Danes thus proſpering, had moſt ſtrongly encamped themſelues; for backed they were with the German Ocean, flanked on the left hand with the riuer Humber, wherein alſo their Fleete rid at Anker, and had on their right hand and afront the riuer Derwent; ſo that it ſeemed impoſsible to raiſe this ſiege.

(22) But Harold thinking the coaſts cleere from all danger, the Equinoctiall at hand, and Nauigation now paſt, the victuals in his Fleet ſpent, and notice from Earle Balwin of Flanders, that Duke William meant not his voiage that yeere, was about to diſband his Army. When this ſudden newes from the North pierced his eare, no need it was then to bid him make haſte thither, the caſe ſtanding ſo neere him as it did. Therefore recalling his Army, poſted to Yorke, and from thence marched againſt the Norwegians, who lay ſecured with ſuch aduantage, as wee haue ſaid. Notwithſtanding Harold couragiouſly ordered his battell, and aſſaied to paſſe the Bridge called Stamford, built ouer Derwent, which one onely Dane made good for a time againſt his whole hoſt, and with his Ax ſlew forty of his men, till laſtly this Dane was ſlaine with a dart.

(23) The Bridge gotten, and the Engliſh reduced into their rankes, Harold moſt boldly ſet vpon his enemies euen in their Campe; where the battaile with equall valour and fortune, was maintained a time, till laſtly the Norwegians diſarraied and ſcattered, were ſlaine outright; and among them the two Chieftanes, Harfager and Toſto, with may others of worth and account, loſt their liues. Olaue the ſonne of this Harfager, and Paul Earle of Orkeney, who kept their Fleet & Seas, whileſt his Father and followers fought vpon land, were brought to King Harold, and to haue their liues ſpared, abiured the Land, and thenceforth to attempt no hoſtilitie againſt the Engliſh peace; and with twenty ſmall veſſels to cary away their ſlaine and hurt, were ſuffered to depart, bringing heauy newes into Denmarke of the loſſe of their King, and ouerthrow of his Army.

(24) By this victory thus happily obtained, fell vnto Harold an exceeding rich booty, both of gold and ſiluer, beſides the great Armado of Toſto and Harfager; whereby his mind was ſoone ſet aloft, and he began to grow both proud, and odious vnto his Army, the rather, for that he diuided not the ſpoiles vnto them that had deſerued it; a wrong that the common Souldier doth continually murmure at, and commonly endure.

(25) Now in this current of King Harolds fortunes, William the Norman had the more leaſure to ſtrengthen his owne, and often conferring with his Captaines about Englands inuaſions, found them euer reſolute and cheerefull that way; the difficultie onely reſted, how to prouide money enough, the very ſinewes whereby the vaſt body of an Army muſt be knit, & ſtrengthned: for a ſubſidy being propounded vnto the aſſembly of the Norman States, it was anſwered, that a former warre againſt the French had empoueriſhed much of their wealth, that if new wars were now raiſed, & therein their ſubſtance ſpent to gain other parts, it would be thereby ſo waſted, as that hardly it would be ſufficient to defend their own; that they thought it more ſafety to hold what he had, then hazard of their own to inuade the territories of others; & that this war intended, iuſt though it were, yet ſeemed not neceſſary, but exceeding dangerous; beſides (ſaid they) the Normans were not by their allegiance bound to Military ſeruices in forrein parts, & therefore ſuch paiments could not bee aſſeſſed vpon them. And although William Fitz-Oſberne, a man in high fauour with the Duke, and as gratious among the people, endeauoured by all meanes to effect it, yea, and (to draw on others by his example) proffered to ſet out forty tall Ships vpon his owne Charges towards this warre; yet would it not bee: Therefore Duke William bethought him on another way. Cambd. Brit.

(26) The wealthieſt men among all his People he ſent for, and ſeuerally one by one conferred with, ſhewing them his right and hopes of England, wherin preferment lay euē to the meaneſt amongſt them, only money was the want, which they might ſpare; neither ſhould that be giuen, nor lent without a plentiful increaſe: with ſuch fair words he drew them ſo on, that they ſtroue who ſhould giue moſt, and by this policy hee gathered ſuch a maſſe of money, as was ſufficient to defray the warre. Then went hee to his neighbour Princes, namely to the Earles of Anion, Poictou, Mayne, and Bulloigne, promiſing them faire poſſeſsions in England; yea and vnto Philip the French King, in caſe he would aide him, hee voluntarily offered to become his vaſſall and Leige-man, and to hold England by oath and fealty vnder him. But it beeing thought nothing good for the State of France, that the Duke of Normandy, who already was not ſo pliable to the French King as was wiſhed, ſhould bee bettered in his eſtate by the addition of ſo mighty a Kingdome (the power of Neighbour Potentates being euer ſuſpected of Princes) ſo farre was the King from yeelding any helpe, that he ſecretly maligned, & openly diſſwaded this his attempt of inuading England. This French iealouſy, the Norman ſoone perceiued, which made him to caſt about yet another way.

(27) For making his claime knowne vnto Alexander the ſecond, then Pope of Rome, with the wrongs done vnto Robert Arch-biſhop of Canterbury, by Harold and his Father, (a text that might not bee reade without a gloſſe,) he was ſo fauoured of his Holineſſe (whoſe See was euer glad to intereſt it ſelf in diſpoſing of Crowns, that he both allowed well of his enterprize, and ſent him a conſecrated Banner, (Saint Peter himſelfe had none ſuch in his Boate) to bee borne in the Ship, wherein himſelfe in that expedition ſhould take ſaile for England; and accurſed al them that ſhold oppoſe themſelues againſt him: for euen then the Popes had began to vſurpe authority ouer Princes, & with their leaden blades, to hacke into the iron ſwords of Emperours. Henry Hunt. Fox, Acts and Monuments.

(28) Thus furniſhed on all ſides, he aſſembled his forces, and with a mighty Nauy came to the Towne of of Saint Valeries; which ſtandeth vpon the mouth of the Riuer Some: where a long time he lay wind bound to his great diſcontentment, and with many vowes importunating the fauour of that locall Saint, heaped daily a number of gifts and oblations vpon his Altar; till laſtly his deſire was obtayned, and then with three hundred Ships fraught full of his Normans, Flemings, Frenchmen, & Britaignes, waighed Anchor, and with a gentle gale of wind arriued at Peuenſey in Suſſex, vpon the twenty eight day of September, where Landing his men, to cut off all occaſion or hope of returne, he fired his owne fleete, and vpon the Shoare erected a Fortreſſe to bee if neede were, a retiring place for his Souldiers.

Rand. Higden.

(29) At his arriuage from Sea, as our Hiſtorians report, his foot chaunced to ſlippe, ſo that not able to recouer himſelfe, he fell into the mud, and all to bemired his hands; which accident was preſently conſtrued for a lucky preſage: for now (ſaid a Captaine) O Duke, thou haſt taken poſſeſsion, and holdeſt that land in thy hand, whereof ſhortly thou ſhalt become King: As Cæſar is ſaid to haue done, when hee entred into Africa, who from ſhip-board at his landing fell into the ſands, and merily ſaid, I doe now take poſſeſsion of thee, O Africa.

Suetonius in vita Cæſar.

(30) From Peuenſey Duke William departed towards Haſting, where raiſing another fortification, diuulged to all the cauſes of his comming, as pretending to reuenge both the death of his Normans, ſlain by the treachery of Goodwin & Harold, and the wrongs and baniſhment of Robert Gemeticus Archbiſhop of Canterbury, pretenſes very ſlender, and enforced out of ſeaſon: but ſurely had not a third ſate neerer his heart, the two former would haue paſſed without the ſpleene of reuenge; namely, the donation of King Edward deceaſed, whereon he built his claime to the Engliſh Crowne. And there alſo by his Edict, he ſtraitely charged his ſouldiers not in hoſtile manner, to wrong any of their perſons, who ſhortly were to become his Subiects.

(31) Harold in the North hearing of theſe news, haſted with his Armie (whoſe Armour yet reaked with the bloud of the Norwegians) towards the ſouth and with ſuch power as poſſible hee could make, entreth London, where immediately a meſſenger frō Duke William was preſented vnto him, demaunding no leſſe then the Kingdome, and Harolds vaſſalage; vrging the ſame with ſuch inſtant boldneſſe, that Harolds furious indignation could hardly forbeare, againſt the law of Armes, to lay violent hands vpon the Ambaſſador; ſo great a pride and confident hope had entred the heart of this late Victor: to ſhew both, with very great boldneſſe, he diſpatcheth his Ambaſſadors to William, and by way of irefull checkes menaceth him, vnleſſe forthwith hee departed backe into Normandy: when preſently muſtering his men at London, hee found them much leſſened by his battaile againſt the Norwegians; notwithſtanding, many Nobles, Gentlemen, and others, whom the loue of their natiue Country inflamed, did ingage themſelues for the field, againſt his common and dangerous enemy. He therfore with an vndaunted courage, led forth his Armie into Suſſex (againſt the importunate ſuite of his mother, who ſought by all meanes to ſtay him) where on a large and faire plaine, ſcarſe ſeuen miles from the enemy, he pitched downe his battailes, and ſent forth his Eſpials to deſcry his power.

(32) Theſe comming into danger, were caught by the Normans, and preſented to their Duke, who commanded them forthwith to bee led from Tent to Tent, to be feaſted, and diſmiſſed, without any harme or diſhonour done. Theſe returning to Harold told what they had ſeene, commending the Duke in his Martiall Prouiſions, and his clemency to themward, only ſaid they, his Souldiers ſeem to be Prieſts, for their faces were all ſhauen, whereas the vſe of the Engliſh was then to reſerue onely the vpper lippe vncut, retaining or renewing the old manner of the ancient Britaines ſo deſcribed by Cæſar: but King Harold, who had bin in that country, wel knowing their errour, replied that they were men of great valour & ſtout Souldiers in fight. Vpon which ſpeech, Girth, his younger brother, a man much renowned for martiall exploits, tooke occaſion to aduiſe the King from being preſent at the danger of the Field: for (ſaid he)

(33) This wiſe aduice notwithſtanding, deſtiny ſo driuing him, he gaine-ſtood, imputing it a part of diſhonour, and not befitting a Souldiour, (as he alwaies had beene,) to leaue the field Coward-like, when greateſt glory was to be wonne, or in caſe of fortunate ſucceſſe, to be depriued of a part, and therefore reprooued his brother for making this motion, and with diſdainefull ſpeeches, vnderualued and embaſed the worth of the Normans.

(34) Duke William now entred the field, & both the hoſts ſtanding ready for fight, the Norman, to ſpare the effuſion of Chriſtian bloud, vpon a pious affection ſent a Monke as a Mediator for peace, with offers to Harold of theſe conditions, either wholy to reſigne the Kingdome vnto him, and from thence forth to acknowledge the Duke for his Soueraigne: or elſe in ſingle combat to trie the quarrel with him, in ſight of the Armies; or laſtly, to ſtand to the arbitrement of the Pope, touching the poſſeſsion and wearing of the Engliſh Crowne. But Harold, as one whom the heauens would depreſſe, accepting neither domeſticke counſell, nor the Normans offers, referred the deciding of the matter vnto the Tribunall of God, and anſwered, that it ſhould bee tried the next day with more ſwordes then one.

(35) That next day was the 14. of October, which vpon a credulous errour, hee held euer to bee fortunate, becauſe it was the day of his Natiuity, and with hopefull aſſurance, deſired greatly the approch of the ſame: His ſouldiers likewiſe as men whoſe heads were to bee crowned with the Laurels of victory, gaue themſelues to licentious reuels, and in riotous banquets, with clamour, and noiſes, ſpent the night; whereas contrariwiſe, the Normans, more wiſely, and ſeriouſly weighing the buſineſſe in hand, beſtowed the time in prayers and vowes, for the ſafety of their Armie, and victorious ſucceſſe: neither had the morning ſooner ſpread it ſelfe but their battell was ordered, and prepared for fight.

(36) Harold alſo with the like forwardnes, marſhalled his battaile, placing in the Vant-guard the Kentiſh men (who by an ancient cuſtome had the front of the battaile belonging to them) with their heauy axes, or halberts. The Middleſex-men & the Londoners were in that ſquadron, whereof himſelfe with his brother had the leading.

Tho. Wils.

37 His enemies Vauward was led by Roger of Mountgomery, and William Fitz-Oſberne, the ſame conſiſting of Horſemen out of Anion, Perch, and little Brittaine.

Their

Their Maine-Battaile consisted of Poictouins and Germans, Geffrey Martell, and a Germane Pensioner commanding them: In the Rere-guard was the Duke himselfe with the whole manhood of Normans, and the flower of his Nobility & Gentry; all which battalliõs were intermingled with companies of Archers.

(38) The Normans without any confused, or disorderly shout, sounded the battaile, and aduanced forward, discharging a fierce volley of arrowes like a tempestuous haile, a kind of fight both strange, and terrible vnto the English, who supposed their enemy had beene already euen in the middest amongst them; when presently a furious charge was giuen to the Va-ward of the English, who resolutely had determined to couer the place with their bodies rather then to giue one foot of ground, and bending all their forces, kept themselues close together, whereby they valiantly, and with the slaughter of many, put backe the enemy: which was so farre from daunting the Normans, that by it they were more whetted to re-enforce themselues vpon them: when with an horrible noise, the battailes of both sides gaue the stroke; and now come foote to foot, and man to man, coped together in a most cruell fight. The English standing thicke, and close, as if they had beene stucke one to another, abode the brunt, and charge of the Normans, and with such welcomes, that after many a bloudy wound receiued, they were at point to recoile, had not Duke William, whose crown lay now at stake, both brauely performed the part of a Leader, and with his presence, and authority restrained them. The fight thus continuing, the Normans horsemen brake into the troupes of the English, and sore distressed the Souldiers on foot, yet notwithstanding they still held out, and kept their array vnbroken: for Harold (no lesse carefull to keepe, then the other to gaine a diadem,) as a most valiant Captaine bare himself worthily euery where. The Duke well perceiuing that with fine force, and true valour, no good end could bee got, betooke himselfe to a stratageme, and commaunded his men to sound the retreat, but kept them still in such order of array, that they gaue backe in as good discipline as they came on.

(39) The English supposing the Normans to haue fled, and themselues the masters of the field, began in eager pursuit carelesly to vntwist, and display their rancks; when on the sodaine, the Normans hauing their wished opportunity, and winding about, charged the enemy a fresh; who now being scatteringly disranked, and out of all order, were slaine down on all sides, not able to recouer their battaile: many thus borne downe, and slaine, none by flight sought to escape the field, but rather to maintaine their honour in Armes, cast themselues into a round, choosing there to die in the cause of their Country, then cowardly to forsake the Standard of their King: and therefore with bold resolutions encouraging one an other, they turne head and resist a long time: but showers of arrowes like a stormy tempest falling thicke among them, one, most fatall, and vnlucky for the English, wounded Harold into the braines through the left eye; so that falling from his horse to the ground, was vnder his owne standard slaine.

(40) And yet Giraldus Cambrensis (I know not by what inducement,) relates the issue of this Battaile somwhat otherwise, affirming, that Harold with losse of his Eye, but not of his life, from the field fled to the City of Westchester, and there long after led a holie life, and made a godly end, as an Anchoret in the Cell of Saint Iames, fast by the church of S. Iohn. With Harold died his Brethren Gyth, and Leofwin, with most of the English Nobility, besides the slaughter of sixty seuen thousand, nine hundred seuenty foure of their Souldiers: Bremensis saith an hundred Thousand.

(41) Duke William in this Battail had three horses slain vnder him; God (saith Marianus) so defending his person, that though multitude of darts were thrown against him, yet not a drop of his blood was spilt by the Enemy, and this Battaile wonne with the losse onely of sixe thousand, and thirteene of his men. Whose wodden bowes (as Iohn Rouse is of opinion) gained the Normans that great victory; for the Arrowes shot leuell, or directly forward, wounded the English that stood in the front, and vpright; the other shot on high, galled at the fal, those that were more remote, and the backs of such as stooped to shunne the danger. Ia. Rosi.

(42) This battle was fought in Sussex 7. miles from Hastings, vpon Saturday the fourteenth of October, and yere of Grace 1066. Wherin the dolefull destruction of the English fell, and the glorious Sun of the Normans euen in the shutting of the day did arise; when perished the Royall blood of the Saxons, whose Kings first had made this Kingdome into Seuen, and afterward of them so glorious a Monarchy, that it was not inferiour to any in Europe, and her Monarchs so renowned for princely magnanimity, as that many of them were ranked with the best in the world; But now the all-ordering hand of God (vnto whose becke not onely this Ball of the Earth, and the Rulers thereof, but euen the Heauens themselues, and all the powers thereof must bow) either for the sinnes of the English which were many, and great, or to graffe one more fair and lõger-continuing bud vpon this dried, and decayed stock, brought that forrein offspring into this his nursery of Britaine, whose branches, as the vine, haue spread both fruitfull and farre; and whose rootes are fastned as the trees of Libanon: the Kings thereof, euen from the loines of this Great Conquerour, holding on a royall succession for the space of these fiue hundred forty fiue yeares, their issues topped with the highest Cedars of the world, & their branches spread thorowout al Christendom; which wee pray may still proceede and continue, whilest the Sun and Moone haue their being. Matth. Paris. Hose. 14. 6.

(43) This victory thus obtained, Duke william wholly ascribed vnto God, and by way of a solemne supplication or procession gaue him the thanks; and pitching for that night his Pauiliõ among the bodies of the dead, the next day returned to Hastings, there to consult vpon his great, and most prosperously begun enterprise, giuing first commandement for the buriall of his slaine Souldiers.

(44) But Morcar, and Edwin, the vnfortunate Queenes Brethren, by night escaping the battel, came vnto London, where with the rest of the Peeres, they began to lay the foundation of some fresh hopes, posting thence their messengers to raise a new supply, & to comfort the English (who through all the Land were stricken into a fearfull astonishment with this vnexpected newes) from a despairing feare, shewing the chance of warre to be mutable, their number many, and Captaines sufficient to try another Field. Alfred, Arch-bishop of Yorke, there present, and President of the Assembly, stoutly, and prudently gaue his counsell forthwith to consecrate, and crowne young Edgar Atheling (the true heire) for their King; to whom consented likewise both the Sea-Captaines, and the Londoners. But the Earles of Yorkshire and Cheshire, Edwin & Morcar (whom this fearfull state of their country could not dissuade from disloyaltie and ambition) plotting secretly to get the Crowne to themselues, hindered that wise and noble designe. In which while, the sorrowfull Queene their sister was conueied to West-chester, where, without state or title of a Queene, she led a solitary and quiet life.

(45) The Mother of the slaine King did not so well moderate her womanly passions, as to receiue either comfort, or counsell of her friends: the dead body of her sonne she greatly desired, and to that end sent to the Conqueror two sage Brethren of his Abbey at Waltham, who had accompanied him in his vnfortunate expedition. Their names (as I finde them recorded in an old Manuscript) were Osegod and Ailrie, whose message to the Conqueror not without abundance of teares, and feare, is there set downe in the tenor as followeth. In the Library of the learned Knight, Sir Roberts Cotton.

" (46) Noble Duke, and ere long to be a moſt great and " mightie King; we thy moſt humble ſeruants, deſtitute " of all comfort, (as wee would we were alſo of life) are " come to thee as ſent from our brethren, whom this dead " King hath placed in the Monaſterie of Waltham, to at- " tend the iſſue of this late dreadfull battell, (wherein God " fauouring thy quarrell, he is now taken away, and dead, " which was our greateſt Comforter, and by whoſe only " bountifull goodneſſe, wee were releeued and maintai- " ned, whom hee had placed to ſerue God in that Church. " Wherfore we moſt humbly requeſt thee (now our dread " Lord) by that gracious fauour which the Lord of Lords " hath ſhewed vnto thee, and for the releife of all their " ſoules, who in this quarrell haue ended their daies, that " it may bee lawfull for vs by thy good leaue, ſafely to take " and carry away with vs the dead body of the King, the " Founder and builder of our Church and Monaſterie: as " alſo the bodies of ſuch others, as who, for the reuerence " of him, and for his ſake, deſired alſo to be buried with vs, " that the ſtate of our Church, by their helpe ſtrengthened, " may bee the ſtronger, and indure the firmer. With whoſe ſo humble a requeſt, and abundant teares, the victorious and worthy Duke moued, anſwered.

" (47) Your King (ſaid he) vnmindfull of his faith, " although hee haue for the preſent endured the worthy pu- " niſhment of his fault, yet hath he not therefore deſerued " to want the honour of a Sepulcher, or to lie vnburied: " were it but that he died a King, howſoeuer hee came by " the Kingdome, my purpoſe is for the reuerence of him, and " for the health of them, who hauing left their wiues and " poſſeſſions, haue here in my quarrell loſt their liues, to " build here a Church and a Monaſtery, with an hundred " Monks in it to pray for them for euer; and in the ſame " Church to bury your King aboue the reſt, with all ho- " nour vnto ſo great a Prince, and for his ſake to endow " the ſame with great reuenewes.

(48) With which his courteous ſpeech and promiſes, the two religious Fathers comforted, and encouraged, againe replied.

" (49) Not ſo, noble Duke, but grant this thy ſeruants " moſt humble requeſt, that we may, for God, by thy leaue, " receiue the dead body of our Founder, and to bury it in " the place which himſelfe in his life time appointed; that " we cheered with the preſence of his body, may thereof " take comfort, and that his Tombe may be vnto our Suc- " ceſſors, a perpetuall Monument of his remembrance.

(50) The Duke, as he was of diſpoſition gracious, and inclined to mercy, forthwith granted their deſires: whereupon they drew out ſtore of gold to preſent him in way of gratulation; which he not only vtterly refuſed, but alſo offered them plenty to ſupply whatſoeuer ſhould be needfull for the pompe of his funerall, as alſo for their coſts in trauell to and fro; giuing ſtrait commandement that none of his Souldiers ſhould preſume to moleſt them in this their buſineſſe, or in their returne. Then went they in haſte to the quarry of the dead, but by no meanes could finde the body of the King, for that the countenances of all men greatly alter by death; but being maimed and imbrued with bloud, they are not knowne to be the men they were. As for his other regall Ornaments, which might haue ſhewed him for their King, his dead corps was deſpoiled of them, either through the greedy deſire of prey, (as the manner of the Field is) or to be the firſt bringer of ſuch happy newes, in hope of a Princely reward; vpon which purpoſe many times the body is both mangled and diſmembred: and ſo was this King after his death by a baſe Souldire, gaſht and hackt into the legge, whom Duke William rewarded for ſo vnſouldier like a deed, caſhiering him for euer out of his wages and wars. So that Harold lying ſtript, wounded, bemangled, and goared in his bloud, could not be found or known, till they ſent for a woman named Editha, (for her paſſing beauty ſurnamed Swan-ſhals, that is, Swanſ-necke, whom he entertained in ſecret loue before he was King, who by ſome ſecret marks of his body to her well knowne, found him out; and then put into a coffine, was by diuers of the Norman Nobility honourably brought vnto the place, afterward called Battle-bridge, where it was met by the Nobles of England, and ſo conueied to Waltham, was there ſolemnly, and with great lamentation of his mother, roially interred, with this rude Epitaph, well beſeeming the time, though not the perſon.

Heu cadis hoſte fero, Rex à Duce Rege futuro,
Par paris in gladio, milite & valido.
Firmini iuſti lux eſt tibi, luce Calixti;
Pronior hinc ſuperas, hinc ſuperatus eras.
Ergo tibi requiem depoſcat vtrumque perennem:
Sicque precetur eum, quod colit omne Deum.

A fierce foe thee ſlew; thou'a King, he King in view;
Both peeres, both peereleſſe, both feard, and both fearles;
That ſad day was mixt, by Firmin and Calixt,
Th'one helpthee to vanquiſh, t'other made thee liquiſh;
Both now for thee pray, and thy Requiem ſay;
So let good men all, to God for thee call.

(51) This Kings raigne was not ſo ful of dayes as of great troubles: being but the ſpace of nine months and nine dayes, in whom was completed the Period of the Saxons Empire in Britaine, after they had continued from their firſt erected kingdome by Hengiſt in Kent, the ſpace of ſixe hundred and tenne yeeres, without any reuerſement or interruption ſauing the ſmall Inter-Raignes of theſe three Daniſh Kings, of whom we haue ſpoken. And although Aimund of Breme, in the fauour of his Danes, ſharply taxeth this Harold as being an impious man, and for that by vſurpation he aſpired to the Crowne, yet doth Ealred the Abbot of Riuauxe, (the Legender of S. Edwards life) much commend him for his courteous affability, gentle deportment, and Iuſtice, and for his warlike proweſſe none matchable vnto him; and was reputed (ſaith hee) verily a man paſsing well furniſhed with all vertues befitting a Soueraigne commander, and borne euen to repaire the decaied ſtate of England; had he not, in the haughtineſſe and opinion of his own valour and prudence, ſo much addicted himſelfe to his owne reſolutions, and too much neglected the wiſe deliberations of his beſt friends and counſellers.

His Wiues.

(52) The firſt wife of Harold, whom he had maried and buried before he was King, I find not named by any of our writers; but that he had ſuch a one, appeareth, where it is recorded that hee was a Widower, what time he contracted the Conquerors daughter; and that alſo he had children of ſuch age, that they made warres againſt King William in the ſecond of his Raigne; which it is probable, he had not by Editha, his Swannes neck, but were legitimat, and by this lawfull, though nameleſſe Mother.

(53) Algith, the ſecond wife to King Harold, was the widow of Gruffith ap Lhewelyn King of Northwales, the ſiſter of Edwine and Morcar Earles of Yorkeſhire, and Cheſter, and daughter of Algar ſonne of Leofrick, ſon of Leofwine, all Earles of Cheſter, Leiceſter and Lincolne: She was married vnto him beeing then but Duke, in the laſt yeare of Edward Confeſſors raigne, and of Grace 1065. neither did ſhee long enioy him, or her Queenly title, after his aſpiring to the Crowne; for being reſident in London when hee was ſlaine, from thence ſhee was conueyed by her brethren to Weſtcheſter, where ſhe remained in meane eſtate, and in good quiet (which vſually moſt attends the meaneſt) without any princely ſhew or name, during the reſt of her life, which laſted a great part of the Conquerors raigne.

His Iſſue.

(54) Goodwine the eldeſt ſonne of King Harold, being growne to ſome ripeneſſe of yeares in the life of his Father, after his death and ouerthrow by the Conquerour querour, tooke his brother with him, and fled ouer into Ireland: from whence he returned, and landed in Sommerſetſhire; ſlew Ednoth (a Baron ſometime of his Fathers) that encountred him, and taking great preyes in Deuon-ſhire and Cornewall, departed till the next yeare. When comming againe, hee fought with Beorn an Earle of Cornwall, and after retired into Ireland, and thence went into Denmarke to King Swayn his Coſen-German, where he ſpent the reſt of his life.

(55) Edmund, the ſecond ſonne to King Harold, went with his Brother into Ireland, returned with him into England, and was at the ſlaughter and ouerthrow of Ednoth, and his power in Sommerſetſhire; at the ſpoiles committed in Cornwall and Deuenſhire; at the conflict with the Corniſh Earle Beorn; paſſed and repaſſed with him in all his voiages, inuaſions and warres, by ſea and by land, in England and Ireland; and at the laſt departed with him from Ireland to Denmarke; tooke part with him of all pleaſure and calamity whatſoeuer, and attending and depending wholly vpon him, liued and died with him in that Country.

(56) Magnus the third ſon of King Harold, went with his brothers into Ireland; and returned with them the firſt time into England, and is neuer after that mentioned amongſt them, nor elſewhere, vnleſſe, (as ſome doe coniecture)) he be that Magnus who ſeeing the mutability of humane affairs, became an Anchoret, whoſe Epitaph pointing to his Daniſh originall, the learned Clarenciaux diſcouered in a little deſolate Church at Lewes in Suſſex, where in the gaping chinks of an Arch in the wall, in a rude and ouerworne Character, certaine old imperfect verſes were found, which hee ſuppoſeth ſhould bee thus read;

Clauditur hic Miles Danorum regia proles,
Magnus nomen ei, magna nota Progeniei.
Deponens Magnum, prudentior induit agnum:
Prapete pro vita, fit paruulus Anachorita.
Here lies a Knight of Daniſh regall race,
*He * Magnus hight; great name note of great place:*
*But Magnus left, an * Agnus mild he prou'd,*
From world bereft, an Anchorite below'd.

* Great.
* A Lamb.

(57) Wolfe the fourth ſonne of King Harold, ſeemeth to bee borne of Queene Algith his ſecond wife, for that hee was neuer mentioned among his other brethren, and hauing better friends by his mothers ſide, was left in England, whereas they were forced thence; neither is he ſpoken of, during all the raign of the Conquerour, and therefore at his entrance may probably be thought to haue beene but an Infant: yet after his death he is named among his priſoners with Earle Morcar (his vncle, if Queen Algith were his mother) and was by King William Rufus releaſed, and honoured by him with the Order of Knighthood.

(58) Gunhild a daughter of King Harold is mentioned by Iohn Capgraue (the Writer of the Engliſh Saints) in the life of Wolſtan Biſhop of Worceſter, reporting her to haue beene a Nunne in a Monaſtery of England; who, among the many miracles done by the ſaid Wolſtan, (which hee numbreth by tale, according to the ſuperſtitious manner of the time wherein he liued) declareth, how he reſtored this Lady to her perfect eye-ſight, whereof by a dangerous infirmity, ſhe was almoſt wholly, and in moſt mens opinions, vncurably depriued.

Iohn Capgraue.

(58) Another daughter of King Harold not named by any Story-writer of our own nation, is mentioned by Saxo Grãmaticus in his Daniſh hiſtory, to haue come into Denmarke, with her two brethren; to haue been very honorably intertained by King Swaine the yonger, her kinſman: and afterwards to haue been as honorably placed in marriage with Gereſlef, called in Latine Iariſlaues, and of the Danes Waldemar, King of the Ruſſians: and by him to haue had a daughter, that was the mother of Waldemar, the firſt of that name King of Denmarke, from whom all the Daniſh Kings for many ages after ſucceeded.

THE SVCCESSION OF ENGLANDS MONARCHES FROM THE ENTRANCE OF THE NORMANS VNDER WILLIAM THE CONQVEROR: VNTILL THE REGALL RIGHT OF THE WHOLE ILAND WERE BY GODS PROVIDENCE VNITED VNDER ONE IMPERIALL DIADEME, IN THE PERSON OF OVR PRESENT SOVERAIGNE KING IAMES, SOLE MONARCH OF GREAT BRITAINE: THEIR SEVERALL ACTS, ISSVES, RAIGNES, ARMES, SEALES, AND COINES.

CHAPTER I.

WHat hath beene ſpoken touching the Originals, Lawes, and Cuſtomes of the Saxons, and Danes, the ancient Conquerours and poſſeſſors of this our Iland, may in like ſort bee ſaid of the Normans (being a brāch from the ſame roote) of whom wee are now to write, ſauing only that the name is not ſo ancient, and therfore their Manners may bee thought more ciuill. Through the miſty-darke times of which Stories, together with that of the Romans, and of our Britaines, (wherein no brighter Sun did ſhine vnto vs) by the aſsiſtance of the all-ſeeing power which bringeth light out of darknes, I am laſtly approched to theſe times of more light, and vnto affaires of more certaine truth: whoſe Current to my ſeeming is made now Nauigable, by the many writers that haue emptied their full channels into this Sea: wherein, though in reſpect of my owne defects, and that ſo many Maſter-Pilotes haue ſailed before me, it may ſeeme but preſumption for me to direct another courſe, with a purpoſe to better what they haue ſo well performed: yet to make a complete Hiſtory from the firſt to the laſt: giue me leaue to continue, as I haue begunne.

(2) Theſe Normans then, being anciently a mixt Nation with the warlike Norwegians, Swedens, & Danes, tooke their Name of that Northern Climate from whence they came firſt, which was that Coaſt of Germany, anciently called Cimbrica Cherſoneſus, and Nor-way, for that it tendeth in reſpect of ſituation ſo farre Northward; and from hence, and the parts adjacent, the Saxons, Iutes, Angles, and lately the Danes, made their incurſions into this Land.

(3) This Tract therfore as the wombe of cōception, by the diſpoſe of the Omnipotent, after it had produced thoſe Nations which formerly made Cōqueſts of Britane, now againe brought forth (as it were) her laſt-borne Beniamin, who deuouring the pray in the morning, hath diuided the ſpoile in the Euening, and hitherto continued their glorious fame atchieued; which I pray, may extend to the laſt period of Times being: For theſe Normans firſt by force got footing in France with the Dominion, and Stile of a Duke, and next the Diadem of this faire Empire, the laſt and moſt famous Monarches of the ſame.

(4) Theſe, formerly practizing Piracies vpon the Coaſts of Belgia, Frizia, England, Ireland, and France, proceeded in their hardy courſes euen to the Mediterranean Sea: inſomuch that Charles the Great ſeeing their roauing tall Ships, and conſidering the bold attempts they vndertkooke, with a deepe ſigh, and abundance of teares, is reported to haue ſaid: Heauie am I at the very heart, that in my owne life time, theſe Pirates dare to come vpon my Coaſts, whereby I foreſee what miſchiefe they will worke vpon my Poſteritie. Which indeede proued ſo great, that in their publike Proceſſions, and Letanies of the Church, this Petition was added, From the rage of the Normans, Good Lord deliuer vs. This feare, and praier notwithſtanding, they draue the French to ſuch extremitie, that King Charles the Bald was forced to giue vnto Haſting a Norman, Arch-pirate, the Earledome of Charters, for to aſſwage his furie exerciſed vpon his People; and againe, King Charles the Groſſe, granted vnto Godfrey the Normane part of Neuſtria, with his Daughter in mariage: Yet all this ſufficed not, but that the Normans by force of Armes ſeated themſelues neere vnto the mouth of Sein, taking all for their owne that lay compriſed betwixt that Riuer and the Riuer Loyre: which Countrey afterwards tooke the name of Nor-manny frō theſe Northern Gueſts, at what time King Charles the Simple, confirmed it vnto Rollo their Captaine.

(5) This Rollo, as ſay the Daniſh Hiſtorians, was the ſon of Guion, a great Lord in Denmark, who with his brother Gourin were appointed to depart the Country (according to the Daniſh cuſtomes) to ſeeke their aduentures abroad, and leaue more roome for the reſt at home; but theſe refuſing the order made warre vpon the King, in which, both Guion the Father and Gourin the ſonne, were ſlaine, and Rollo forced to fly for ſafeguard of his life, with whom went a number of Gallants to ſeeke Fortunes Court, and not a few miſdoers, or out-lawedmen: whoſe Acts in England regiſtred by Albertus Krantius, ſeeing they vary from our owne hiſtorians in circumſtances of times, and names, I haue choſen in this place to inſert, leauing the credit therof to him the Reporter.

(6) Rollo, a Nobleman of Denmarke, (ſaith he) and too powerfull in his Kings eye, was forced with a Nauy to aduenture his Fortunes into forreine parts, whoſe firſt arriuage, as he ſaith, was in England, where many of the Daniſh nobility had formerly tried their valours, and ſome of them attained to the Scepter, if not of the whole, yet of a great part of that kingdom. Indeed, (ſaith he) England from the beginning was not

gouerned by one King, as now it is, for the Angle-Saxons had their prouince, and the Mercians theirs, both gouerned by Prouinciall Deputies, but the Northumbrians had a King; as the Scots and Picts also, in the same Iland; had kept their own limits vnder the like Gouernment. Amongst these Northumbrians the Danes had their cheefest abiding, and in this Prouince Rollo the Dane brought first his men on Land, where making warre vpon that Nation, he built both Castles and Fortresses to fortifie himselfe, his Nauy lying vpon the Seas: and proceeding forward into the Continent, tooke great booties both of men, cattle, and other spoiles, lading their ships as they lay at Anchor: the Inhabitants of the Country making head against him, had still the worst.

(7) Rollo yet doubtful and in suspence what to doe, desired indeed to returne to his Country, but that the Kings indignation was an obstacle that way: next hee affected to try his Fortunes in France, yet feared the issue would be dangerous, the People being exasperated against him, for the harms he had done them: but chiefely the Diademe of England ran most in his minde, though hee knew the hazard was great, to match his small Forces with an host of a King: in which perplexed thoughts, it chanced him (saith my Author) to fall into a sweet slumber, and in his sleepe hee seemed to sit in the Kingdome of France, vpon a high hil, bending his head forward to a Riuer which issued from the top of a mountaine, at the foote whereof beneath him, hee saw many kindes of Birds, which washed their ruddy left wings in the same water, where they all fed together, flew about, built their nests, and at times appointed, brought forth their yong.

Alb. Krantzius.

(8) Rollo awaking from his pleasing dream, imparted the same vnto his consorts, desiring their iudgements for interpretation; which no way satisfying him, hee called a Christian of his English Captiues, a man industrious, and of great Capacity, and of whose deep vnderstanding he had a great opinion: this captiue then boldened, (and willing in likelihood, to diuert Rollo from infesting England) told him, that his dreame was significant and good, and did prognosticate the happy successe of himselfe and whole Nation: for by this he saw that he was shortly to receiue a quiet possession, and a land of great renown in the Continent of France, and that himselfe should be cleansed in the Lauer of Baptisme, wherein also the ruddy sins of his People should be washed away, as the water had done the wings of the Birds.

The dreame expounded by an English Christian Captiue.

(9) This interpretation pleased Rollo well, and he easily beleeued that which he most affected, as in the like kinde dreamers commonly doe: therfore prouiding all things for France, he set his countenance only that way; yet because he had alredy performed great matters in England, he thought to follow Fortune for his best Leader, and before he departed from so fair a land, intended to sound the King by an Ambassage, that so, if he might find him inclinable to a league, he might haue a refuge against future chaunces; if not, then was he resolute to go forward with his iourney: therfore making choice of certaine actiue persons, sent them to the English king Alstan, a Prince of a speciall religion and holines of life: these hauing audience, vttered their message as followeth.

Rollo sendeth to sound King Alstan.

(10) Wee being men distressed, and driuen from our Country, sought out in banishment an habitation to rest in, and going forth, very many followed vs, who incouraged vs to seeke and winne a land by Conquest, supplying vs with strength, and giuing vs great hope of victory: which thing when wee resolued to take in hand, a Tempest of weather draue vs (O King) into these English Ports, where staying a fit season to put againe forth, the Winter withheld vs, and our wants made vs to seeke further into the Land: whereupon our men, euermore brought vp to the warre, beeing euill intreated of those inhabitants, were moued by such iniuries to prouide for their owne defence; wherein some small skirmishes haue passed betwixt them. Our Prince therefore and Generall Rollo doth humbly require peace of thee, and to be permitted to soiourne in thy Land for a time, and to relieue his company with things necessary, wee paying sufficiently for it: these things when thou shalt grant, hee shall rest content and pacified, vntill the next spring, at which time he meanes to take his intended voyage.

(11) Alstenus, not ignorant of the Danish cruelty, and with how great Armies they might oppresse the English shoares, did readily grant what they required: And also added a further curtesie, saying withall, I doe greatly desire to see your Duke himselfe: and let him not thinke much to repaire to our mansions, for he shall find none amongst vs but his most louing friends. When this was signified to Rollo, choosing out the tallest and goodliest persons of his company, and such as were of greatest wisedom, with them he very ioyfully meeteth the King, is entertained, presents him with great gifts, but receiueth greater: Then sitting downe to talke and commune:

Rollo commeth to Alstans Court.

(12) I am (saith King Alstenus) right gladde, most worthy Duke Rollo, to see you in this my Court. The renowne of your Nation hath beene related to mee, a Martiall kind of People yee are, and in fight vnconquerable. And you your selfe also for your prowesse, are not vnnoted among the rest of your famous Worthies: your valiant exploits are well knowne vnto vs: It is right pleasing vnto vs to enter with such men into amitie. Behold our whole kingdome is before you, choose out a seate for your selfe, and your people where soeuer you best like, for wee will haue an euerlasting league between vs.

Will. Gemtic. l. 2. cap. 6. Alstans bounty to Rollo.

(13) Rollo, glad of so faire promises, replied: Most worthy and renowmed King, I highly esteem of your bountifull and most liberall proffers: God grant a happy successe of our affaires. I doe thinke my selfe most bounden & deuoted to your worthines; and if destinie euer answer to our desires, we will not be vnthankfull for this your so great benignity. To seate our selues in your kingdome, though indeede we are very willing, and your Royall proffers do much more incite vs, yet Fate doth not permit it. I haue determined (and will certainly performe,) to goe into France. For your gifts bestowed on me, I esteeme them in the highest degree: and right well content I am to haue a perpetuall League with you, that the like Fortune may betide vs both, the one to be a safeguard to the other. This I both offer, and accept of. This League God grant may to vs both proue happy and fortunate.

(14) With such like interchanges the time much spent, and night drawing on, they were brought to banquet: And early the next morning, comming forth of their lodgings, most louingly embraced each other, when each gaue & receiued presents best suting with their estates and occasions. Neither doth Krantzius stay his penne there, but proceedeth to particular affaires betwixt these two Princes, without the concurrence of any of our owne writers.

(15) As how the English rose in Armes against Alstenus their King, taking oportunity of the time, for that Rollo (whom they knew to bee ioined in a most strait confederacy with their Soueraigne) beeing then imployed in the warres of France, could not come or send to his aide: Alstenus therefore oppressed with a tumultuous kingdome, remembred Rollo his faithful friend, and sending Ambassadors declared vnto him what distresse he was in; who not vnmindfull of the firme league betwixt them, left his French wars, and prepared for England with all his Forces; where entring the Iland, he easily quieted the tumultuous rebels, ransacking their Cities, curbing their wildenes, and so reducing them at last to an orderly subiection. For which his great loue, care, & pains, the King not vnthankful, resolued to requite him with the halfe of his kingdom, appointing the Cities and limiting the bounds, which each of them should rule and gouerne as their owne possessions.

Alstans faith to his friend.

(16) Rollo in the meane time, as carefull of the peaces continuance, as regardlesse of so great remunerations, taketh pledges of the Rebels for securing their loialtie to the King, and peaceable bearing towards himselfe; vpon accomplishment whereof, repairing to Alstenus he thus bespake him.

(17) Seeing (King Alstenus) you haue so highly rewarded me, both with princely entertainment, and bountifull tifull presents, I can doe no leſſe, then willingly beſtow vpon you theſe my paines for your ſafetie: it is no more then your deſerts doe challenge, neither will I accept, or ſeeme ſo vncourteous as to expect, for my paines, any part of your dominion. Your ſelfe now may well gouerne it; for France calles for my preſence: keepe therefore thoſe your Pledges, brought to you by your Subiects, and there is no doubt but you ſhall hence-forward gouerne your Kingdome in a ſetled and contentfull quietneſſe.

(18) The King could not containe thoſe his eies, which now beheld in a ſtranger ſo ſtrange and vnexempled kindnes, from reſoluing into teares; giuing him both hearty thanks, and rich gifts, ſeeing hee could not faſten on him any portion of his Kingdome: of whom, all that Rollo deſired was this, that he would giue licence to ſuch voluntary Souldiers as would goe with him into France: whereto Alſten, ready in all things to gratifie his deſire, gladly condeſcended, and furniſhed him with attendants.

(19) But leauing Krantius the Dane, as likewiſe Gemeticenſis the Norman, to fauour their Country, & theſe their reports, to the beſt liking of the iudicious; moſt certaine it is, that the French King Charles, commonly called the Simple, gaue the Duchie of Normandy with his daughter Gilla (whoſe mother was Æguina, the daughter of Edward the Elder, King of England) vnto Rollo the Dane, as is recorded in an old manuſcript belonging to the Monaſtery of Angiers. And when Rollo was baptized, Charles receiuing him for his God-ſonne at the Font, he was there required to doe homage for his Dukedome receiued, and inioined therein to kiſſe the Kings foot, which hee did, but with ſome diſgrace to King Charles, and bound it with an oath that hee did not receiue it vpon courteſie.

(20) This Rollo by his ſecond wife Popee, (for Gilla died childleſſe) daughter to the Earle of Beſsin and Baileulx, had a ſonne named william, ſurnamed Longeſpee, and a daughter called Girlota, who was afterwards married to the Duke of Guyan.

(21) William Long-eſpee (ſo called of the Long Sword he vſually wore) the ſecond Daniſh Duke of Normandy, took vnto wife Sporta the daughter of Hubert, Earle of Sentlis, by whom hee had onely Richard his ſonne: this william receiuing baptiſme, receiued therewith a new name, and was thenceforth called Robert, who hauing gouerned his Dukedome with great moderation the ſpace of twenty yeeres, was guilefully murthered by the working of Lewes King of France, to the great griefe of his people, who ſo far followed the reuenge, that they intercepted Lewes in the Citie Rothomage, and deteined him their priſoner, till he agreed to theſe Articles: That young Richard ſhould ſucceed his ſlaine Father in the foreſaid Dukedome; and that thenceforth when the King & Duke ſhould conferre together, the Duke ſhould bee girt with his Sword, and the King diſabled either of Sword or knife: to which Lewes yeelded vpon his corporall oth.

(22) Richard thus eſtabliſhed, gouerned his Dukedome the ſpace of fifty two yeeres. Hee was a man of an admirable fortitude, and therefore was called Richard the Hardy. His firſt wife was * Agnes, daughter to Hugh le Grand, Earle of Paris, Lord Abbat of Germans, and Father to Hugh Capet of France; but ſhe dying iſſueleſſe, he ſecondly married Gunnor, a Gentlewoman of the Daniſh bloud, (whom he had kept his Concubine before) by whom he had three ſonnes and three daughters: the firſt was Richard that ſucceeded in his dominions; the ſecond was Robert Archbiſhop of Roan; and the third was called Maliger: his daughters were Hawiſa, the wife of Geffrey Earle of Britaine, and mother to Alane and * Guye his ſonnes. Maud eſpouſed * Euldes Earle of Chartiers and Blais: and Emma called the Flower of Normandy, was Queene of England, both by the Engliſh King Ethelred, and Canutus the Dane, to both which ſhee was married.

(23) Richard the ſecond, ſurnamed the Good, was the fourth Duke of Normandy, and ruled the ſame for twenty foure yeeres: In whoſe time the Normans began to be great, and gracious in England, the marriage of his Siſter making their way: his firſt wife was Iudith the Siſter of Geffrey Earle of Britaigne, by whom he had iſſue, Richard, the firſt Duke of Normandy, and Robert the ſixt, William a Monke, and Nicholas Abbot of S. Andrewes: his daughters by her were, Alice, that died yong, and another of the ſame name maried to Reinold, Earle of Burgoine, and Eleanor eſpouſed to Baldwin the fourth Earle of Flanders; who bare vnto him Baldwin the fifth, father of Maud that was Queene of England, and wife to the Conqueror.

(24) The ſecond wife to Duke Richard the ſecond, was Eſtrike, Siſter to Canute King of England, from whom he purchaſed a Diuorce, without any iſſue begotten on her body; and then taking for his thrid wife a faire Gentlewoman named Paula, had iſſue by her William Earle of Arques, and Maurger Archbiſhop of Roane.

(25) Richard the third of that name, and fifth Duke of Normandy, in the ſecond yeere of his Dukedome died an vntimely death, not without ſuſpition of Poyſon, miniſtred by Robert his younger brother, who preſently was inueſted in the Dutchie, for that he left no iſſue of his body to ſucceed.

(26) This Robert (Duke Richards Brother) was a man of a magnanimous ſpirit, and of ſuch bounteous liberality as is vncredible. Hee comming to the City Phaleſia in Normandy, chanced to ſee a moſt goodly and beautifull damoſell, dancing among others of her familiar conſorts; her name was Arlet, of meane parentage (the daughter of a Skinner, ſaith Higden) whoſe pleaſing feature and comely grace ſo pleaſed the Duke, that taking her to his bed, he begot on her, William his onely ſonne, (who proued the onely man of the Normans blood) and after vpon a remorſe of conſcience, vndertooke a pilgrimage vnto Ieruſalem, from whence hee neuer againe returned. Arlet in Roberts life time was married to Herlaine a Norman Gentleman, but of meane ſubſtance; to whom ſhe bare Odo Biſhop of Baion, by his halfe-brother William created Earle of Kent; and Robert created Earle of Mortaigne, a man of a dull and groſſe wit; & a daughter named Emma, wife to Richard count of Auranches, (a Prouince in Normandy,) the mother of Hugh Lupus Earle Palatine of Cheſter. And thus farre breefly I haue thought good to proſecute the Line of the Normans, for the better illuſtration of our Engliſh Stories.

(27) Duke Robert intending his pious pilgrimage vnto the holy land, aſſembled all his Nobility vnto the City Fiſcan, where he cauſed them to ſweare fealty vnto his ſonne William, being then but ſeuen yeares old, committing him to the Gouernance of one Gilbert, an Earle of much integrity and prudence, and the defence of that Gouernment vnto Henry the French King, and ſo in the eight yeare of his Dukedome, ſet on his voyage for Ieruſalem; who entring Iurye, and not able to trauaile, was born in a litter vpon the Saracens ſhoulders, and neere vnto the Citie, meeting a returning Pilgrime, deſired him to report in his Country what he there ſaw, which is, (ſaid hee) that I am carried to Heauen vpon the Diuels backe: but ſo farre was he borne that he neuer returned, being preuented by death: which the Norman Peeres hearing, made vſe thereof for their owne ambitious ends, without any regard of young William their Pupill and Soueraigne, and grown into factions, greatly troubled the Peace of their Country, wherein Earle Gilbert the Protector was ſlaine, by Randulphus the young Dukes Coſen-Germane.

(28) The beginner of theſe ſtirres was another of his kinſmen, euen Guy of Burgoine, the ſonne of Duke Richards daughter, brought vp with William in his youth, and euer in his moſt eſpecial eſteeme; who, vpon a vaine hope to aſpire to an Earldome, got the aide of the Vicounts, Nigell, and Randulph, but tooke ſuch a fall a fall before he could aſcend the higheſt ſtep, that in loſing his footing he loſt therewith his head.

(29) Strife alſo aroſe betwixt yong William, and his Vnckle william the baſe-borne Earle of Archis. Whereupon King Henry of France, who till then had held this Wolfe by the eare, fearing ſome hazzard to himſelfe, if he ſhould now let him go, thought it beſt to aid the Earle in his cauſe, and therefore ſent him ſupplie vnder the leading of ſome men of note; but William ſo begir this Caſtle with ſtrait ſiege, that hee cauſed the Earle by famiſhment to yleed vp his Fort, and droue the French with diſgrace out of the field: where, with ſuch ſucceſſe he ſtill proſpered, that Henry now, to ſecure his own Confines, ſent Odo his brother for Prefect, into thoſe Parts, that lay betwixt the Riuers Reyn and the Seyn.

(30) William as watchfull as the French King was jealous, ſent againſt Odo, Robert Count Aucenſis, Hugh Gornacenſis, Hugh Mountfort, and William Chirſpine, all of them ſtout Souldiers, which ſo brauely bare themſelues, that Odo was the firſt man that made away, and the reſtof the French ſaued themſelues by flight.

(31) William that had ſworne a league with King Henry, and in his Minority had euer found him his gracious Guardian, was loth to endanger the breach of his Oath, or the duty that loue and deſerts had obliged him vnto; and therefore by this Stratagem hee ſought to diſlodge the French. In the ſilence of Night when in the Kings Campe all were at reſt, he cauſed to be cried aloud, the flight of Odo, and his diſcomfiture, with no leſſe terrour then it was; which rang ſo ſhrill in the eares of the French, that Henry thought beſt to be gone: leauing William the abſolute Lord of Normandie.

(32) Which he valiantly defended, and vprightly gouerned all the daies of King Henry: whoſe death preſently cauſed an alteration of State; for he leauing Baldwine ſurnamed the Gentle, and fifth Earle of Flaunders, Tutor to his yong Sonne Philip, the quarrell betwixt thoſe two Princes had an end; Baldwine on the one ſide ſo working his Pupill, and on the other the Normane, (who was his ſonne in law) that a moſt firme League was ratified betwixt them, and kept vnuiolated ſo long as William was a Duke: where wee will leaue him in proſperitie and peace, and proceed in our intendment, as he did in his Conqueſt here in England.

CHAPTER II.

BAttle Field wonne with the losse of little lesse then sixty eight thousand men, and Harold in Souldier-like exequies borne vnto Waltham in Essex, & there honourably enterred, as we haue said: William the Conqueror, (for so now may wee stile him) returned to Hasting, and thence set forward with spoile of the Country, ouer Thamesis towards London.

(2) Where Edwine and Morcar, the Brethren of the Queen, were in working the English, that one of them should be King, or rather, saith Simon of Durham, to crowne Edgar Etheling, the rightfull heire, in such esteeme with the People, that he was commonly called Englands Darling; vnto whose side most of the Nobles adhered, with the Citizens of London, and the Nauall forces; to which part also ioined Aldred Archbishop of Yorke, though presently he fel off and stuckt to the stronger; for the Prelates, though secretly affecting the right claime, yet terrified with the flashing thunderbolts of the Papall curse, durst not goe forward with their purpose (so powerfull was the Pope, euen then to defeat the rightfull heires of kingdomes) but refused to side with the Lords, whereupon all their designements were suddainely quashed.

(3) For William hauing wasted through Kent, Sussex, Surrey, Hampshire, and Barkshire, came vnto Wallingford, and crossing there the Thamesis, passed through the Counties of Oxford, Buckingham and Hertford, where staying at Berkhamsted, Aldred Archbishop of Yorke, Wolstane Bishop of Worcester, Walter Bishop of Hereford, with the Earles Edwin and Morcar, yea and Edgar himself, yeelded their allegiance vnto the Duke: This curse so preuailing, farre engaged William to the Pope.

Trees cut downe to hinder Williams passage.

(4) William intending for London, being on his way, found the passage stopt vp with multitudes of great trees, which by the policy of Frethericke Abbot of S. Albanes, (a man descended from the Saxons noble bloud, as likewise from Canutus the Dane) to secure his Monasterie from the destruction of the Normans, were so cut downe: whereat the Duke both wondring and fretting, sent for the Abbot, vnder his assurance of safe returne, and demanding the cause why his woods were so cut; Frethericke answered very stoutly, I haue done (said he) the duety both of my birth and profession; and if others of my ranke had performed the like (as they well might and ought) it had not beene in thy power to haue pierced the land thus farre.

Iohn Stow.

(5) William hearing the bold answere of this Prelate, and knowing it was now a time fitter to pacifie, then exulcerate the Englisb spirits, gaue way to the present necessity, and withall hastned (as good policy required) his coronation, which at Westminster was solemnized vpon Monday, being the day of Christs Natiuity, and yeere of saluation, 1066. where he receiued the crowne at the hands of Aldred Archbishop of Yorke; causing the Bishops and Barons to take the oath of allegiance vnto him; and himselfe likewise at the altar of S. Peters, tooke a solemne oath to defend the rights of the Church, to establish good lawes, and to see iustice vprightly administred, as became a good King; and thereupon chose for his counsell, such men as he knew to bee of great wisedome and experience: next, applying his thoughts for the security of his new gotten Empire; fortified such places as lay open to danger, bestowed strong Garrisons vpon the coasts, & ships to ride in those Harbours which were most exposed to inuasion.

(6) And the better to assure the south of the land, (best seruing his purpose, if any new troubles should arise) hee tooke his way towards Douer, the locke and key of the Kingdome, as Mathew Paris terms it; that so hee might commaund the seas from his enemies arriuage, and ouer-awe the Kentish a most strong and populous Prouince. When Stigand therfore Archbishop of Canterbury, and Egleſine the Politicke Abbot of Saint Augustines (being the chiefest Lords and Gouernours of Kent) vnderstoode of his approch, they assembled the Commons at Canterbury, laying forth the perils of the Prouince, the miseries of their neighbours, the pride of the Normans, and the wronges of the Church; all which now were too apparantly seene: the Englisb till then, (they sayd,) were borne free, and the name of bond-men not heard of among them; but now seruitude only attend vs, if wee yeeld (sayd they) to the insolency of this griping enemy: These two Prelates therefore, after the example of the vndaunted Machabees, offered themselues to die in the defence of their Country; whose forwardnesse drew the people vnto the like resolution, which by their aduertisements were assigned to meet at a day, the place was Swanscombe, two miles west from Graues end.

(7) Where accordingly conuening, and keeping secret in the woods, they waited the comming of the Conquerour, all iointly agreeing, for that no way lay open saue onely a front, to carry in their hands great branches of trees, wherewith they might both keepe themselues from discouery, and (if need were) impeach the passage of the Normans: which deuice tooke so strange an effect, that it daunted the Duke euen with the sight at his approch; who being, as he thought, free from the enemy, was now suddainly beset on all sides with woods, whereof seeing some before him to moue, he knew not but that all the other vast woods were of like nature, neither had hee leasure to auoide the danger. The Kentish inclosing his Army about, displaied their banners, cast downe their boughes, and with bowes bent prepared for battle; so that hee which euen now had the Realme to his seeming in his fist, stood in despaire of his owne life; of which his sodaine amazement, the reuerend Prelates Stigand and Egleſine taking notice, & also aduantage, presented themselues before him, and in the behalfe of the Kentish thus spake.

The Conquerour driuen into this strait, and loath to hazard all on so nice a point, their demaunds being not vnreasonable, more wisely then willinglie granted their desires; and pledges on both parts giuen for performance, Kent yeeldeth her Earledome; and Castle of Douer to their new King William.

(9) All things established for Englands securitie, and subiection now to the Normans; hee ordained his halfe brother by the surer side, Odo Bishop of of Bayeux, (whom he created Earle of Kent) and his cosen William-Fitz-Osburne (by him made Earle of Hereford) to bee Gouernours in his absence ouer the Realme; and in the Lent following sailed into Normandy, leading with him many pledges for their fidelity, besides other Nobles, especially such as he feared to be too potent; amongst whom, Stigand the Archbishop of Canterbury, the two great Earles Edwin and Morcar, Edgar surnamed Etheling, Frethe-rik Abbot of S. Albans, Agelnothus Abbot of Glastenbury, Walteof the sonne of the warlike Siward Earle of Northumberland, Roger Earle of Hertford, Rainulph Earle of Cambridge, and Gospatricke Earle of Cumberland, were the men of greatest note; yet was hee no sooner gone, but that Edrick surnamed Syl-uaticus (sonne to Alfrick, the brother of Edrick Streona, the treacherous Earle of Mercia,) a man of great spirit, and of no little power, aided by the Welshmen, tooke vp armes and denied subiection to the Normans, so that by either partie (as in ciuill discords it euer falleth out) great spoiles were made in many places; but most of all in Herefordshire, where Robert Fitz-Scroope left to man the Castle, did much hurt vpon the Tenants of Edricke, and he to requite him with the like, calling to his aide Blethyn and Ry-walhon Kings of Wales, wasted all to the mouth of Wye.

(10) These stirres in England called william out of Normandy, and were so distastful to his great, but ill digesting stomacke, that hee began to hold the reine straiter, and harder to curbe the head-strong Englisb, giuing the possessions of their Nobles vnto his Normans, and laying vnwonted taxes & heauie subsidies vpon the Commons, then which nothing bred him more hatred, in so much, that many of them, to enioy a barren liberty, forsooke their fruit-full inheritance, and with their Wiues & Children, as outlawes, liued in the Woods, preferring that naked name of freedome, before a sufficient maintenance possest vnder the thraldome & tyranny of their Conquerors: but in short time, to sustaine their wants, (easily conceiued, but hardly indured) they so fell to spoyle and robbe, that the high waies lay vntrod from towne to towne, yea and priuate houses euery where so guarded with bowes, billes, polaxes, swords and clubs, as if they had been not harbours of peace, but fortresses of warre; when praies were made at the shutting in, and opening of their dores, as in times of open hostilitie. On the other side, such as preferred vassalage with some hope of tollerable (yea, or vntollerable) vsage, they to curry fauour with the Normans, seeming to forget who they were, became as strangers themselues, and did shaue their beards, round their haire, and in arment, behauiour, and diet, a ltogether vnfashioned ned themſelues to imitate them: it being a ſhame in thoſe daies, euen amongſt Engliſhmen, to bee an Engliſhman.

(11) Vnto theſe Malecontents, and voluntarie Out-lawes, ioined Morcar and Edwine, the ſtout Earles of Cheſter and Yorkeſhire, ſetting vp again for their Captaine Edgar Etheling (which if in due time at firſt they had done, might haue proued ſucceſſefull) who with their complices right valiantly for a time reſiſted the Normans, and in their proceedings put many of them to the ſword. King William as carefull and ſedulous to preuent further miſchiefe, collecting his forces, and not without danger of his life, diſſolued their power, ſo that euery man ſought how to ſaue himſelfe by eſcape: among whom Edwin and Morcar, Weltherſus and Merther, with ſome of the Biſhops and Clergie went into Scotland. Marleſwin, and Goſpatrick, Noblemen of Northumberland went into Denmarke: Edgar Atheling, with his mother Agatha, and his ſiſters Chriſtian and Margaret, tooke the ſeas for Hungarie; but by contrary winds were driuen into Scotland, where they were moſt courteouſly entertained by Malcolme (ſurnamed Cammor) King of that Country, who ſo affected the perſon and qualities of Lady Margaret, that hee entred with her a Nuptiall contract, and the rather in reſpect of her poſſibility and neereneſſe to the Engliſh crowne; whoſe marriage was ſolemnized about the feaſt of Eaſter, in the ſecond of King Williams raigne, whereby Scotland became a ſanctuary to the Engliſh, which daily fledde thither from the preſſures of the Normans.

(12) The Conquerour now perceiuing the occaſion of new ſtirres, ſent vnto King Malcolme for the deliuerie of Edgar his enemie; which if he refuſed, hee threatened to denounce open warre againſt Scotland. But Malcolme minding more his owne honour, then King VVilliams threats, returned this anſwere, That he held it an vniuſt thing, yea and (in a Prince) a wicked part, to betray him to his enemy, that came vnto his Court for protection, as Prince Edgar was forced for feare of his life; whoſe innocency and demeanour toward William, his greateſt aduerſarie, could not touch with the leaſt ſuſpect: alleadging further (beſides the reſpect of ordinary humanity, in this caſe euer religiouſly to be obſerued) the ſtraight bands of their neere alliance, which required him to tender the afflicted eſtate of his moſt louing wiues, moſt loued brother, comming vnder his Canopie, as it were for defence.

(13) William thus fruſtrate of all hope from king Malcolme, and daily perplexed at the flight of the Engliſh vnto his kingdome, feared a reuolt & dangerous rebellion; to preuent which, hee cauſed foure ſtrong caſtles to bee built, one at Haſting, another at Lincolne, the third at Nottingham, & the fourth at Yorke, wherein he beſtowed ſtrong Gariſons: and diſarming the Engliſh of armour, commaunded euery houſe-holder to put out both fire and candle at eight of the clocke at night; at which houre, in euery City, Towne and Village, he cauſed a bell to be rung, of the French then called Couerfew (that is, Couer-fire) partly yet in practiſe, and in name verie neer, commonly called Curfue: to preuent nightly tumults that might happily be done.

(14) All this his circumſpection notwithſtanding, could not preuent the troubles that preſently aroſe; for Goodwin and Edmund, the ſonnes of the late King Harold, comming with ſome forces out of Ireland, and landing in Sommerſetſhire, fought with Adnothus, (ſometime maſter of their fathers horſe, but now a Normaniſt) whom they ſlew with many others, and taking great booties both in Cornwall and Deuonſhire, departed againe for Ireland.

Exceſter likewiſe, ſeeking to ſhake off the fetters of the Normans bondage, as alſo Northumberland, to recouer their former liberties, tooke Armes: againſt whom, King William in all haſt poſſible, ſent Robert Cumin, and went himſelfe ſtrongly prepared againſt Exceſter, which he moſt ſtraitly beleaguered; at which time the Citizens thought it not enough to ſhutte their gates againſt him, but contemptuouſly taunted and flouted him, vntill a great peece of the wall falling downe by the eſpeciall hand of God, (as the Hiſtorians of that age report) they immediately ſet open their gates, and ſubmitted themſelues to his mercy. The chiefe inſtigator to their diſloialty was Githa the mother of King Harold, and ſiſter to Swain King of Denmarke, with others ſiding againſt the Normans; who now ſeeing the yeelding vp of that Citie, ſhifted themſelues out of danger, and got ouer vnto Flanders.

Exceſter yeelded to King William

(15) But fortune to Cumin was not ſo fauourable in the North, nor himſelfe ſo circumſpect as valiant; for lying ſecurely, as hee thought in the City Durham, hee was on the ſodaine ſurpriſed in the night by Edgar Atheling and his followers, where Robert and ſeuen hundred of his Normans were ſlain, one onely eſcaping, who brought the bloody news thereof to King William, which hapned in the third of his raigne, the twenty eight of Ianuary, and yeere of Chriſt, 1068. The depth of Winter notwithſtanding, he poſted into the north; whoſe only terror danted all further attempts, ſo that taking ſome of the Authors of this rebellion, he cut off their hands and ſome of their heads, conceiuing hereupon more hatred againſt the Engliſh, and in that ſpleene of diſpleaſure returned to London.

(16) Whiles theſe inſurrections were on foot in England, the fugitiue Engliſh in Denmarke ſo far preuailed with King Swaine, that they procured his aid to recouer their rights, and the rather, as they alleadged, for that the Crowne of England was his, deſcending from thoſe that had before made conqueſt thereof: hee therefore ſent a puiſſant Nauie of three hundred ſaile well fraught with ſouldiers, vnder the conduct of Osburne his brother, and Harold and Canute his ſonnes,: who arriuing in Humber, landed their men for Yorke, and waſted the Country all the way as they went; vnto whom ſhortly ioined Edgar and his aſſociates out of Scotland, ſo that their Army was exceedingly ſtrong. Whoſe approch ſo terrified the Yorkers, that for very griefe thereof their Archbiſhop Aldred, (who was wholly become the Normans fauourite) died, and the Norman Garriſons that there kept, leſt the enemy ſhould haue any ſhelter or ſuccour, ſet their ſuburbs on fire; the flame whereof carried with an ouer-high wind, ſoone conſumed a great part of the City it ſelfe, and therein, the faire Cathedrall Church of *S. (23) And hee for his part fearing to loſe the crown with ſhame, which he had gotten by the effuſion of ſo much bloud, gaue his oath vpon the holy Euangeliſts, and the reliques of Saint Albane the Martyr, (the ſame being miniſtred vnto him by Abbot Fretherik) ſwearing to obſerue, and inuiolably to keep the ancient laws of this land; & moſt eſpecially thoſe compiled by King Edward the Confeſſor, though (as the euent ſoone ſhewed) hee little ment to doe as hee pretended.

(24) Peace thus eſtabliſhed, among other conferences beſeeming ſuch eſtates, it chaunced King William to demand the reaſon how it came to paſſe, that his fortune ſhould bee in one daies battaile to ſubdue the Engliſh, which the Danes before him could not doe in many; to which queſtion whilſt each ſtood looking on others, expecting what to anſwere, the ſtout Abbot Fretherick ſtept forth and ſaid:

Lib S. Alban. S. in vita Fretherici.

(25) The reaſon thereof may eaſily bee giuen, if the occaſion bee well weighed; for wontedly the land was defended by dint of ſwords, vntill that their warlike wearers vpon their godly deuotions, laid them from their ſides vpon the Altars of Oriſons, which through ouerlong reſt are growne very ruſtie, and their edges too dull now for the field: for, (ſaid hee) the maintenance of martiall men, with a great part of this lands reuenewes, are daily conuerted to pious imploiments, to maintaine and defend theſe holy votaries, whoſe praiers pierce more deeper then the ſword: and therefore thou art obliged ô King, to maintaine their peace, that haue beene the cauſe of thy ſo eaſie purchaſe.

A good ſpeech ill taken.

(26) But William before the words were well out of his mouth replied and ſaid, Is the Clergy ſorich and ſo ſtrengthned that the land thereby lieth weakened of her men.

men at Armes, and to keepe onely the religious in safetie shall the Laitie lie exposed to the invasions of the Danes, and other forreine Enemies? surely out of your owne mouthes I will iudge you, and for redresse will first begin with thee: whereupon hee tooke from the Abbey of Saint Albanes all the lands and reuenewes that lay betwixt Barnet and London-Stone. Abbot Fretherick, whose ouerbold answers had now offended the King, without delay called a chapter of his brethren, shewing them their approaching dangers, and to auoid the present storme, went himselfe to Ely, where hee desisted not from his wonted machinations against the Conquerour.

(26) This conference ended, and the Kings oath receiued, the English Armies disband themselues, as dreaming they had now good Fortune by the foot and hoping the greatest stormes of their dangers were past; which presently proued but a Vaine surmise: for King William hauing compounded with the Danes that lay all this last Winter in Northumberland, and paid them a great summe for their departure, beganne extreamely to hate the rebels, and with full resolution of their destruction, suddainely set vpon them apart, which he durst not attempt, when they were vnited, so that slaying many, imprisoning others, and prosecuting all of them with fire & sword, wel was he that could be first gone.

(27) Edgar Etheling got again into Scotland, and Edwin Earle of Yorkeshire following with the like intent, was slaine in the way by his owne souldiers; Egelwin Bishop of Durham, Morcar Earle of Chester, Siward surnamed Bran, and Hereward (a verie valiant Knight) got into the Ile of Ely, relying wholly on the aduantage of the place.

This Hereward had receiued a hallowed sword, and benediction of his vnckle the Abbot of Peterborow, and had most valiantly defended his owne inheritance against the Normans, and with no lesse courage withstood the Conquerour, being made captaine of those now assembled.

(28) But the King left delay should giue them aduantage, and harbor more of such his vnbrideled subiects, with a great power hasted thitherward, & stopping vp the East passage from all flight, or relieue, drew a causy on the west through the deepe Fennes, euen two miles of length, where likewise he then built the Castle of Wisbech: against which, they in the Ile raised another of timber and turffes, and called it according to the name of their Captaine, Hereward: at which place, many assaultes & bickerings being made, but yet no entrance gotten, Morcar by boat escaped out of the Ile, and in Scotland obtained by price, what these distressed could not by praier; so that Malcolme the King, in rescue & reuenge of them, inuaded Cumberland, and forraged all Theisdale: Hereward also went out of the Ile, and got a gallant crew of choise and youthfull souldiers, which stood most stoutly for the defence of their liberties.

(29) In the meane while, the Monkes, oppressed with miseries, sued for mercy vnto the King, & Thurstan the Abbot repairing to Warwick, where William then lay, offered him entrance vnto the Ile, if hee would restore to their Abbey the ancient possessions: the King then reioicing, to obtaine that by wit, which Canutus could not do by maine strength, accorded to the request, and in great hast, but no little difficulty, got into the Ile, where slaying a thousand of the Common sort, hee vsed great cruelty against the better, imprisoning many, and dismembring others, some of their hands, some of their eies and some of their feete. Egelwine Bishop of Durham hee imprisoned, first at Abington, then at Westminster, whose diet was either so sparing, or stomack so great in forbearance, or both (for both are reported) that ere long he died of hunger.

(30) Howsoeuer the Monkes of Ely kept their promise with William for betraying of the Ile; he contrariwise brake his for their preseruation and peace; for by no means their praiers would enter his eares, till the sound of seuen hundred markes had opened the way; to collect which, they were forced to sell both the iewels and ornaments of their Church; which being brought to his receiuers, there wanted (whether by error or deceit) a groat in weight, (for in those daies greater summes passed by weight, not by tale,) whereof when the King vnderstood, hee in greate (but captious) rage, denied them all composition for peace, whereupon with much suite he was entreated to accept of a thousand Markes more, to raise which, they disfurnished their Monastery euen of things of necessary vse.

A small peace of money wanting made more to be paide.

(31) But the English Fugitiues, who had gotten the Scots to stick to them, were not yet pacified, but entring into Cumberland, they wasted the Country before them vnto the Territories of Saint Cuthbert, & city of Durham; to meet whom, King William sent Gospatrick, who lately reconciled to his fauour, and created Earle of Northumberland, shewed the like measure of cruelty vpon the Scotish Abetters, as they had done against the English. The Conqueror therefore not a little moued against King Malcolme, for that his Country was a receptacle of his Rebellious Subiects, and himselfe now the cheife Leader of the Male-contents into his Kingdome, hasted into Scotland with a desire and purpose, to haue done much more then hee was able to accomplish: for entring Galloway, hee more wearied his Souldiers in passing the Marish grounds and mountaines, then with encounter or pursuite of the Enemy, so that hee was forced to giue ouer his enterprize, and then drew his forces towards Lothiam, where King Malcolme and his English laie, being fully resolued, there to end by battaile, either his troubles, or his life.

The English enter into Scotland but with small successe.

(32) But Malcolme wisely considering the euent of warre and that the occasion thereof was not for his own subiects, but for a sort of forraine fugitiues, beganne to thinke, that the wrongs therein done to another hee could hardly brooke himselfe, and sent therefore to William proffers of peace; whereunto lastly the English King inclined and hostages deliuered vpon further Conferences, what time (as I take it) vpon Stane-more, not far from an homely hostilerie called the Spittle, a Stone-Crosse (on the one side of whose shaft stood the picture, and armes of the King of England, and on the other the Image & armes of the King and Kingdome of Scotland, vpon that occasion called the Roi-crosse) was erected, to shew the Limits of either kingdome; some ruines of which Metre-marke are yet appearing; for King William, granting Cumberland vnto Malcolme, to hold the same from him, conditionally that the Scots should not attempt any thing preiudiciall to the Crowne of England, (for which King Malcolme did him homage, saith Hector Boetius the Scotish writer) and the English being reconciled to his fauour, after hee had built the Castle of Durham, returned as cleared from all Northren troubles.

(33) But his Norman Dukedome, stirred somwhat vnto rebellion, called King William into those parts, where, by the prowesse of the English, hee soone brought all things to peace, and returned for England, better conceiting of that Nation, especially of Edgar Etheling, whom he courteously receiued and honorably maintained in his Court, allowing him a pound waight of Siluer euery day to spend; a rare example of a victorious Conquerour shewed vpon a man so vnconstant, (who twice had broken his oath of fidelity) and dangerous to be so neere vnto his person, being, as he was, a Competitor of his Crowne.

(39) But now a lesse suspected, but much more vnnaturall warre arose; for Robert, his eldest sonne, (set on by Philip King of France, who did greatly dread this so hastie grouth of the Conquerour) claimed Normandy by gift of his father, promised to him immediatly after his ConqueSt of England; a Noble Gentleman surely, but of an ambitious and hasty nature, prodigally spending and maintainiug his followers aboue the compasse of his priuate estate; him Philip, & his own ill-nurtured Ambition, thrust forward, & Q. Maud his mother supplied vnder hād, out of her own Coffers, and King Williams Reuennewes, so that with banners displaied hee entred Normandy in hostile maner, and there by force seised vpon diuers places to his owne vse, and so without respect of dutifull patience gained by force the free-gift of his father.

(40) King William hearing of his sonne Roberts proceedings, was not (as great cause there was) a little offended thereat, and with a powerfull Army hasted to Normandy: where neere vnto the Castle of Gerbory, at a place called Archenbraye, he ioined battle with his sonne; where the fight was sore and dangerous on both sides, the Generals being such men as they were: but in the heat of the foot battels that fought it out resolutely, Robert commanded a power of horse to breake in vpon the Rereward of his enemies, and himselfe valiantly following, chanced to light against his owne Father, and with his lance thrust him through the Arme, bearing him off his horse to the ground. King William thus wounded & falne, called for helpe to be remounted, storming to see his bloud spilt in his owne land, and against his owne sonne, which neuer had beene in battailes of other countries, nor drawne by the weapons of forraine enemies, and in great rage threatned the reuenge: Robert that knew his Father by his voice, hastily alighted, and in his Armes tooke him from the earth, humbly desiring his pardon for this vnknown fact, and forgiuenes of his ouer-hastie attempt; then mounting him vpon his owne horse, brought him in safetie out of the presse; who hauing escaped so great a danger, and seeing himselfe for the present too weake to withstand the enemie, left the honour of the field vnto Robert, with the losse of many his souldiers, slaine there both in the battaile and chase, besides a great number that were hurt & wounded; among whom, William Rufus his second sonne was one, a man of a better temper, and more filiall regard to his parents, and therefore more deseruedly and tenderly beloued then Robert; for which dishonour now done to his Father, and disloialty for his vnnaturall armes, hee bitterly cursed him, and execrated the time wherein he begate him: howbeit, others doe write, that for his most vndaunted courage at that time, issuing and ending in such dutiful and tender care of his fathers safety, hee presently forgaue his former offences, and euer after had him in better respect.

(41) These stirres thus qualified, and King William returned, he went forward with his former determination; for setling a further assurance to himselfe and succesSors of the English crowne; to which end, first on the east side of London (the mother City of the land) he laid the foundation of a stately & strongly fenced Castle, or Magazine of warlike munitions, intrenched with a large and deepe ditch, now called the Tower of London; the surueyor of which worke, was Gundulphus Bishop of Rochester; about the twelfth yeare of the Conquerours raigne, so much is lessened the antiquity of that Citadell, & credite of such, as would haue it founded by Iulius Caesar; vnlesse (perhaps) we would thinke that King William did onely adde some new fort to the former; being built (saith Fitz-Stephen) with morter tempered with the bloud of beasts.

(42) Then to enrich his owne coffers (for hee is taxed by Malmesbury to be exceeding couetous) he laid laid great subsidies vpon the land: and that the same might amount to his great benefite (though with the greatest grieuance of the people) hee caused an exact suruey to be taken of the whole kingdome, yea and of euery particular part and commodity thereof; so that there was not an hide of land, lake, water, or wast, but he knew the valuation, the owners, and possessors, together with the rents, and profits thereof, as also of all Cities, Townes, Villages, Hamlets, Monasteries, and Religious houses; causing also all the people in England to bee numbred, their names to bee taken, with notice, what euery one might dispend by yeere; their substance, money & bondmen recorded: how many yokes of oxen, and plough-lands were in the Realme, and what seruices they owed, who held of him in Fee; all which was certified vpon the oathes of Commissioners. This done, he exacted sixe shillings to be paid him for euery hide of land; which amounted to an huge masse of money. The Booke thus made of euerie seuerall suruey, was commonly called the rowle of Winchester, (as being there at first kept) but for the generality, and ineuitable censure thereof, is by Authors named Liber Iudiciarius, by the English, Domesday booke, kept to this day in the Kings Exchequer at Westminster: of which collection Robert, a Poet at Gloucester in ancient time, and ryme wrote thus:

The King William, vor to wite the worth of his lond,
Let enqueri stretlich thoru all Engelond,
How moni Plou-lond, and hou moni Hiden also,
Were in euerich sire, and wat hij were wurth yereto:
And the rents of each toun, and of the waters echone,
The wurth, and of woods eke; that there ne liued none,
But that he wist wat hii were wurth of all Engelond,
And wite all clene, that wurth thereof ich vnderstond,
And let it write clene inou, and that scrit dude iwis;
In the Tresorie at Westminster, there it yut is,
So that vre Kings suth, when hii ransome toke,
Yrede wat sole might yiue, hii fond there in yor boke.

(43) This exaction was gathered with such extremity, & paid with such impouerishing of the English, that they greeuously groned vnder their miserable estate, whereby more hatred grew dailie to the King, and his Normans; whose loue againe to themward was so little, that hee sought by all means to bring the English name, and Nation to ruine: for it is noted by Castor, and Rouse, that no English man was permitted to beare any office of Credit, or Countenance in this Conquerours daies, and accounted it was a great shame to bee called an Englishman, or to marry into their blood.

(44) These greeuances seeming vnsufferable, the English incited Malcolme King of Scotland once more to enter King Williams confines, wasting all before him vnto the Riuer Tyne; against whom the Conquerour sent Robert his sonne, surnamed Courtoise, who marching with a mighty Army, made shew of doing much more then he did; this onely being memorable, that neere to the mouth of Tyne he laid the foundation of a Castle, whereof the towne of New-Castle did afterward take both her beginning, and Name; though long before that time there was a place called Monk-Chester, because (as it should seeme) it had been either the habitation, or possession of some Religious Order.

(45) Neither was Swaine, King of Denmarke, so quailed by his former expeditions, but that he had a minde once more to graspe at the English Crowne, preparing a mighty Armado that way, as was constantly reported and beleeued; King William therfore receiued a great power of French Souldiers with others, which he had lately brought with him from Normandy, to disburden himselfe of whose Charges, he appointed them to bee maintained at the costs of the English, both for their wages, and other prouisions, which was an other great burden vnto the English, though it long lasted not; for that the Danish King better aduising himselfe, gaue ouer the enterprise, and thereupon these Souldiers were discharged.

Mat. West. The English charged with the maintenance of fortaine Souldiers.

(46) Another griefe and offence he ministred against both God and man, for the fruitfull Countrey lying South from Sarisbury vnto the Sea, hee dispeopled, pulling downe Townes, and Villages, with 36. Mother-churches, from mans vse, & Gods diuine seruice; & for 30. miles, laid open the country, some say out of policie, to haue safe ariuage from Normandy in time of need: others say, for beasts, & for his own game in hunting, or to vse the words of Gualter Mapes, who liued immediatly after, to dedicate the same vnto wild Beasts and Dogs-game; which place called anciently Ytene, was euer since named the New Forrest: imposing great penalties both pecuniary, and corporall on all such as offended in hunting his Game: in so much that he was then called the Father of wild Beasts, more fauouring them then the People his Subiects. But Gods iust iudgement not long after followed this so vnreasonable, and cruel act: for in this Forest, Richard his second sonne being goared by a Deare, (others say, blasted with a pestilent Ayre) was vntimely slaine: And Rufus his other sonne mistaken for a Deare was by chaunce shot thorow with an Arrow, by Walter Tyrell. Henry likewise his Grand-child by Robert Curtoise, whilest he hotly pursued the chase, was strucken by a bough into the Iawes, and as Absolon left hanging vntill he died.

Iudgements of God on King Williams issue in New-Forest Cambden.

Thus, no doubt, God punished his sinnes (euen on his children, and childrens children) who had both taken away the places, and vse of his seruice, and also disherited multitudes of Christian people to their extreme pouerty, for his vnsaciat and superfluous pleasure: so that (as some then thought) the Earth it selfe also seemed to cry Reuenge, when as vpon the sixt of Aprill, and fifteenth of King Williams Raigne, a most fearefull Earthquake, with a warring noise, did shake the ground.

Matth. Paris.

(47) Other great calamities are noted to haue hapned vpon his people, as burning feuers strangely consuming the people: Murrens deuouring infinit numbers of Cattle; abundance of raine, and concourse of water-flouds beyond credit, whereby the hilles were so softned to the very foundations, that some of them fell, and ouerwhelmed the villages which were in their way: most of the principall Cities of England much endamaged by fire, and London especially, where the Cathedrall Church of Saint Paul (as much as was combustible) was consumed to ashes; and if that may also be noted (which caused not the least wonder) tame, and domesticke fowles, as hennes, geese, peacockes, and the like fled into the forrests, and woods, and became very wild, in imitation of men, degenerating then into sauages: for in those times euen the Churchmen (and therefore lesse maruaile of others) became vnlike themselues: Walter Bishop of Durham, bought of King William the Earledome of Northumberland, maintained murtherers, and was murthered himselfe. Odo, another Bishop, and Earle also, to reuenge his death, made Northumberland desolate, beheading and dismembring the poorer sort, and at great ransomes fining the rich, and Pope Gregory for his part plaid Rex in this land, sending hither his Buls with damning curses against the married Clergie: commanding that none should heare their Masses: which how it was disgested, either by God, or man; let vs heare Paris an ancient Monke (and therefore herein no partiall man) speake his mind.

Inhibiting of married Priests a new deuice, and inconsiderate.

" (48) Pope Gregory in a generall Synode excluded "the married Priests from execution of their holie "offices, and forbad the Lay-men to heare their "Masses; a president new, and proceeding (as it "seemed to many) out of inconsiderate iudgement, "contrary to the sentence of the holy Fathers: which "haue written, that the Sacraments of the church "by the inuisible operation of the holy Ghost, haue "their due effect, whether they are dispensed by "men good or bad, &c. By which fact so grieuous "a scandall is arisen, that holy Church was neuer "rent with a greater schisme in the time of any he-"resie whatsoeuer; whiles some stand for the right, "and others striue against it. Moreouer, whereas "few obserue this chastitie enioined (for that "though some for gaine, or vaine-glory, doe hypo-"critically pretend it; yet many doe heape vp in-"continency with periury, and manifold adulteries) "by this occasion the Lay-men shake off all due re-"spect to sacred orders and ecclesiasticall gouerne-"ment; they prophane the holy mysteries, they "baptize Infants, annointing them with the sordid "humor of their ears in stead of holy oile, they burn "the tithes due to the Priests; our Lords body con-"secrated by a married priest, they tread vnder their "feet, and often doe wilfully cast forth the bloud of "our Lord vpon the ground.

(49) This Gregory (before called Hildebrand) sate in Peters chaire with such pranks of impietie, that his gouernment was odious to the Romans, who wished an end of his raigne and life, so that certaine Southsaiers imploied in that busines gaue forth, that after Gregory, Odo should be Pope. Odo, our said Earle, the Conquerours brother, fed with ful hope that hee was the man, sendeth to Rome to buy him a Pallace, adorning it with stately and ouer-lauish trimmings; Salutes the Senators with great gifts & complements, stuffeth bagges with money, and letters to such as might doe much in the election, and prouides honourable personages to attend him to Rome. Among the which for chiefe, was Hugh Earle of Chester, with many great men and Knights of the land: for the Normans variable, and desirous to see forraine Countries, were contented to forsake their faire lands in the west climate, to accompany this proud Prelate ouer the riuer Poo.

This iolly traine was set forward into the Isle of Wight, and there in great pompe ready to set saile into Normandy, when on the sodain King William vnlooked for, was euen among them, and in his great Hall in presence of his Nobles thus spake:

Which accordingly was done; vpon seizure of whose estate, this Prelate was found so well lined in purse, that the heapes of yellow mettall did moue admiration to the beholders, and many of his bags were taken vp out of the bottome of Riuers, where they were hidden full of gold ground into powder.

His Auarice

(52) Soone after, some displeasure hauing arisen betwixt King William, and Philip King of France, hee hauing first generally caused to be taken the Oath of English Alleageance to himselfe and successors, with a mighty masse of money (fitted for some great attempts) departed to Normandy; where falling sicke, and keeping his Bed more then his wont, the French King hearing that his disease was in his belly, gaue him this frumpe; Our Cosen William (said he) is laid now in Child-bed: Oh what a number of Candels must I offer at his going to Church? surely I thinke a hundred thousand will not suffice.

Wil. Malmsb. Matth. Par.

Some write William was Physicke to downe his fat belly, Higden.

King William hearing thereof, is said to make this answere; Well, our cosen of France I trust shall be at no such cost; but after this my child-birth, at my going to Church (swearing by the resurrection and brightnes of God) I will (said he) find him one thousand candles, and light them my selfe. And accordingly towards August following, when both the trees, fruites, corn, and ground, was most flourishing, hee entred France with a mighty Army, spoiling all the west parts thereof before him; and lastly, set the City Meux or Mauntz on fire, wherein he consumed the faire Church of our Lady, in the wals whereof was enclosed an Anchoret, who might, but would not escape, holding it a breach of his religious vow to forsake his Cell in that distresse. The King busied in these attempts cheered his men to feede the fire, and came himselfe so neere the flames, that with the heat of his harnesse, he got a sicknesse, and the same encreased by the leape of his horse, that burst the inward rimme of his belly, and cost him his life.

The sudden fame of his death stroke such feare into the Commons harts as was admirable, euery man shifting for one, but all neglecting the funerall rites of their King, vntill that one Harluins a poore Countrey Knight, vndertooke the Cariage of his Corps vnto Cane, and at his owne cost, both by Sea and Land, vnto Saint Stephens Church, which this dead King had formerly founded.

His Hearse also abandoned of al.

At his entrance into Cane, the Couent of Monks came foorth to meet him, and to celebrate the buriall with all Ceremonies beseeming; but behold euen at that instant, a sudden chance of fire happened, which presently inuaded a great part of the Towne, that, as his Corps before, so now his Hearse was of all forsaken, whiles they addressed themselues to represse that furious Element: which done, and the Funerall Sermon ended, the Stone-Coffin set in the earth, in the Chancell betwixt the Chorale and the Altar, and the body ready to be laid therein, one Ascelinus Fitz-Arthur, a man of some Note, stood vp and forbade the buriall: This very place (said he) was the floore of my Fathers house, which this dead Duke violently tooke from him, and heere vpon part of my inheritance founded this Church: This ground therfore I challenge, and in Gods behalfe forbid that the Boay of my dispoiler, be couered in my Earth, neither shall it be interred in the precinctes of my right. Whereupon they were enforced to compound with him for a present sum of money then deliuered, and with consent of his sonne Henry, for a hundred pound weight of siluer after to be paid, and so the Exequies went forward; when, behold again the Corps laid into the Tombe, was with the largest, which being pressed, the belly (not bowelled) brake, & with an intollerable stench so annoied the by-standers, that neither Gummes, nor spices fuming from the Censures, could be any whit sensible to relieue them, insomuch that all with great amazement hastning away, they left the Monks to shuffle vp the buriall, and they were soone glad to get them to their cels.

His buriall place denied him.

Hence Stowe notes their report for fabulous, who wrot that his Body was found vncorrupt 500. yeeres after his death.

(58) This then was the life and death of this great Monarch, the Conquerour of Men, but not of Death, nor suruiuing Enuie; a bright example of the dimme glory of man, who in life had the possessions of Kingdomes and Dukedomes, men at Armes, riches and honour, and all things thereto adhering; but after his death, neither Ornaments, nor Attendants, nor place of buriall, till it were bought; all which, priuate men seldome want: so vaine is the pompe of this world, and so vncertaine the state of her darlings.

(59) He was for stature indifferent, of countenance sterne, his fore-head high, and haire verie thinne, fat and corpulent of body, with his bellie bearing out, so strong of ioints and armes, that few could bend his bow; of witte ready, and very politicke, in speech eloquent, resolute in attempts, in hazards valiant, a great souldier, and as great in successe; rough and couetous towards the English, in his taxes, lawes, and in giuing to his Normans their lands; whose Charters were of a farre other tenour, forme, & breuity, then those tedious and perplexed conueyances, since in vse, as by these few inserted may appeare.

Read. Higden Polyc. lib. 7. cap. 4.

I William King, the third yere of my raigne,

Giue to thee Norman Hunter, tome that art both leese and Deere,

The Hop and the Hopton, and all the bounds vp and downe,

Vnder the Earth to Hell, aboue the Earth to Heauen,

From me and mine, to thee and to thine,

As good and as faire, as euer they mine were,

To witnesse that this is sooth, I bite the white waxe with my tooth,

Before Iugge, Maude, and Margery, and my yongest sonne Herry:

For a bow and a broad arrowe, when I come to hunt vpon yarrow.

(60) At the suite of william Bishop of London, he granted the City (whose chiefe Magistrate was then called the Portreue) their first Charter written in the Saxon tongue, confirmed with greene waxe, whereas the Saxons before vsed onely to signe with guilt crosses, and such like markes: the Copy thereof is this:

(61) In the like Charter, granted to his Nephew Alane Earle of Britaine for lands in Yorkeshire, hee writeth himselfe William surnamed Bastard; and yet it seemeth, hee was offended at Guy of Burgundy for tearming him Nothus; perhaps, because that word signifieth such a one, whose Father is vnknown, whereas King Williams was not only known, but renowned also.

(62) Howsoeuer hee was sterne and hard to the English, yet to his Normans hee was facile and too indulgent, much deuoted to Religion, and frequenting the Church, both morning and euening; The Clergie that liued according to their rule and profession, hee both honoured and richly endowed; but to the licentious was very rough and hard handed: his vncle Malgerius Archbishop of * Rotomage, for his dissolute life hee disgraded: his brother Odo Bishop of Baieux, he imprisoned, and many of the English depriued, as we haue heard.

(63) Besides his many other stately buildings, both for fortification and deuotion, three Abbies of chiefe note he is said to haue raised, and endowed with large priuiledges and rich possessions. The first was at Battle in Sussex, where hee wonne the Diadem of England, in the valley of Sangue-lac, so called in French, for the streames of bloud therein spilt: but william of Newberie deceiued in the soile it selfe, which after raine sheweth to bee red; affirmeth firmeth, that after any ſmall ſhowre of raine, the earth ſweateth forth very freſh bloud, as by the euident ſight thereof (ſaith hee) doth as yet plainly declare, that the voice of ſo much Chriſtian bloud there ſhed, doth ſtill crie from the earth to the Lord.

(64) But moſt certaine it is, that in the very ſame place where King Harolds Standard was pitched, & vnder which himſelfe was ſlaine, there William the Conquerour laid that Foundation, dedicating it to the Holy Trinity, and to Saint Martine, that there the Monks might pray for the ſoules of Harold and the reſt that were ſlaine in that place: whoſe Priuiledges were ſo large, that they, and others of the like condition, were afterwards diſſolued by Act of Parliament, when it was found by experience, that the feare of puniſhment being once taken away, deſperate boldnes, and a daring will to commit wickedneſſe, grew ſtill to a greater head: for it was enfranchiſed with many freedomes; and among others, to vſe the words of the Charter, were theſe: If any Thiefe, Murtherer or Felon, for feare of death, flie and come to this Church, let him haue no harme, but let him be diſmiſſed, and ſent away free from all puniſhment. Be it lawfull alſo for the Abbot of the ſame Church to deliuer from the Gallowes any thiefe or robber whereſoeuer, if he chance to come by, where any ſuch execution is in hand.

(65) At Selby alſo in Yorkeſhire, where his yongeſt ſonne Henry was borne, he founded the Abbey of Saint Germans: at Exceſter, the Priorie of Saint Nicholas; and to the Church and Colledge of Saint Martins le grand in London, hee gaue both large priuiledges, and much land, extending from the corner of the City wall, by Saint Giles Church without Criplegate, vnto the common Sewer, receiuing the waters, running then from the More, and now More-fields.

(67) Maud the wife of King William, was the daughter of Baldwine the fifth, ſurnamed the Gentle, Earle of Flaunders; her mother was Alice, daughter of Robert King of France, the ſonne of Hugh Capet: Shee was married vnto him when hee was a Duke, at the Caſtle of Angi in Normandy, and in the ſecond yeare of his raigne ouer England, ſhe was crowned Queene vpon Whit-ſunday, the yeere of Grace, 1068. And although ſhe maintained Robert in his quarrell for Normandy, and out of her owne coffers paid the charges of warre againſt his Father, and her owne Husband; yet, becauſe it did proceed but from a motherly indulgence for aduancing her ſonne, it was taken as a cauſe rather of diſpleaſure, then of hatred, by King William, as himſelfe would often auouch, holding it an inſufficient cauſe to diminiſh the loue, that was linked with the ſacred band of a matrimoniall knot. Shee departed this life the ſecond day of Nouember, the ſixteenth yeere of his raigne, and of Chriſts humanity, 1083. for whom he often lamented with teares, and moſt honourably entered her at Cane in Normandy, in the Church of S. Maries, within the Monaſterie of Nuns, which ſhe had there founded.

(68) Robert, the eldeſt ſonne of King William, and of Queene Maude his wife, was ſurnamed Curtuoiſe, ſignifying in the old Norman-French, Short-Bootes: he ſucceeded his father onely in the Duchie of Normandy, and that alſo he loſt afterwards to his brother Henry King of England, at the battell of Ednarchbray (in that Dukedome) the yeere of our Lord 1106. where he was taken priſoner, and hauing his eies put out (an vnbrotherly puniſhment) was committed to the Caſtle of Cardiffe in South-Wales; and after twenty eight yeeres impriſonment, there deceaſed, the yeere before the death of his ſaid brother, Anno 1134. and was buried at Gloceſter, in the midſt of the Quier of Saint Peters Church; where remaineth a Tombe with his Carued Image at this day. Hee had two wiues; the firſt, Margaret daughter of Herbert, Earle of Maygne, both married in their Child-hood, and ſhee died before they came to yeeres of conſent: The other was Sibyll, daughter of Geffrey, and ſiſter to William, Earles of Conuerſana in Italy, and Neece of Robert Guiſeard, Duke of Apulia: By her he had two ſonnes William and Henry; this Henry was he that was ſlaine by miſchance, as he was hunting in the New-Foreſt in Hampſhire.

William the Elder, ſurnamed in Latine Miſer, was Earle of Flanders, in right of Queene Maude his Grand-mother, ſucceeding Charles of Denmarke in that Earledome; he alſo had two wiues, the firſt Sibyll, (whoſe Mother, called alſo Sibyll, was the daughter of Fowlke Earle of Anion) after diuorced from him, and remarried to Terry of Alſac, his Succeſſour; the ſecond was Ioan, the daughter of Humbert Earle of Morien, now called Sauoy, ſiſter of Queene Alice of France, wife of King Lewis the Groſſe: hee died ſixe yeeres before his father, of a wound receiued at the Siege of the Caſtle of Angi in Normandy, the 27. of Iuly, in the 28. yeere of the Raigne of King Henrie his vncle, and of our Lord, 1128. hee was buried at Saint Omers in the Monaſtery of Saint Bertin, and left no iſſue behinde him.

(69) Richard the ſecond ſonne of King William and Queene Maude, was born in Normandy, and after his Father had attained the Crowne came into England, where, being then verie yong, as hee was hunting in the New-Foreſt of Hampſhire, he came to a violent & ſudden death, by the goring of a Stagge; (others ſay, by a peſtilent ayre,) and is noted to bee the firſt man that died in that place, the iuſtice of God puniſhing on him his Fathers diſpeopling of that Countrey: his body was thence conueied to Wincheſter, and there buried on the Southſide of the Quire of the Cathedrall Church, where there remaineth a monument of him with an inſcription entitling him a Duke, and ſome ſuppoſe of Boloigne.

Vpon his return he was made Knight, being 16. yeers old, by his Father at Westminster, in Whitsontide, the nineteenth yeer of his Raign, Anno 1086. and thogh at his Fathers death he had nothing bequeathed him but Treasure, yet afterward he succeeded his Brothers, both in the Kingdome of England and Dutchie of Normandy.

Cecily.

(72) Cecilie, the Eldest daughter of King William and Queene Maude his wife, was borne in Normandy, brought vp in England, and carried againe into Normandy, where in the ninth yeere of the Kings Raigne, and the yeere of our Lord 1075. shee was by her Father on Ester day, with great Solemnity offered vp in the Church of Feschampe, & vailed to bea Nunne in the Monastery there; but was afterward elected by the Nunnes of our Lady at Cane, to be Abbesse of their Monasterie, founded by her Mother, which she gouerned, and where she died, and was enterred.

She is vailed a Nunne.

Constance.

(73) Constance, the second daughter of King William, and Queene Maud, was the first wife of Allayne Earle of little Britaigne, surnamed in the Britisb, Fergent; in English, Red. In regard of which marriage, and his seruice done at the conquest of England, his Father in law gaue him all the lands of Earle Edwine, whereon he built the Castle, and whereof he made the Earledome of Richmond, which long after, belonged to the Earles and Dukes of Britaigne his Successors; although he had his children by an other wife; for she died very yong and without issue; and was buried in the Abbey of Saint Edmundsbury in Suffolke.

The Earldome of Richmond erected.

Alice.

(74) Alice, the third daughter of King William & Queen Maud, was married to Stephen Earle of Bloys in France, and had issue by him William an Innocent, Thibaud surnamed the Great, Earle of Blois, and Champain, Stephen Earle of Mortain and Boleine, (who was King of England) Henry a Monke of Cluny, after Abbot of Glastenbury, and Bishop of Winchester, Mary married to Richard Earle of Chester, and Emme, wife of one Harbert, an Earle of France, and mother of Saint William Archbishop of Yorke: Shee suruiued Earle Stephen her husband, and in her widowhood tooke vpon her the profession of Religion in the Priorie of Nunnes at Marciguy in France, where she ended her life.

Saint William Archbishop of Yorke.

(75) Gundred, the fourth daughter of King William, and of Queene Maud, was married to William of Warrein, a Nobleman of Normandy, who was the first Earle of Surrey in England; by whom shee had issue William the second Earle, Progenitors of the Earles that followed; and Rainold of Warren, her second sonne, who had also Issue. Shee died in Child-bed, three yeeres before her husband, at Castlepker in Norfolke the 27. of May, in the 20. yere of her fathers raigne, being the yeere of our Lord, 1085. and is buried in the Chapter-house of Saint Pancrase Church within the Priory, at the town of Lews, in the County of Sussex.

Gundrid.

(76) Ela, the fifth daughter of King William, and his Queen Maud, in her Child-hood was contracted in marriage to Duke Harald, when he was in Normandy, being then a yong Widower. Notwithstanding, hee refusing her tooke an other wife, and vsurped the Kingdom of England, after the death of King Edward, whereby hee occasioned his owne ruine, and Conquest of his Country, which afterward ensued when her Father sought reuenge: so much (as some write) to the discontentment of this Lady, that for griefe of these mischances, shee euer after refused marriage, and led a single and solitarie life; though others vpon better warrant collect, that shee died yong, and before William her Father set forth for England; Harald himselfe pleading, that hee was free from all couenants and promises to Duke William, by reason of the death of this his daughter.

Ela.

Margaret.

(77) Margaret, the sixth and yongest daughter of King William and Queene Maud, was in her childhood giuen in marriage to Alphonso King of Gallicia in Spaine, that afterward was so renowned for the Conquest of the City Lysbon, for his victories against the Mores, and for the slaughter of their fiue Kings, and was the founder of the Kingdome of Portugall, the first King thereof, and the first bearer of the fiue Shields of the said fiue Kinges, which are to this day the Armes of the same. But this Lady being thus contracted, deceased before those things hapned, and before shee came to yeeres of lawfull consent to the marriage.

VVILLIAM THE SECOND SVRNAMED RVFVS, THE FORTIETH MONARCH OF THE ENGLISH: HIS ACTS, RAIGNE, AND VNTIMELY DEATH.

CHAPTER III.

WIlliam posting for England, & Archbishop Lanfrank his earnest soliciter by liberall gifts giuen, and promises made to abrogate the ouer hard lawes of his Father, had the readier passage into the opinions of them that could doe most: and the more to notifie his intended mild gouernment, with other his noble inclinations to princely vertues, as eye-witnesses of his fauours towards the English, hee brought with him from Normandy, Morcar, the stout Earle of Chester, and Wilnoth the sonne of King Harold, both of them released out of prison, and then held in especiall fauour with him. But most of the States standing for Robert Curtoise his elder Brother (a man deemed of a more liberall disposition, and better temperature towards the Subiects) their titles had beene tried by swords, had not Lanfrank and Wulstan, both wise & reuerend Prelates, by their Counsels and Mediations staied their hands.

Lanfranke and Wulstane sway the Peeres for Rufus.

(2) Consent thus gotten, and all voices giuen for William, he was crowned their King at Westminster, vpon Sunday the twenty sixt day of September, and yeere of Saluation, 1087. by the hands of Lanfrank Archbishop of Canterbury; vnder whom he had beene educated euen from his Child-hood, and by him made fit both for Warre and Gouernment, had not the variable inclination of his owne mind carried his actions past the limits of any staied compasse.

William Gemit. Matth. Paris. His Coronation.

His disposition.

(3) Robert vpon discontents that Normandy was still detained, before his Fathers sickenesse, was gone into Germany, to solicite their assistance for his right to that Duchie: but hearing of his death, hasteth into the Prouince, and was there peaceably receiued, ued, and made their Duke: which title notwithstanding, seemed to him dishonourable; his yonger brother being inuested to a Kingdome, and himselfe disinherited; no other cause mouing, but his ouermuch gentlenes, being by nature composed nothing so rough, as was Rufus.

Odors emulation against Lanfrank.

Polyc. lib. 7. cap. 5.

(4) The like emulation incited Odo, Bishoppe of Baieux (his vncle) against Lanfranck the Archbishop, who now ruled all, and had worn him out of fauour with the Conquerour his halfe brother, whom hee taught the distinction of imprisoning Odo, as an Earle, not as a Bishop: now therefore seemed the time most fitting for a iust reuenge: & albeit that Rufus brought him from Normandy, where he had beene captiuated, and restored him his honours & dignities in England; yet hee, vngratefull man, enuying that Lanfranck should goe before him, complotted the downefal aswell of the one, as of the other. And drawing into this conspiracy, Robert Earle of Mortaigne and Hereford his brother, with many other of the English Nobility, wrote his letters into Normandy vnto his Nephew, hastning him to repaire into England, and recouer his right, which by his meanes hee promised should soone bee effected.

He conspireth against the King.

Inuiteth Robert to try for the Crowne.

Duke Roberts hopes for England.

His wants.

(5) The busines thus wrought to Duke Roberts hand, and the English resorting daily into Normandy, assured his hopes of a happy successe, onely the hinderance was want of money, and that very much as the world then went with him, hauing euer borne himselfe no lesse then his birth, nor euer had made his bagges his summum bonum. In these extremes, he well saw the lesse was to bee followed, and to set a Dukedom at stake to cast at a Kingdome, he thought it ods sufficient, though the chance were doubtfull: Therfore to his younger brother Henry, who had store of gold, and wanted land, hee morgaged the Countie of Constantine, a Prouince in Normandy, & then sent to Odo, that he should expect his landing on the West-coast of England by a day prefixed.

Wil. Malms. Simon Dun.

(6) The Bishop now growne bold vpon Duke Roberts great power, shewed himselfe the first in the Action; and fortifying Rochester, beganne to molest the peace of Kent, sending to his complices abroad to doe the like, which was not long in performing: for in the West, Robert de Mowbrey Earle of Northumberland, assisted by Geffrey Bishoppe of Constance, sacked Bath, and Berkley, with a great part of Wilt-shire, and strongly fortified the Castle of Bristow against King William: In Norfolke, Roger Bygod, in Leicestershire, Hugh Grentemeisnil did shrewdly wast those Countries: Roger Mountgomery Earle of Shrewsburie with his Welshmen, assisted by william Bishop of Durham (the Kings domesticall Chaplain) Barnard of Newmerch, Roger Lacie, and Ralph Mortimer (all of them Normans or French-men) with fire and sword past through the Country of Worcester: and surely, the stirres were so great, and Duke Robert so fauoured, that by the iudgement of Gemeticensis, had he hasted his arriuage, or followed the occasion, the Crowne of England had easily been set vpon his head.

Briston fortified against King William.

Henry Hunt.

Duke Robert verie faire for the Kingdome.

Wil. Gemetic.

(7) All in an vprore, and Rufus thus turmoiled, he appointed his Nauie to scowre the seas, and to impeach his brothers arriuage: then gathering his forces, and knowing well how to please the vulgar, promiseth againe to abolish their ouer-hard lawes, & presently to put down all vniust Impostes and Taxations, whereby the People were soone drawne to stand in his defence; and among them Roger Mountgomery was reconciled to the King.

King William promiseth to mollifie his Laws.

He waxeth strong.

Thus now growne strong, & his enemies decreased, he led his Armie into Kent where the sedition first beganne, the Castles of Tunbridge and Horne he recouered, as likewise Pemsey, wherein his vncle Odo had strongly immured himselfe, whose lacke of victuall, by King Williams strait siege, allaied the pride of that great-hearted man; so that hee not onely surrendred the same, but promised the deliuerie of Rochester also strongly manned, with Eustace Earle of Boloigne, and a sort of other gallant Gentlemen, euen the flower of Normandy and Flanders.

Odo the ringleader for Duke Robert.

Simon Dun.

(8) Odo comming to Rochester for the deliuerie of the * Castle according to his promise, was by them surprised, and laid in strait prison, whether in displeasure, or vnder colour, and with consent of Odo, I will not say; but certaine it is, that the King tooke the matter so to heart, that he sent forth his Proclamation through England, commaunding that euery man should repaire to that siege, whosoeuer would not be reputed a Niding, a word of such disgrace, and so distastiue vnto the English, that multitudes seemed rather to flie, then runne to that seruice; whereupon the Castle was surrendred, and Odo banished into Normandy, lost all his liuings and honours in England.

(9) Whilest these things were in acting betwixt King William and his Barons, Duke Robert with his Normans was landed at Southampton, hauing passed some conflict with the Kings ships at the sea: whom Rufus so feared (if mine Author say true) that he sent Messengers vnto him in most submissiue manor, protesting that hee tooke not the crowne as his own by any right; but rather to supply the time in his absence: neither did hee account himselfe King, but as his substitute to hold the crown vnder him; yet seeing the matter had beene so farre passed, and the Emperiall Crowne set on his head; hee most humbly desired that it might so rest, proffering to pay him three thousand Markes by yeere, and to resigne it to him at his death: whereat Duke Robert shaking his head (belike he saw no other remedy) easily consented, and returned forthwith into Normandy.

Rufus pretended submission vnto his brother.

Polycr. lib.

(10) And, if we compare this with the Monke of Saint Albans report, wee may well beleeue, that William was forward enough in his offers, though euer as vnready in performance; for the Barons then being vp, and he not able to allay them, did that by his word, which he could not by his sword, protesting to them that he was willing to resigne the Kingdom, and would be content either with Money or Possessions, if those that were his Fathers Ouer-seers should think it meete; and for any Ordinances touching the affaires of the Common weale, he would referre it wholly to themselues, prouided alwaies his owne honour should not thereby be impeached. But when the Cloudes of these feares were altogether ouerblowne, no budde once appeared from these faire planted grafts.

Math. Paris. William Rufus, a cunning Time-seruer.

Faire words pease tooles, and often deceiue the wise.

(11) For Lanfrank deceased, and both King depriued of a politike director, and Common-welth of a principall Statist, he presently shewed the bent of his inclination, lauishly giuing where no deserts had engaged, and exacting extreame tributes, when no Necessity required; alwaies couetous, yet neuer thrifty, and still gathering, yet neuer enriching his Coffers: All Ecclesiasticall promotions then vacant he assumed into his owne hands, and kept the See of Canterbury without an Archbishop aboue foure yeeres, setting to sale the free-rights of the Church, and he that would giue most came soonest to preferment, wherby both the Lands and good esteeme of the Clergy was daily diminished.

(12) The Storme thus cleered without any thunder; King Rufus set the eye of desire vpon Duke Roberts dominions, who lately had done the like with his; and suddenly burst into Normandy, as Scipio did into Africke, pretending reuenge of injuries done to his Kingdome; first therefore surprizing the Castles of Saint Valery and Albemarle, hee stored them with his owne Souldiers; then piercing forward did great spoile in the Countrie. Robert destitute of meanes and knowing his Normans euer vnfaithfull, sent to Philip the the French King, desiring his assistance against this Brother-Enemy; who preparing towards Normandy, was stopped with such golden showres from King William that he could not passe, so that Duke Robert was constrained to make a peace with his brother, though for himselfe a very sorry one, as saith Gemeticensis; which, as Paris reporteth, was effected by twelue Princes vpon either part, and the conditions as followeth: that King William should retaine and enioy the County of Ewe with Fescampe, the Abbacie of Mount Saint-Michael, and all the Castles he had gotten in Normandy: for the Duke it was agreed, that his brother King William should aide and assist him, to recouer thoselands & territories beyond the seas, which had beene belonging to their Father; That all such Normans as had lost their liuings in England, in taking part with Duke Robert, should be restored: and lastly, whether of them should die first, the suruiuer should be his heire.

(13) Peace thus established, and both their powers vnited, they bent altogether against Henry their yongest brother, who fearing after-claps, had strongly fortified the Castle of Mount Saint-Michael, situated vpon the confines of Normandie and Britaine: him, whom they ought to haue prouided for, (saith Gemeticensis) they went about to expell, and all the Lent long laid siege against him.

It chanced one day as his men sallied out, & made a brauado in the face of their beleaguers; King William alone, more bold then wise, rode against them, thinking none so hardy as to encounter him single; but presently a Knight slew his horse vnder him, & his foot entangled in the stirrupe hee was ouerthrowne; his enemy therefore with drawn sword, was ready to haue slaine him, had hee not reuealed himselfe by his voice: the armed men with great reuerence then tooke him vp, and brought him another horse; when the King not staying for the stirrup, sprang into the saddle, and with an angry countenance demanded, who it was that ouerthrew him? the Knight as boldly answered, and shewed himselfe who he was; by Lukes face, quoth William (for that was his oath) thou shalt bee my Knight, and be enrolled in my Checke, with a Fee answerable to thy worth.

(14) During this seige, Prince Henry being sore distressed for water, and knowing Duke Robert to be of the milder temperature, sent him word of his want, desiring to haue that permitted, which God had made common, and giuen euen to brute beasts, aswell as to men; Duke Robert therefore commanded him to be supplied, whereat William was wroth, telling his Brother he wanted discretion, & policy in warre, which allowed all aduantages to surprise the Enemy: And dost thou (said Robert) esteeme more of water, which is euery where to be got, then of a Brother, hauing no more but him and me? In which dissension, Earle Henry got thence; and by policy tooke a very strong towne called Danford, where presently was a reconciliation made amongst these three brethren, who thereupon forthwith tooke the Seas together for England.

(15) About this time, in the yeere of Grace, 1091, and fourth of King Rufus his raigne, one Eneon the sonne of Cadwor Lord of Dyuet, mouing rebellion against Rees ap Tewdor Prince of Southwales, drew to his side Iestyn Lord of Glamorgan, vpon promise to become his sonne in law by the marriage of his daughter: Iestyn notwithstanding, iudging their faction too weake, sent Eneon into England, where hee was well acquainted, to procure aide against Rees: who entring conference of his businesse with Robert Fitz-hamon a worthy Knight of the Kings Priuie-Chamber, wrought so far with him, being a man easily drawne to the exercise of warre, that for a Salarie hee vndertooke the seruice, and with twelue Knights, and a competent number of Souldiers went into Wales, where ioining with Iestin, in battle slew Prince Rees ap Tewdor, with Conan his sonne. Robert Fitzhamon, now minding to return, demanded his pay according to couenants; which Iestine in some part denied, alledging that Eneon had gone beyond his commission: whereupon such discord arose, that these friends fell out, and Eneon thus touched in his reputation, sided with the English against his owne Country-men; whereupon a battaile was fought, and Iustin with most of his Welsh slaine, so that Robert with his followers obtained a fruitfull possession in those parts, (which by their posteities are enioied euen to this day) whose names, as they are found written in a British record, were as followeth.

(24) Grudges now grown betwixt King William and Duke Robert his brother, each accuſing other of breach of oath and of Couenants; William from Haſtings ſet ſaile into Normandy, where ſome bickering fell betwixt the two Brethren, but by the mediating of certaine graue perſons, their quarrels were comprimiſed, and Princes choſen to be their Arbitrators; which hearing indifferently all allegations, adiudged King Rufus in the fault, who thereupon (as thinking nothing right, but what went with him) was ſo farre from following their award, that being offended with their cenſure, he preſently aſſaulted, and tooke the Caſtle of Burren; neither did Robert for his part ſleepe the whiles, but ſurpriſed the Caſtle of Argenton, which was by former couenants giuen to King William, drawing likewiſe Philip the French King to his ſide, who with his Army entred Normandy for his aſsiſtance.

A breach againe betwixt the two Brethren, but made vp for a time.

(25) King William then waying into what danger hee had brought himſelfe, (all approuing Duke Robert, and diſallowing his Acts,) he ſought to doe that by money, which he could not by ſword. Therfore to thoſe ſouldiers, which in heat of his furie, he had commanded to bee ſent him into Normandy, (euen twenty thouſand, now in readineſſe, and at Haſtings ſtaying for a wind) he ſent a countermand, exacting of euery common ſouldier ten ſhillings in money for the releaſe, and ſo without further trouble to return to their homes; with which ſumme he ſo pacified the French King, that hee now left Robert to looke to himſelfe, who thus forſaken, was conſtrained to come to an vnreaſonable peace.

(26) And the more willingly, for that the holy wars for Ieruſalem, deliberated of fiue yeares before, were now hotely purſued by Pope Vrbane the ſecond, (whome Bibliander blameth to be the cauſer of much Chriſtian blood-ſhed) onely to ſet vp that, which Chriſt by Propheſie had laid in deſolation. Among theſe Chriſtian valiant Captains Duke Robert would be one, but wanting money, (no newes at all to his coffers) hee ſent to his brother King VVilliam to bee ſupplied, and for the ſumme of ſixe thouſand, ſixe hundred, ſixty ſixe pound of ſiluer, (Paulus Aemilius ſaith, ſixe thouſand nine hundred thirty foure more) morgaged his Dutchy vnto him, giuing him the poſſeſsion thereof before his departure.

did as it were flea off their skins; for the Churches and Monasteries, hauing sold away their Iewels and Chalices to satisfie his appetite, and answering they could make no more; the King replied, with some scorne; And haue you not, I beseech you, Coffins of Gold and Siluer for dead mens bones? Accounting the money laid out vpon this holy Expedition, to be better imploied then to garnish the reliques of the dead.

(28) The King thus finding his fortune in all things pliable to his wishes, and his heart therewith greatly puffed vp, his purpose was now at his returne from Normandy, to make a full conquest of Wales; therefore redoubling his forces hee drew into the Marches, where piching his Tents hee consulted with his Captaines what was best to bee done. The Welshmen finding themselues ouerweake, fled according to their accustomed manner, into the Woods and Mountaines, taking thereby such aduantage against their pursuers, that the King returned without any notable deed done; and with the like successe he vndertooke an other Expedition against them the yeere following.

(29) But bearing a minde still to subdue al Wales, he had first in his eie the Iland Anglesey, against which he sent Hugh Mountgomery Earle of Shrewesburie, and Hugh Lupus Earle of Chester, who there executed their Conquests with very great cruelties, cutting off the Noses, Hands, and Armes of their resisters, without regard of age, or sexe, nor sparing either places or persons, sacred or prophane. At which very time it chanced Magnus King of Norway, the sonne of Olanus, (the sonne of Harold Harfager) to haue made his Conquest of the Iles of Orkeney, and then wafting along the Seas, sought to come on Land in Anglesey, whom to impeach, these Earles made all their powers: where Hugh Mountgomery armed at all parts, but onely the sight of his Beuer, was shot into his right eye, whereof hee died eight daies after.

(30) The holy voyage now set forward, (vnto which Pope Vrbane was a chiefe instigator) thirty thousand Christians tooke the Signe of the Crosse, wearing it on their garments as the cognizance of their deuoted warfare: The chiefest Captaine of which Princely Army, was Peter a poore Hermit, who returning from Ierusalem, certified the Pope of the Christians great miserie vnder those mercilesse Infidels: but the good man more exercised in praiers (the weapons of Votaries) then expert to guide an Army, was soone entrapped among the Bulgares, and slaine with most of his souldiers. But yet the businesse still prosecuted, the number of all degrees and ages flocking to the seruice, is reported to haue amounted (a thing almost incredible) vnto seuen hundred thousand. In chiefe commaund of which huge Armie, were imploied many braue Princes of Christendome; as Godfrey the famous Duke of Loraine, with his brethren Eustace and Baldwin: Bohemund Duke of Naples, and his Nephew Tancredus: Robert Earle of Flanders; Hugh le grand, brother to Philip the French King; Raymund, Earle of S. Egidius; and besides many other great Princes, the foresaid Robert Duke of Normandy, not the last in esteeme for his renowned seruice; as his memorable prowesse in that imploiment did afterwards make apparant vnto the world. All these meeting at Constantinople (where Alexius was Emperour) passed ouer Hellespont, and proceeded with better successe then the Hermit had done, subduing Cities and Countries before them, with the slaughter of an hundred thousand Infidels, and purchase of great spoiles: and lastly, tooke Ierusalem the holy City, in the thirty ninth day after the Siege thereof. But let vs from Iewrie returne into England.

(31) King William at rest whilst his Brother and the rest were in warres, thinking now both of fortifying and beautifying his Kingdome, caused new walles to be built about the Tower of London, and at Westminster (* where before was the ancient Palace of Saint Edward and his Ancestours) laid new foundations of a most large and Princely Palace; the Hall whereof, by the testimony of Paris, should haue extended (if he had liued to finish it) from the Riuer Thames euen vnto the common high way; as might appeare by the first groundworks, at the time wherin Paris wrote: but that stately Building, which now we cal the Great Hall, he finished as it now standeth, containing in length two hundred and seuenty foote, in breadth seuenty foure: yet (when some praised the largenesse thereof) hee found fault that it was not made bigger, accounting it scarse worthy the name of a Bed-Chamber, in respect of that which he intended to build.

Wherunto he answered, as no whit daunted: *Hast thou euer heard that any * King hath beene drowned? therefore hoise vp the Sailes, I charge thee and be gone.* The City vpon this vnexpected speed of the King, was soone released, and Helias, Consull of Cinomannia, who did beleaguer it, being taken by a traine, was by King William iested at to his face, as a man neither of Martiall prowesse nor policie: at which indignity the Noble Helias disdainingly storming, with great boldnesse said vnto Rufus: I am now thy Prisoner, not by thy prowesse, but by chance of warre, and my owne misfortune: but were I at liberty, thou shouldest well know, I am not the man thus to be laughed at. The King well-liking the confidence of his spirit: Well then (laid hee) I giue thee full liberty, goe thy waies, doe what in thee lieth; I am the man that euer will mate thee.

(33) And surely, howsoeuer he might be blemished with many staines of bad Gouernment, yet for his valour and resolutions in wars he is greatly commended; and so much by some, that, if it were not against the faith of Christianity, it might be thought (saith Malmesbury) that the Soule of Cæsar had entred into the body of this Rufus, as that of Euphorbus is said to haue don into Pythagoras: yea, & those staines (we may well thinke) were no whit lessened by his story writers, who were dependants of the Romish See: for that he little fauoured their Holy Father, or any such as adhered vnto the See of Rome, against the Prerogatiue of his Crowne; as especially appeared in his Offence conceiued against Anselmus Archbishop of Canterbury, for his too Romish humor. There was at that time a Schisme in the Roman Church, which Monster-like had then two heads on one Body, the Emperour (who claimed that as his right) placing one, and the Roman Clergy abetting another, Vrbanus by name, with whom consorted Anselme, against the Kings command.

His Holineſſe was then very wroth, that things did not cotten better to his deſires in England. But Lanfranck cleared himſelfe of the blame, ſhewing him how diligently (but indeed traiterouſly) hee had beſtirred himſelfe, in counſelling the King to yeeld to ſweare obedience to the Pope: Suaſi, ſed non perſuaſi (ſaith he) I haue ſo aduiſed him, but I could not perſuade him.

(35) By which incredible pride and Popiſh incroachments, attempted by the meanes of theſe chiefeſt Prelates of the Kingdome, King William Rufus (no doubt) ſaw it was high time for him to preuent farther miſchiefes to his State, by following his Fathers ſteps in timely repreſsing ſuch Papall intruſions: yea ſo farre was hee from yeelding his necke to that yoke, that hee auowed, that the Popes, though boaſting of Peters Chaire, had not from him any power of binding or looſing, whoſe godly ſteppes they wholly neglected, following onely after Lucre and wordly Honours: that alſo it was but impoſture to teach Interceſsion, and bootleſſe to vſe Inuocation to Saints, euen to Saint Peter himſelfe. And as for the reſt of the Romiſh Clergie, who then gaue themſelues ſtrangely to wordly and fleſhly pleaſures, wearing their guilt girdles and ſpurres, and trimming their buſhie Locks; their looſe liues the King much deteſted, and ſought to puniſh; which moſt incenſed their Choler: and theſe were the haires no doubt in thoſe Monkiſh writers Pennes that euer blotted his faire name, vnder their faſt-running, and vneuen hands. For ſo much may we gather from Gemeticenſis the Recorder of his life, who hauing reported many Acts of this Kings, ſeemeth laſtly to checke himſelfe for going ſo farre: where (he ſaith) Theſe and many other like things wee could truely report of him, were it not we think it vnconuenient largely to relate his actions, becauſe he perſecuted verie many of Gods ſeruants, and the holy Church not a little, for which it is thought by the moſt part of wiſemen, that he repented too late and vnprofitably.

A very wiſe reaſon.

(36) And true it is, that ſome of them haue taxed him for great Pride and Couetouſneſſe, whereof yet ſome pregnant examples to the contrary are not wanting; as, (though the inſtance bee ſomewhat familiar) when his Chamberlane bringing him a paire of new hoaſe, and he demanding the price, was anſwered that they coſt three ſhillings; Away baſe fellow (quoth he) are thoſe beſeeming a King? bring mee of a Marke price: his ſeruant went, but brought him an other paire of no greater coſt, yet tolde him (as great Mens reckonings vſually are made) that they were of the rate appointed: wherewith the King was very well pleaſed, and diſburſed that great Price to fulfill his owne pride.

(37) His Couetouſneſſe what it was, may hence appeare, that when two Monkes whoſe Abbat was lately dead, repaired to his Court, and each in large offers out-uied and ouerbad the other, to ſucceed in the Abbacie; a third Monke very ſober, and poore in ſhew, accompanying them in their buſineſſe, ſtood by; whom the King asked what he would giue to be made Abbat? Nothing, ſaid the Monke; for I entred my profeſsion to be poore, and hitherto haue beene, little eſteeming the pompe or riches of the world. Then thou art the man (replied the King) and ſhalt be their Abbat, more worthy in thy pouertie, then they for their price; and ſo conferring on him that high honour, checked the others to their open infamy and reproach.

As the like he alſo did to Hugh a Norman Knight, and Souldier by profeſsion, who of a ſincere deuotion had entred the Monkiſh Order in the Monaſterie of S. Auguſtines at Canterbury, and at the death of Vido the Abbat, was but a Probationer; when comming with others to the King for the election of another, was choſen himſelfe (though ſore againſt his will) without any requeſt or proffer; whoſe penitency and vnfained humility ſo moued the King, that in this his Election he burſt foorth into teares.

(38) Other faults I grant hee is charged with, wherein we haue not and cannot vtterly acquit him: as this beſides others, that his chiefeſt Conſorts were Effeminated perſons, Ruffians and the like, and himſelfe ſaid to haue delighted continually in Adulteries, and the Company of Concubines, etiam coram Sole, ſhameleſſe and in the ſight of the Sunne; though none of them be named, nor any his illegitimate iſſue knowne; and yet onely, or eſpecially for his ſins, many ſtrange ſignes of Gods wrath are reported to haue happened in the time of his raigne.

(39) For in his ſecond yeere a terrible and moſt dreadful Earth-quake happened: And in his fourth, a vehement Lightning pierced the Steeple of the Abbey at Winſcombe, rent the beames of the roofe, caſt downe the Crucifixe, brake off his right legge, and withall ouerthrew the Image of our Lady ſtanding hard by, leauing ſuch a ſtench in the Church, that neither incenſe, holy-water, nor the ſinging of the Monkes could allay it. And not long after, ſo great a tempeſt of winde happened, that in London it bare downe ſixe hundred Houſes, and blew off the roofe of Bow-Church, which with the Beames were borne into the Aire a great height; ſixe whereof being twenty ſeuen foot long, with their fall were driuen twenty three foote deepe into the ground, the ſtreets of the City lying then vnpaued.

In the ninth of his Raigne a blazing Starre appeared with two buſhes, and other Starres ſeemed to ſhoote darts each againſt others, to no little feare and amazement of the beholders. The laſt of his Raigne, the Sea breaking ouer his limited banks, drowned an innumerable multitude of people in many Countries, and in Kent ouerwhelmed the lands that ſometime were Earle Goodwins, which as yet are called Goodwins Sands, lying very dangerous for all Nauigators. But moſt fearefull was the Wel of blood, which for fifteene daies roſe vp out of the ground at Finchamſted neere Abington in Barkeſhire. on the floore; as likewiſe that Monks, who in his ſleepe ſaw the Crucifixe to ſpurne the King to the ground: theſe with many like, were held as preſages of his death, which preſently followed. Of al which, or the moſt part, what better cenſure can wee giue, then that which King William himſelfe (when this laſt viſion was told him) did deliuer; ſaying, Well, a Monke he is, and can dreame (Monachiliter) as Monkes vſe to doe, onely for to gaine. Giue him an hundred ſhillings, leſt he ſhould thinke he had dreamed bootleſſe.

(40) Whatſoeuer force thoſe preſages had, it is true, that vpon the ſecond day of Auguſt, as he was hunting in the new Forreſt, and in the place called Chorengham, all his Company being ſcattered from him, ſauing onely a French Knight, whoſe name was Walter Tirrell, the King with his arrow ſtrooke a Stag, which yet not greatly hurt ranne away; to marke therefore the courſe that it tooke, he held vp his hand betwixt his eie and the Sunne, when vnawares alſo Walter Tirrell ſo ſhot, that his Arrow glancing againſt a tree, ſtrooke the King in his breſt, who haſtily breaking off ſo much as ſtucke out of his body, with one onely groane fell downe and died. Of which ſudden chance, his followers ſoone vnderſtanding, moſt of them made away, but thoſe few which remained, laid his body (baſely God wot, but as neceſsity ſuffered) into a Colliers Cart, which drawne with one ſilly leane Beaſt, through a very foule and filthy way, the Cart broke, and there lay the ſpectacle of worldly glory, both pittifully goared, and filthily bemired, til afterward he was thence conuaied vnto Wincheſter, and buried vnder a plaine flat Marble ſtone in the Quire of Saint Swithens, the Cathedrall Church of the City, whoſe bones were ſince taken vp, and laid into a Coffer, with the bones of Canutus. HEnry, the yongeſt ſonne of the Conquerour and third King of his race, was born heere in England, and brought vp in learning euē frō his child-hood, whereby hee gained to himſelfe the high honour very rare in thoſe daies, eſpecially in Princes, to be, and to bee ſtiled the Beauclerk: whoſe portion of Treaſure was not a little, giuen him by his father, neither any whit ſpared by himſelfe to purchaſe friends at the death of his Brother, * Henry of Newburgh the right Noble, vertuous and learned Earle of Warwicke, euer making his way both with the Clergy and Nobles, who * refuſed to admit any King but with capitulation and couenants to their owne likings.

(2) The ſteps then by which hee mounted the Throne of Maieſty, were the diſlikes of Williams ouer-hard curbing of his Natiues, as he euer called the Engliſh: the raſh and giddy head of his brother Robert; his abſence in Syria, for whoſe returne to ſtay was dangerous, and whoſe election for King of Ieruſalem, was likely to imploy his perſon there: his Engliſh-birth, hauing both a King and Queene to his Parents; his faire promiſes for reformation of bad and rigorous Lawes, impoſed by his Father and Brother; the reſtoring of the Clergy from exile, and to their Church-Liuings; remiſsion of Taxes exacted on the Subiects; and due puniſhments of ſuch perſons as were the chiefe Cauſers thereof, in which behalfe to ſatisfie the People hee committed Ralphe Biſhop of Durham to the Tower. Then promiſing by Oath to frame iuſt Lawes grounded on thoſe of Saint Edward (then which nothing was more deſired) did winde himſelfe ſo farre into the loues of all, that with a generall concurrence he was ſaluted King.

(3) He began his raigne the ſecond of Auguſt, the ſacred rites of whoſe Coronation were celebrated at Weſtminſter, by Maurice Biſhop of London (in the abſence of Anſelme Archbiſhop of Canterbury) the fifth day of the ſame moneth, the yeere of Chriſt 1100. When Henry the fourth poſſeſſed the Imperiall Diadem, Philip the firſt ſwaied the Scepter of France, Edgar wore the Crowne of Scotland, and Paſchall the ſecond ſate in the See of Rome.

(4) His firſt buſineſſe was to put in execution what he had promiſed; and becauſe hee might be thought vnfit to guide a large kingdome, who cannot reforme thoſe who are euer at his elbow, began (as a good Prince ought) with his owne Court and Houſhold (as knowing that to be the paterne and warrant of others enormities) whence he caſhiered al Court-minions and nice or effeminate wantons, and enacting a decree againſt his Courtiers Rapines, Adulteries and Robberies, puniſhed their Thefts with * death, and Lechery with the *loſſe of their Eies, and other parts peccant.

Then he reſtored to the Engliſh the vſe of Lights, which his father forbad by the ringing of a Bell, and had now continued for the ſpace of thirty three yeeres, ordaining likewiſe many good Lawes, and common Liberties, exemplified at large in Mathew Paris, which ſummarily may be thus abridged.

1 The Freedome of the Church from oppreſſions, or reſeruation of their Poſſeſſions vpon vacancies.

2 That the Heires of his Nobility ſhould poſſeſſe the Lands of their Fathers, without redemption from him, which fauour the Nobles likewiſe ſhould afford to their Tenants.

3 That the Gentry might giue in Mariage their Daughters and Kinſwomen without his licence, ſo it were not to his Enemy.

4 That the widow ſhould haue her Iointer, and not be compelled to marry againſt her owne liking.

5 That the Mother or next of kindred, ſhall be Guardian of the Lands of her Children.

6 *That Coiners of falſe money ſhould bee * puniſhed; and likewiſe ordained a meaſure to the length of his * Arme to be a ſtandard for Commerce among his People.*

7 Then did he forgiue all debts to the Crowne before his owne time, and murthers committed before the day of his Coronation: with ſome other like indulgences: But, to the greateſt content of the People, hee gaue power and ſtrength vnto King Edwards Lawes.

(5) To theſe his Ordinances he ſet his Name and Seale, with the ſubſcription of ſundry Peeres, commanding as many Copies as there were Counties in England to be tranſcribed and kept in the Monaſteteries of euery Prouince. Then did he recall Anſelm Archbiſhop of Canterbury forced out of the Land by Rufus, and beſtowed all vacant Church-liuings vpon the worthieſt perſons. But to ground his new planted affection more deepe in the hearts of the Engliſh, he became a ſuter to Edgar King of Scotland, to haue his ſiſter to wife, which was Maude the daughter of Queen Margaret, Siſter to Edgar Etheling and Grandchild of Edmund Ironſide, whereby his iſſue might meerely be both of the Engliſh blood and of the ancient Engliſh Kings.

(5) Shee by report of ſome writers had vowed Virginity, and was brought vp in a houſe of Religion at Wincheſter (hauing entred the profeſsion of a Nun vnder her Aunte Chriſtian) whoſe ſanctity and knowledge both in matters humane and diuine, with her mother Margarets, are highly commended (ſaith Gemeticenſis) in a book written of their liues: Notwithſtanding others hold that ſhe vailed her ſelfe but for a ſhift, to put off ſome vnworthy matches, which her father Malcolme would haue impoſed her; and indeed this ſcruple was ſuch a Core in Anſelm his mouth that he would not pronounce the words of Contract vntil her ſelfe had cleared the doubt by her open confeſſion.

(7) Duke Robert, who now had bin fiue yeres in the holy warres, and therin borne himſelfe with ſuch valour that he of all the Chriſtian Princes was thought the worthieſt to bee annointed King of Ieruſalem, had their voice and election ſtanding in the Temple before the Altar, vpon Eaſter-Eue: and that the rather by a miracle of his Taper, which tooke light of it ſelfe, or from Heauen (if wee will be ſo light to beleeue it:) but he hearing of the death of Rufus, refuſed that, in hope to haue England; for which his neglect of Diuine appointment, it is ſaid God neuer after proſpered him: then returning from Syria into Normandy was there ioifully receiued, and aſſumed a-again his Dukedome (which he had engaged to his brother William) without repaiment of any mony: where hearing that Henry his yonger, was ſtept into his throne of England, laid proiects in his minde how to defeate him. And to further theſe his deſignes, Ralphe Biſhop of Durham, corrupting his keepers, brake out of the Tower of London & gat into Normandy, where he inſtigated Duke Robert againſt his brother of England; others alſo delighting in alterations, ſolicited Robert to make into England, with promiſe of their aſsiſtance to recouer the Crowne.

(9) Duke Robert by this time had taken the Seas, and was vpon the Kings fleete before they were aware, where preparing for Conflict, the moſt of the Engliſh fell to the Normans, either by the perſwaſion of the Duke or in hatred of Henry, that then began to tyrannize ouer them as they did imagine: By which meanes the Duke, had ſafe landing at Porteſmouth, and did not a little reioice in this his fortunate beginnings; threatning his brother to be reuēged for his wrongs, & blaming the Nobility for ſuffering him thus to be abuſed, whilſt he for the common good of Chriſtendome, was imploied in the Holy-Lands warre. King Henry, as wiſe, as the other was valorous, wrought vnder hand for an agreement of peace; for hee very well ſaw, that the euent of warre hath commonly iſſue from the firſt ſucceſſe, and at one and the ſame time doth bolden and weaken the courage of the multitude; therefore certaine Noblemen on both ſides ſo trauiſed the buſineſſes, that the Brethren in ſhort time became friends, and a compoſition made to both their contents. The agreement was thus, that, becauſe Henry was borne after his fathers Conqueſt of this Land, and ſtood now the Crowned King with common conſent, hee ſhould during his life, enioy the ſame, paying Duke Robert in way of fealty three thouſand Markes by yeere: and the ſurniuour to be heire to his brother deceaſed, if hee died without a ſonne. In which it was alſo concluded, that all, either Engliſh or Normans, which had taken part with the King or Duke, ſhould be pardoned of all offences, and their Liuings againe reſtored: for the Confirmation whereof, and the performance accordingly, twelue Princes vpon either parties took their Corporall Oathes; and the Armies preſently diſſolued.

(13) Neither were thoſe men buſier to raiſe ſtirs abroad, then was Archbiſhop Anſelmus to doe it at home; who being a man of a ſtiffe reſolution, in a Councell holden at London, drew on him the offence both of the King and Clergie: for therein, firſt, he excommunicated all married Prieſts, * halfe the Clergie of England at that time, being either maried or the ſons of married Prieſts; next he inhibited all lay men to heare their maſſes. In this Councell alſo Anſelme, peremptory vpon the Popes aſsiſtance, depriued many great Prelates of their promotions, becauſe they had accepted their Inueſtures from the King which was done by receiuing of a Paſtorall ſtaffe and a ring, an ancient rite, teſtifying that their donation was from their Soueraigne, (as S. Wulſtan receiued his Staffe from S. Edward, and therefore profeſſed hee would reſigne it onely to him:) in which number were the Abbots of Ely, of Ramſey, of Perſcors, of *S. (15) Robert Curtuiſe, either to ſound his brothers deſignes, or to congratulate him in a brotherly loue, came into England; where hee was ſo roially entertained, that all ſuſpition was quenched, and himſelfe ſo well contented, that at the onely motion and requeſt of Queene Maud, he remitted the three thouſand Marks, couenanted to bee paid yeerely vnto him, though he were leſſe able to forbeare, then King Henry to giue. But when his wants told him of this his ouer lauiſh releaſement, he openly exclaimed againſt King Henry, that hee had craftily circumuented, and deceitfully cheated him; and now giuing open eare and credit to ſuch as ſought their diſunion, gaue his Brother all occaſions of enmity, who was ready enough of himſelfe, to make the leaſt very great. For beſides this preſent diſpleaſure conceiued againſt Duke Robert, he added others, and this eſpecially, that he had wilfully waſted the Inheritance which his father had left him, to wit the Dukedom of Normandy, hauing nothing now almoſt in that Dominion beſides the City of Roane, which he would haue parted with alſo, had not the Cittizens thereto denied their conſents.

(16) Neither was it the leaſt motiue to King Henries diſpleaſure, that his traiterous ſubiects were ſo willingly receiued by his brother; for beſides Robert Beliaſme and others, William, Earle of Mortaigne in Normandy, and of Cornwall in England, the ſonne of Robert, halfe brother to the Conquerour, becauſe the Earledome of Kent (which he made claime vnto, as heire to his vnkle Odo) was denied him, in a diſcontent got him into Normandy, where beſides his valiant aſſaults of the Kings Caſtles, and Souldiers, hee much endangered the poſſeſsions of Richard Earl of Cheſter, then a child and the Kings Warde: ſo that the flames of warre raiſed by theſe ſeditions, ſeemed to be blown from England vnto the parts beyond the Seas, and to fire the territories of the Engliſh there; neither is it eaſie to declare (ſaith Houeden) what miſery (the meane while) by exactions the land felt here at home.

(17) For the King incited into Normandy vpon theſe occaſions, by large diſtributions of money carried out of England, wonne the Normane Nobility to reuolt from their Lord, and tooke the Towne and Caſtle of Cane by compoſition, and burnt Bayon with the beautifull Church of Saint Maries, whereupon the Priories of Normandy yeelded themſelues vnto his Protection; by whoſe example the Britaines and thoſe of Anion did the like; ſo that their Caſtles and forts were filled with the Garriſons of King Henry, Duke Robert in no wiſe able to reſiſt; which done Henry with triumph returned into England.

(18) The Curtuoiſe by his Normans thus vncourteouſly dealt with, ſaw it was booteleſſe againſt ſo great a ſtreame to ſtriue, and therefore thought beſt to lay away weapons, and to become himſelfe a Mediatour for Peace. With which reſolution taking the ſeas, hee followed his brother vnto Northampton; where humbling himſelfe in a more deiectiue manner, then either his birth, or owne nature could well brooke, deſired the Kings peace, both in reſpect of their brotherly vnion, and the regard of his owne accuſtomed clemency; willing him to conſider, that warre was not only vnnaturall betwixt brethren, but that a reproch euer followes the chariot of the Victor, deſiring him not to triumph in his ouerthrow, who was now ready to render all that he had into his hands: but King Henry muttering to himſelfe, turned away from his brother without any anſwere.

(19) For God (ſaith Paris) not pleaſed to giue the effect, though the Beau-clearke felt a remorſe in conſcience, for vſurping his Kingdome (being indeed very learned, and well vnderſtanding the duties both of equity and law) and thereupon beganne both to feare ſome violent inſurrection of the ſubiects, and alſo the reuenging wrath of God vpon him, for his trecherous and vniuſt dealings towards his elder brother, to whom vndoubtedly the

Kingdome

Kingdome by all right did appertaine: yet stood hee rather in feare of men then God (whose favours he cunningly laboured to keepe) whom he meant to please another time by building of an Abbey for his satisfaction. Duke Robert then seeing and detesting the Kings swolne pride, posted backe vnto Normandy to gather his powers. Henry also held it good policy, not to giue passage vnto Roberts wrath, knowing him a Souldier, and well waying his desperate estate: and therefore calling his Lords vnto London, in an assembly tickled their eares with these delectable and smooth words.

"(20) My friends, and faithful Counsellors, and "natiue Countrimen, you know by true report "how my Brother Robert was elected, and by God "himselfe called to be the fortunate King of Ierusa- "lem, and how vnfortunately, or rather insolently, he "refused that sacred estate, whereby hee is now most "iustly reprobated of God: you also know by many "other experiments, his pride and arrogancy; for be- "ing a man of a warring humor, hee is not onely im- "patient of any peace, but also wilfully desireth to "trample vpon you as men of abiect and contemp- "tible disposition, vpbraiding you for idle droanes, "for belly-gods, and what not? But I your King, na- "turally inclined to bee both humble and peaceable, "take delight in nothing more then to do you good, "to maintaine your tranquillity and ancient liber- "ties, (as I haue often sworn vnto you,) and meeke- "ly and willingly to yeeld my selfe to your aduises, "whereby I may circumspectly gouerne you as a "clement Prince: and to that end euen now will "I confirme (if your wisedomes so thinke fit) your "ouer-worne and vndermined Charters, and will "roborate them most firmely with a new oath and "ratification. Meane while, all the lawes which the "holy King Edward by Gods inspiring did esta- "blish, I doe here commaund to bee inuiolably "obserued, hereby to moue you to adhere stedfastly "vnto mee, in repulsing cheerefully, willingly, and "powerfully, the wrongs offered me, by my brother "shal I say? nay, by my most deadly enemy & yours, and of the whole English Nation: For if I bee guar- "ded with the valours and affections of Englishmen, "I shall scorne the threates of him and his Nor- "mans, as forceleese, and no whit to bee feared. And with these faire promises (which yet afterwards hee vtterly neglected) hee so wonne the hearts of them all, that they would die with him, or for him, against any hostility whatsoeuer.

(21) Duke Robert gone, and preparing for warre, Henry thus setled in his peoples affection, followed him with all expedition, hauing in his company the choice Nobility of England, Normandy, Gaunt, and Britaine, so that hee was exceedingly strong. With Robert, for men of chiefe account, were Robert Beliasme, Earle of Shrewsburie, and William Earle of Mortaigne, in like displeasure with the King, and therefore armed with the like desperate boldnes.

(22) Henry with his Army had pierced into Normandy, euen as farre as * Tenerchebray, a Castle of the Earle of Mortaigne, vsing all meanes possible to surprise the same; for whose rescue, the Duke with these his Consorts, made all diligence to dissolue the siege, and after some few skirmishes ioined a bloody battaile, brauely fought on each part, where at the first onset, the Kings power (though much greater in number) went down; but by their multitude and manhood (especially through the * Kings example and encouragement) they soone preuailed; where Duke Robert, with Earle William, and sundry others of good note, manfully fighting in the very presse of their enemies, were taken prisoners; but * Robert Beliasme escaped by flight. And thus (as Mathew Paris obserued) Gods Iustice & Mercy tooke effect; his Iustice vpon Robert, for his refusall of Ierusalems title, and vnto Henry his fauour, according to the propheste of King William his Father. This battaile was fought, and Normandy wonne, vpon Saturday, being the Vigill of S. Michael, euen the same day forty yeares that William the Bastard set foot on Englands Shoare for his Conquest; God so disposing (saith Malmsbury) that Normandy should be subiected to England that very day, wherein England was subdued to Normandy.

Normandy conquered. Will. Malmesb.

(23) Robert Curtuaise, that now vnfortunate Prince, and William Mortaigne, that valiant, but headstrong Earle, were forthwith sent into England and imprisoned; the Earle in the Tower of London, and the Duke in Cardiffe Castle in Wales, after he had gouerned the Dutchy of Normandy nineteen yeeres; and was for esteeme in Chiualrie accounted among the best Captains that the world then afforded, had hee not beene (as commonly martiall spirits vse to be) too rash and vnstaied in his other enterprises; which headinesse did now draw vpon him a penance of twenty sixe yeeres continuance, in the afflicted state of a forlorne Captiue. And Henry now no longer as a brother, receiuing the keyes of Normandy, as a Conquerour returned into England.

Roberts rashnesse ouerthrew him.

(24) But long it was not ere Duke Robert, weary of this vnwonted duresse, sought to escape; and hauing liberty to walke in the Kings Meadowes, Forrests, and Parkes, brake from his Keepers without any Assisters, or meanes for security; who being mist, was presently pursued, and taken in a quag-mire, wherein his Horse lay fast: whereupon the King hearing of this his attempt, considering that woods were no walles to restraine the fierce Lyon, and that to play with his claw was to endanger a state, commanded him not onely a greater restraint and harder durance; but also (a thing vnfit for a brother to suffer, but most vnworthy for Beauclearke to act) both his eyes to bee put out, causing his head to be held in a burning bason (to auoid the deformity of breaking the eye-bals) vntill the glassie tunicles had lost the office of retaining their light.

Which proiect nothing deceiued his expectation; for by the testimony of Giraldus, They were a Colony stout and strong, and continually endured the warres of the Welsh; *a Nation most accustomed to seeke gaine by cloathing, by triffique also and Marchandize by Sea and Land, vndertaking any paines, or perils whatsoeuer. (30) The Kings peace, which seemed to be secured by his new affinity with the Emperour, and his glory raised to the high, began now to bee enuied, and his brother Duke Roberts extremities greatly to be pitied, both by some English and also Normans. For Foulke Earle of Anion both threatned the reuenge, and by corrupting the inhabitants wanne the City of Constance, from his obeisance. To stay whose irruptions King Henry passed into Normandy, where hee vsed great extremity, and put to death Helia Earle of Cenomania, who held that County against him; for which cause Godfrey Earle of Gaunt tooke such displeasure that hee entred into that Earledome, and marrying the said Helia his daughter, kept the County perforce against King Henries great power. But Robert de Belsasme that had escaped at Duke Roberts ouerthrow, was then taken and committed prisoner to Wigham Castle, too gentle a punishment for so blood-thirstie a man, whose nature was such, that he delighted himselfe onely in cruelty, an example whereof hee shewed vpon his owne sonne, who being but a childe and playing with him, the father for a pastime, put his thumbes in the boies eyes, and thrust out the balles thereof.

(32) The King had not beene long in England after his returne from Normandy, before the Welshmen (then a restlesse people) were in Armes against such English, as had set footing in that Country, which were Gilbert Strangbowe Earle of Strygil, and others, whose lands in the south part Owen ap Cadogan sore molested and spoiled; the like did Gruffith ap Conan Prince of North-Wales vpon Hugh Earle of Chesters County, and both of them denied King Henry either seruice or tribute. These Earles so incensed the King, touching these and other outrages of the Welshmen, that in a rage he vowed not to leaue one aliue in al North-Wales, nor in Powys-land; and straight repairing thitherward, diuided his Armie into 3. parts. The first was led by Earle Gilbert against South-wales; the second band by Alexander King of Scotland, and Hugh Earle of Chester against North-Wales; and the King himselfe lead the third, vnder whose Standard was the chiefe strength of middle England. But the Welsh seeing themselues far vnable to withstand this present preparation, tooke into the Mountaines and Woods, (their surest holds) where being followed, with great difficulty, many of them were slaine, and the rest yeelded to King Henry; who now as a Conquerour in triumph returned to London.

(33) Whither immediately resorted vnto him, the Ambassadour of his sonne in law the Emperour, to haue his wife Lady Maud now marriage-able, to be sent vnto him; to which request the King most willingly condescended, and to furnish her forth accordingly, laid a *taxe vpon his Subiects, taking three shillings for euery Hide of land: whereupon shee was presently conducted by his greatest Peares into Germany, and at Mentz married to the Emperour Henry the fourth, being there consecrated and crowned his Empresse.

(34) Shortly after King Henry tooke the Seas for Normandy, and there created his sonne William (about the age of twelue yeeres (Houeden saith but eight) Duke of that Country, causing the people to sweare him fealty, whereof grew a custome that thenceforth the Kings of England made euermore their eldest sonnes Dukes of Normandy; which done, he returned, and nothing recorded of his next yeres aduentures, but onely that the Sea gaue place to the Sands, and by low Ebbes restored some part of her treasures that long had laien hid and buried in her depth; the riuers likewise forgat their wonted swiftnes; and as it were seemed vnwilling to pay their ancient tribute into that deiected Element, and among them Thamesis not the least, whose waters so failed for two daies, that betwixt London Bridge and the Tower she became passable and scarse two foot deepe.

(35) King Henry free now from all forraine & domesticall trouble (onely Gruffith ap Rees somewhat vnquiet in Wales) gaue his thoughts to assure the Crowne into his line, and to ordaine lawes for the well gouerning of his people; for calling an assembly at Salisbury, caused the Estates both Spirituall and Temporall, to sweare fealty to himselfe, and to to his ſonne William, the Hope of ſucceſsion: then reforming many abuſes, and ending certaine contentions both of his Nobles and Prelates, laid here the firſt foundation of our High Court of Parliament: for the Engliſh Kings in elder times, ordered the affaires of the Common-wealth, by their Edicts, by their officers, and by the Gouernours of euerie Country, and ſeldome had the ioint aduice of their people; ſauing onely at beginning of their gouernment, and in time of warre; whereas now the Subiect, beſt vnderſtanding his owne grieuances, hath both liberty in choice of their Knights and Burgeſſes, as alſo free voice to complaine thereof in that honourable aſſembly.

(36) At this time Theobald Earle of Bleſſis, Nephew vnto King Henry, vpon occaſion of diſpleaſure roſe vp in Armes againſt the French King, to whoſe aid King Henry ſent; whereat Lewes found himſelfe ſore agrieued, and drew to his ſide Baldwine Earle of Flanders, and Foulke Earle of Anion, who together tooke oath to diſpoſſeſſe Henry of Normandy, and to make William the ſonne of the Curtoiſe Duke thereof, to whom it belonged by right and deſcent; to which alſo many of the Nobles of Normandy conſented; pittying the wrong of the noble ſpirited Child, and the wretched captiuity of the blind, and ouer-borne Father.

(37) Henry as wiſely wrought againſt their deſignes, and leauying a great taxe vpon his Subiects, paſſeth therewith into Normandy, where vniting the aides of the foreſaid Theobald, as alſo of the Earle of Britaine, with his Engliſh, hee made a great ſhew in the field: at which time King Lewes with the Earles of Flanders and Anion being entred Normandy, and hearing of King Henries approch and power, ſtaid ſcarſly one night, but as mē without hart or courage returned, and left the Country for him: ſo that all things ſeemed well quieted for a yeare or two; nothing diſturbing King Henries peace, excepting only the expectance of the Popes Legate, whom hee prohibited to enter England, and the death of his Queene Maud, the very mirrour of piety, humility, and princely bounty.

(38) But coales of diſpleaſure kindled betwixt King Henry and Lewes of France, were not quite extinct, though they had laine for a while, as raked vp vnder cold aſhes. For the next yeere following, and twentieth of his raigne, Lewes came into Normandy as hote in rage to do ſomwhat, as before he departed thence calme and cold; where forthwith he began to moleſt the Country; which K. Henry for a while ſuffered, till his friends noted him of cowardize; to "whom he replied; that he had learned of his Father, to "breake the foole hardines of the French, by patience, rather "then by force: that they ſhould not wonder, if he "were loath to bee prodigall of their bloud, whom "he found ſo faſt friends vnto him: that he would "not gladly winne a Kingdome with their deathes, "whoſe liues hee ſtill found deuoted to all hazards "for his cauſe: that hee vſed this backwardneſſe, "onely to ſtay them, whom he ſaw ſo forward to te"ſtifie their zeale voluntarily, euen with their blood: "which to proceed from prouidence, and not from "daſtardlineſſe, they ſhould ſoone perceiue. This accordingly hee made good; and a pitched field was fought betwixt the Kings of England and France; whereof let vs heare the Monke Paris report. The French King (ſaith hee) hauing ordered his Armie into two Battalions, in the former of them placed William the ſonne of Duke Robert, the brother of King Henry; the other, Lewes himſelfe led, conſiſting of his ſpeciall and chiefeſt Souldiers. King Henry alſo diſpoſed his forces into three Battailes, the firſt, conſiſting of his Peeres and men of Normandy: In the ſecond, himſelfe kept among his owne guard, and dailie attendants: and in the third, he marſhalled his ſonnes with the maine ſtrength of the Footemen. The Armies thus ordered, the troupes on both ſides gaue aſſault, whereof the firſt Battalion of the French brake through the rankes of the Norman Nobles, ouerthrowing their Horſe-men, and forcing them to ſcatter; in which violence they likewiſe brake into King Henries battaile, and put it much out of order: but he taking courage, and comforting his men beganne a moſt bloody and bold conflict: wherein himſelfe was twice ſtrooke vpon the head by William Criſpin County of Eureux (whom for his offences Henry had before baniſhed) whoſe ſword and ſtrokes were ſo ſure and ſo heauie, that albeit the Kings helmet was impenetrable, yet with ſine force was it beaten flat to his head, inſomuch that the bloud came forth in abundance: but Henry feeling himſelfe to bee wounded, gathered with his rage more ſtrength, and ſtroke the ſaid County in ſuch ſort, that at one blow he ouerthrew both him and his horſe, and tooke him priſoner; by which example his Souldiers were led to fight like Lyons, and the French to betake themſelues vnto flight. In this battaile died many thouſands, and among them Baldwine Earle of Flanders: King Henry returning victorious, was receiued triumphantly into Roan.

(39) Foulke Earle of Anion hauing loſt Baldwine his martiall Companion, and ſeeing it was bootles to bandy againſt the Beauclarke, fell to an agreement with him, which was confirmed by giuing his daughter vnto his ſonne Prince William (now ſeauenteene yeerts old) whom Henry made inheritor of all his Kingdomes, whereupon both France and Flanders became his reconciled friends, and William did homage to King Lewes for his Dutchie of Normandy. Theſe things thus ordered King Henrie vpon the twentie fift of Nouember, looſed from land at * Barfluit, and proſperouſly arriued in England.

(40) Prince William, who now wanted but onely the name of a King, commanded another ſhippe to bee prepared for himſelfe, his Brethren and Siſters, with many other Nobles and Gallants Courtiers, both of England and Normandy, who plying the Mariners with pots and wine (therein being inſtruments of their owne calamity approaching) made them bragge to out-ſaile the Kings ſhip gone before; and in the night putting forth from land, with a mery gale made way ouer the dancing waues, as ſwift as an arrow: but (as if the Heauens would haue King Henries too great felicities allaid, and tempered with ſenſe of Courtly variety, in the middeſt of their iollity and ſinging, (alas they ſang their laſt, and little thought on death) for ſuddainely the ſhippe daſhed againſt a Rocke, not very farre from the Shoare, at which fearefull diſaſter, a hideous cry aroſe, all of them ſhifting (and yet through amazedneſſe not knowing how to ſhift) to ſaue themſelues from the danger: For God repaying the reward for ſinne, ſuffered not thoſe * vnnaturall wantons (for ſuch were many of them, ſaith Paris) to haue Chriſtian Buriall, but were ſo ſwallowed vp of the Sea, when her waues were moſt calme. Prince William got ſpeedily into the Cocke-boate, and might well haue eſcaped, had he not pitied his ſiſter the Counteſſe of Perche, crying vnto him for helpe; when turning the boat to her aid, ſo many ſtriued to get in (euery man in ſuch a caſe eſteeming his life as much as a Prince) that with their weight it preſently ſuncke, and of ſo princely a Traine no one eſcaped to relate that dolefull tragedie, ſaue onely a baſe fellow (a Butcher ſome ſay) who ſwamme all the night vpon the Maine-maſte, and got ſhoare in the morning with much danger of life.

(41) This was the moſt vnfortunate Shipwracke that euer hapned in our Seas, bringing an inconceiuable heauineſſe to the King, and whole State: for therein periſhed Prince William Duke of Normandy, the ioy of his Father, and hope of his Nation; Richard his baſe Brother, his Siſter Maud Counteſſe of Perch, Richard Earle of Cheſter, with his wife Lady Lucy, the Kings Niece by his Siſter Adela, Otwell the Earles Brother, the yong Dukes Gouernour, diuers of the Kings chiefe Officers, and moſt of the Princes, Geffrey Riddle, Robert Manduit, William

* Paris An. 1113. Rome sub Vrbano. Anno 1094. * Paris there cals it Their ancient Custome and An. 1 12. it had continued 200. yeres and vnder 60. Popes.

(43) Whether it were about this contention of Inuesting, or about a Fryer of the Holy Sepulchre, whom (as Malmsb. saith) the King had imprisoned, or about Thurstans hard vsage; certaine it is, that the Pope much desiring to haue priuate talke with the King, came to him into Normandy, and so at Gisors conferred (saith Paris) the Great King and the high Priest: but notwithstanding the Popes threates or intreates, Thurstan was kept in banishment full fiue yeares, and then for the Popes pleasure was restored. But at this meeting the King was so liberall of rich gifts to the Pope and his Cardinals, that therfore the Pope (saith a Monke) held him a most wise and eloquent perswader, and his actions very iustifiable: But it seemeth the Cardinals were neither so eloquent nor learned as they should be, for that (saith hee) two youthes in the Kings Company, sonnes of the Earle of Mellent (learned both, and therefore fitte to be with that learned King) reasoning of some points with them, and disputing Scholler-like with Logicall Syllogismes, the Grãd Rabbies (vsed to other exercises at Rome, then studying) were quite grauelled, and had nought to say, but that more learning was in these Westerne parts, then they had thought. But as these Church-stirres did not a little disquiet the King, so also did new Welsh tumults, raised by Meredith ap Blethyn, who with the three sonnes of Cadogin, Eneon, Madoc, and Morgan, sore troubled the Kings people and peace, by breaking into the Marches, and especially into Cheshire, where they burned two Castles. The King therefore making towards them, had sent his maine Armie to conduct the Carriages, whilst himselfe with a small Company tooke a neerer way through the Mountaines and Straites; which being forelaid by the Enemy, was with great courage set vpon, and through the aduantage of the Place, many of his men slaine, and more hurt, by the Welsh Archers, whose showers of Arrowes rained thicke vpon them from the higher ground: amongst which, one was so levelled at the King, that it strucke him on the breast, yet being surely armed, did him no hurt; but hee therewith all wonderfully dismaied, and by likelihoode fearing some treason amongst his owne, (for, then hee swore by our Lords death, his vsuall oath, that no Welsh-man shotte that Arrow, but one of his owne Prouincials) and considering that by these his ouer-rash proceedings his glory purchased in more famous parts, might againe bee lost in this wild and rude Country; came to a Parley & Peace; receiuing of the King a thousand head of Cattle, and leauing Kord Fitzwarren Lieutenant of the Marches, returned to England, where hee held three Parliaments in the same yeare, one at Norwich, another at Northampton, and the third at London.

Chron. Wallie

New attempts in Wales

An Army conducted against them.

(44) The Normans still repining at the Captiuity of Robert their late Duke; and standing well affected vnto his Sonne, thought now the time fitting, (Prince William being dead) to raise the other William his Cosen Germane into his place: who, as the Monke of Chester affirmeth, married Sybil the other daughter of Foulke, Earle of Aniou, with whom hee receiued the Earledome of Cenomannia, vpon displeasure that King Henry withheld the formers dowry in England. The chiefe in this action was Robert Earle of Mellent, who was lately fallen off from the King: Henry therefore hasting into Normandy, besieged his Castle Pont-Audomar, and tooke it, and at that time built a large and high wall with many Bulwarkes about the Tower of Roan, repaired the Castles of Caen, Arches, Gisors, Faleise, Argenton, Damfort, Vernon, Ambres, and sundry others.

(45) In the meane time, Earle Mellent desirous to bee reuenged vpon the King, associated Hugh Earle of Montfort and others vnto his aide, who entring Normandy with fire and sword, did much harme as they went, thinking to bring all to their obeisance: against whose outrages, William Tankeruile the Kings Chamberlaine, and Lieutenant in those parts, addressed himselfe, and training them into danger of an Ambush, laid for that purpose, after long fight tooke them both prisoners, and presented them to his Master, whereby the warres ceased for a time in those parts.

(46) In this the Kings absence, but yet with his licence, Iohannes Cremensis the Popes holy Cardinal, came into England, sent by Honorius the Second, there to redresse the still continued sinne-seeming abuse of the Clergy, in retaining and vsing, according to Gods owne Ordinance, the Society of their wiues. This Pontificall Prelate was entertained by all the Bishops and Abbots with great and costly Presents, and afterward being solemnely set in a Councell at London, vpon the birth-day of the Blessed Virgine, made a soleme Oration in praise of Virginitie and Chastity, with a terrible inuectiue against the maried Priests: and to amplifie their sinnes the more, hee shewed what extreme impiety it was, to rise from the bed of vnlawfull lust, (for so was their chaste Marriage termed) and with polluted hands to touch the Sacrament of the body of Christ: but the same night following he * hauing that very day consecrated that holy Sacrament, was himself taken with a Whore, the matter being so apparant, that it could not bee hid, (neither ought it to be silenced, saith Huntingdon) to the great reproach of those most vnchaste boasters of Chastitie, as both Paris and Higden themselues doe confesse: and so hee returned to Rome with shame enough, but with little successe in that intended businesse; till some few yeers after * King Henrie, seeming very desirous to settle his pretensed continency in the Clergy; in a Councel held at London, obtained (through simplicity of the Archbishop of Canterbury, saith Paris) that himselfe shold haue the execution of iustice and punishments of the Priests, that offended either in keeping of their wiues, or vsing of Concubines, (for likely those that liked not the one, loued the other, as well as Cremenſis;) but euen then alſo, the Kings end being onely to get in ſummes of money, which hee had ſtill occaſions to vſe, euery man redeemed his liberty by his purſe, and matters rather proued worſe, then any whit reformed.

(47) Whileſt King Henry about his ſaid affaires lay in Normandy, newes was brought him that Henry the Emperour his ſonne in law was dead; whereupon hee preſently ſent for his Daughter the Empreſſe; and with her he returned into England, where calling a Parliament, in the preſence of himſelfe, and of Dauid King of Scotland, hee cauſed the Nobles, (and firſt before all other, Stephen his Siſters Sonne who firſt did violate it,) to ſweare fealty to her, as to his lawfull, and now onely heire, by whom they ſhould againe come to bee gouerned by the ancient Engliſh Roiall bloud, from which he ſhewed her to bee deſcended: which Oath was this, that they ſhould, as much as in them lay, after King Henries deceaſe, (if hee died without Heire-Male) eſtabliſh her Queene of the Monarchy of Great Britaine, now called England. But whether they did or no (ſaith Gemeticenſis) belongs not to mee to tell: but this our Story ſhall hereafter relate, and make knowne.

(48) Giraldus and Higden, and ſome ancient Manuſcripts affirme (but with very little probability or credite) that Henry the Emperour died not at this time (as was giuen forth;) but that rather vpon a * remorſe of conſcience, for impriſoning his owne naturall Father, Henry the third vnto death; and alſo his Spirituall Father the Pope with his Cardinals; repenting theſe outrages, hee laid aſide his Imperiall Roabe, and ſecretly fled into England, where at Weſtcheſter hee became an Hermite, changing his name vnto * Godſcall, where he ſo liued the ſpace of ten yeeres, and was buried in the Cathedrall Church of Saint Werburga the Virgine. Vpon which his ſuddaine flight and miſsing, the Empreſſe Maud * ſome ſay, was ſuſpected to bee guilty of his death, and for that cauſe was kept continually in the Queenes Chamber Indeed, that ſhe abode ſtill in Chamber with the Queene, Paris records; but hee giues a wiſer reaſon thereof, for that her Father did loue her exceedingly, as being now his ſole Heire; and where ſhould an Empreſſe rather liue then with a Queene? a Daughter, then with her Mother? a faire Lady, a Widow, and an Heire of ſo great a Kingdom, then where her Perſon might bee ſafeſt from danger, her mind from inueigling, and her carriage from ſuſpition? But as for that other idle coniecture, it is razed out, both by thoſe Writers, who record his Buriall, and Monument at Spire, (as * Higden himſelf ſignifieth) and alſo by the penne of William Gemeticenſis, who reporteth her to be a woman generally well thought of, and approued among the greateſt Princes of the Empire, for her prudent and gratious behauiour towards the Emperour her husband; inſomuch that they became ſuiters vnto her, ſeeking by all meanes to attaine her to gouerne them, and to that end attended her to King Henry in Normandy to ſolicite the ſame; to whom in no wiſe hee would giue his conſent, meaning to make her his Succeſſor in the Kingdome: Whereunto Malmsbury (who then liued) accordeth; ſaying, ſhee was very vnwilling to haue come out of thoſe parts of the Empire, where both her dowry and acquaintance lay, and that the Princes of thoſe Countries came more then once into England, to haue her for their Empreſſe, but that the King would not part with the Heire of his Crowne.

(49) But King Henrie afterwards deſirous to bee free from the variances of theſe forraine Princes, and hearing that Foulke Earle of Anion had giuen his Earledome, with the territories of Gaunt and Turyn, vnto his Sonne Ieffrey Martell, ſurnamed Plantagenet, (himſelfe minding to abide at Ieruſalem, whereof he was King in right of his wife Miliſſent, the daughter of Baldwine de Burge lately deceaſed) thought him the fitteſt to be linked into his alliance, & therfore concluded a mariage betwixt the ſaid Ieffrey, and his onely lawfull daughter Lady Maude the Empreſſe, though partly againſt her liking, as both Gemeticenſis and Geruaſius of Canterbury doth declare; which was ſolemnized in Normandy the third of Aprill accordingly.

(50) That William, ſonne to the Curtoiſe, was formerly fauoured by Earle Foulke, wee haue ſhewed, but now he was further followed with increaſe of Fortune, and the French Kings aide, onely for a rub in King Henries way; for Charles Earle of Flanders, being traiterouſly murdered by his owne People without any his iſſue to ſucceed him, Lewis of France (to make William faſter to him) ſet him in poſſeſsion as the next heire in blood vnto that Earledome: William being the ſonne of Duke Robert, and Robert the Eldeſt of Queene Maude (the wife of the Conquerour) and ſhe daughter to Earle Baldwin the fifth; whoſe iſſue Male now failing, the right was from her deriued vnto this her Grand-child William.

William (ſonne to Duke Robert) made Earle of Flanders.

(51) This Ground-worke vnto greatneſſe King Henry diſliked, leaſt by his Nephewes height, himſelfe might bee ouer topped, and his blind fathers wrongs the ſooner redreſſed: therefore hauing by his daughters marriage made Anion his, from Normandy he inuaded France, euen vnto Heſpard, where for eight daies he remained as ſecure as in his owne Kingdome, and partly by feare, partly by faire paiments, wrought Lewis to withdraw his aide from yong William: neither ſo ceaſed, but that hee inſtigated William de Ypres to diſturbe Williams ſtate, and did alſo draw a cerraine Duke named Theodorick out of Germany with a band of Flemmings, who entred Flanders in Hoſtile maner.

(52) With theſe laſt, Earle William (a Prince for his age of imcomparable proweſſe) ſoone met, and giuing them battell, with an inuincible courage brake through the enemies troopes, in ſuch ſort that they were diſcomfited, and the Earle had the day; whence in this heate of bloud, hee marched vnto Angi, a Caſtle of King Henries, which after a ſtrong ſiege, being vpon the ſurrender, by a ſmall wound which Earle William receiued in his hand, hee ſhortly died, but not without immortall fame, for magnanimity and valour.

(53) Were it not reported by ſome Writers of note, I might here well paſſe ouer certaine preſaging dreames (as the Monkes interpreted them) which King Henry had, being ready now to goe into Normandy: for to his ſeeming he ſaw a ſort of ruſticke plough-men with their Inſtruments of husbandry; after them Souldiers with their weapons of Warre: and laſtly, the Biſhops with their Croſiers ſtaues, all of them angerly threatning, and attempting his death: wherewith hee was ſo perplexed, that leaping out of his bed, he called for helpe: but ſeeing it but a dreame, as a dreame he eſteemed it, and paſſed ouer into Normandy: where long hee ſtaied not, but that his Daughter Maud vpon ſome diſpleaſure departed from her husband, and came with her Father into England. Some write that ſhe was the prouoker of certaine diſpleaſures betwixt her husband and Father, which ſo affected his mind with paſſions of wrath and griefe, that many thought it was a great haſtning of his end; and indeede Malmsburie witneſſeth, that the King vpon his death-bed paſſionately mentioned the wrongs aud indignities wherewith her husband had diſquieted his mind. Howbeit ſoone after this her departure from him, by conſent of the States, who met at Northampton; ſhee was reconciled to her husband: ſent vnto him vpon his intreaty: and bare him a ſonne, whoſe name was Henry; for ioy whereof, King Henry aſſembled his Lords, and againe made his ſaid Daughter, and the lawfull Heires of her body his Succeſſors in his Dominions.

His body was buried at Glouceſter in the Church of Saint Peter, and middle of the Quire, where to this day remaineth his Tombe, with a carued Image of his feature, as the monument of a moſt vnfortunate man.

(59) He was for perſonage of a reaſonable ſtature, broad breaſted, well iointed, and full of fleſh: amiable of countenance, ſharpe and faire eyes, blacke of haire, and that ſomewhat careleſly hanging on his forehead; his mind was enriched with many vertues, a follower of Iuſtice, a louer of Religion, ſeuere againſt theeues, and all effeminate nicities; So that hee commanded mens long haire (which againſt God and Natures law was matchable at that time with womens) to be cut off: temperate of diet, and neuer drinking but for thirſt; valiant in battaile, yet very circumſpect, ſeeking rather to win by wiſe care, then by effuſion of bloud: and by the report of moſt Writers excelled all the Princes of the World in his time, in Mercy, Wealth, and Bounty, vnto Monaſteries: the land hee defended by Garriſons of Souldiers planted on the Confines of his neighbour Princes, building many Forts, Bulwarkes and Caſtles; beſides twenty fiue Townes and Cities: whatſoeuer was wiſely or vertuouſly performed in his Gouernement, is chiefly aſcribed to his yonger yeares inſtitution in true Learning and Philoſophy, which was * the great furniſhment of him vnto the Science of Regality; being often heard to ſay, that hee eſteemed an vnlearned King but a crowned Aſſe. His Wiues.

(60) Maude the firſt Wife of King Henry, was the daughter of Malcolme the third, ſurnamed * Canmoir, King of Scotland: her mother was S. Margaret, daughter to Edward, ſonne of Edmund the Ironſide King of England. She was married vnto him at London in the firſt yeare of his raigne, Anno 1100. by Anſelme Archbiſhop of Canterbury: hauing formerly vowed her ſelfe a Nunne, which ſome ſwore ſhe did not for loue of ſingle life, but to auoide ſome vnworthy matches, which her Father would haue impoſed on her. Her Coronation was at Weſtminſter by the ſame Anſelme, on Sunday the eleuenth of Nouember in the ſame yeare. She was his wife ſeuenteene yeeres and more, famous for her learning, loue to learning, charity to the poore, and all vertuous diſpoſitions; and deceaſed at Weſtminſter the firſt of May, in the eighteenth yeere of his raign, and yeere of our Saluation, 1118. where ſhee was buried in S. Peters Church, on the right ſide of King Edward the Confeſſor.

(61) Adelicia, or Alice, the ſecond wife of King Henry, was the daughter of Godfrey the firſt Duke of Louaine, by the daughter of the Emperour Henrie the fourth, and ſiſter to Duke Godfrey, and Iocelin of Louain. Shee was married vnto him the nine and twentieth of Ianuary, in the twentie one of his raigne, and yeere of Chriſt, 1121. and was crowned the morrow after being Sunday. Shee was his wife fifteene yeeres, but euer childleſſe, and ſuruiuing him, was remarried to William Daubeny Earle of Arundel, and was mother of Earle William the ſecond, Rayner, Godfrey, and Ioan, married to Iohn Earle of Augi, &c.

His Iſſue.

(62) William, the ſonne of King Henry, and Queen Maud his firſt wife, was born the ſecõd of his Fathers Raigne, and of Chriſt, 1102. When he came to age of foureteene yeeres, the Nobility of England did him homage, and ſware their fealties vnto him at Shrewsburie. The third yeere after, hee married the the daughter of Foulk, Earle of Anion; and the ſame yeere hee was made Duke of Normandy, doing his homage for the ſame to Lewes the Groſſe, King of France; and receiued the homage and oathes of the Nobility of that Country: but in his returne for England, hee was vnfortunately drowned neere vnto Barbfleet vpon the twenty ſixt of Nouember, the yeere of Grace 1120. and eighteenth of his owne age, without any iſſue, to the great griefe of his Father.

(63) Maud the daughter of King Henry, and of Queene Maud his firſt wife, was borne the fourth yeere of her Fathers raigne. She was the ſecond wife of the Emperour Henrie the fourth, eſpouſed at ſixe yeeres of age, and at eleuen with great ſolemnity was married and crowned his Empreſſe at Mentz in Germany, 6. Ianuary, Anno 1114. the ninth of her husbands, and foureteenth of her Fathers Raignes. Shee was his wife twelue yeeres, and ſuruiued him without any iſſue of him; & comming into England a widdowe, ſhe had fealty ſworne vnto her by the Nobility, and was remaried to Geffrey Plantaginet Earle of Anion, ſonne of Foulke King of Ieruſalem, vpon the third of Aprill, and yeere of Grace 1127. by whom ſhee had iſſue, Henry, the Second, King of England, Geffery Earle of Nantes in Britanie, and William who was called Earle of Poyto: ſhe was his wife twenty three yeeres, and ſuruiuing him alſo continued a widdowe the laſt ſeuenteene yeeres of her life, which ſhe ended in the City of Roan the tenth of September, 1167. the foureteenth of the raigne of King Henry her ſonne, and was buried in the Abbey of Bec in Normandy.

(64) Richard a ſecond ſonne to King Henry, and Queene Maud, by the teſtimony of Geruaſius the Monke of Canterbury, who maketh Maud their eldeſt Child, William the ſecond, and laſtly, Richard; and then (ſaith he) ſhe left bearing: but Malmsbury ſaith, ſhe had but two Children, one of each ſexe.

(65) Eufem alſo another daughter, and fourth Child (by Hector Boetius the Scottiſh Hiſtorian) is ſaid to be borne vnto the Beauclearke by Queene Maud; the credite of the two laſt, I leaue to the reporters, who onely thus name them without any further relation.

His Naturall Iſſue.

(66) Robert, the naturall ſonne of King Henry, was Earle of Glouceſter, and married Mabil daughter and heire of Robert Fitzhamon Lord of Glamorgan, by whom hee had iſſue William Earle of Glouceſter, Richard Biſhop of Bayon, Roger Biſhop of Worceſter, and Maud the wife of Randolph Gernon, the mother of Hugh Keueliot Earle of Cheſter, and Richard his brother: Earle William married Auis daughter of Robert Boſſu Earle of Leiceſter, and had iſſue three daughters and heires of that Earledome, which by Auis the ſecond of them, in the end deſcended to Clare Earle of Hertford. This Earle Robert died the laſt of October, in the twelfth yeare of King Stephen, and was buried at Briſtow in the Church of S. Iames, which hee had founded, and his body laide in the midſt of the Quire; vnto him William Malmsbury dedicated his Booke called Hiſtoria Nouella.

(67) Richard another naturall ſonne of King Henry, was as it ſeemeth by an ancient Regiſter of the Monaſtery at Abington, borne in the raigne of King William Rufus, of the widow of Anskill, a Nobleman of the Country adioining to the ſaid Monaſtery; and it ſeemeth hee is that Richard that was drowned in the Norman Seas neere Barbfleet, among the reſt of King Henries children.

(68) Raynold the naturall ſonne of King Henry, was borne of a daughter vnto Sir Robert Corbet, Lord of Alceſter in Warwickeſhire, by the gift of the King in fauour of her, who was after married to Henry Fitz-herbert his Chamberlaine. This Raynold was created Earle of Cornwall, and Baron of Caſtle-comb, with conſent of King Stephen, and had iſſue foure Daughters, of whom haue ſprung many faire branches.

(69) Robert another of that name, was borne of Edith, the ſiſter of Iue, ſonne and daughter of Forne, the ſonne of Sigewolfe, both of them great Barons in the North: which Edith afterwards King Henry gaue in marriage to Robert Doilie, Baron of Hook-Norton in Oxfordſhire; and with her gaue him the Mannor of Eleydon, in the County of Buckingham, by whom he had iſſue Henry Doylie Baron of Hook-Norton, who oftentimes mentioneth this Robert in his Charters, euer calling him Robert his brother the Kings ſonne. Robert.

(70) Gilbert another naturall ſonne of King Henry is named in the additions to the ſtory of William Gemeticenſis the Norman Monke, in the Chronicle of that country, written by Iohn Taylor being a Tranſlator of that worke out of Latine into French; and laſtly, in the Treaties betwixt England and France, written in the French tongue by Iohn Tillet, Secretarie to their late King Henry the ſecond, and yet in them, not any other mention is made, but only of his name. Gilbert.

(71) William alſo a narurall ſonne of Henry the King, had giuen vnto him the Towne of Tracie in Normandy; of which hee tooke his ſurname, and was called William of Tracie: But whether he were the Progenitor of the Tracies, ſometime Barons in Deuonſhire, or of them that now be of the ſame ſurname; or whether Sir William Tracie, one of the foure Knights, that ſlew Thomas Becket Archbiſhop of Canterbury, were any of his poſterity, is not certainely reported: nor any thing elſe of him, more then that hee died a little after his Father, which was in the yeere of Chriſt, 1135. William.

(72) Henry another naturall ſonne of King Henry, was borne of the Lady Neſta, daughter of Rees ap Tewdor Prince of South-Wales, who was the Wife of Sir Gerald Windſor, and of Stephen, Conſtables of the Caſtles of Pembrooke, and Abertiuie in Wales, and Progenitors of the Families of the Fitz-geralds, and the Fitz-Stephens in Ireland; he was borne and breed, and liued, and married in Wales, hauing iſſue two ſonnes, namely, Meiler and Robert, of which Meiler the elder married the daughter of Hugh Lacie, Lord of Methe in Ireland; hee was at the conflict in the Ile of Angleſey, betweene Magnus the ſonne of Harold, Harfager King of Norway, and Hugh of Mountgomery, Earle of Arundell and Shrewsbury, wherein hee was ſlain, as ſome ſay, with the ſaid Earle, Anno, 1197. Henry.

(73) Maude the Naturall daughter of King Henry was Counteſſe of Perche, and the firſt wife of Earle Rotroke the firſt of that name, ſonne of Arnolfe de-Heſding the firſt Earle of that County: Shee had iſſue by him one onely daughter named Magdalen wife to Garcy the fourth King of Nauarre mother of King Sanches, ſurnamed the wiſe, from whom all the Kings of Nauarre are deſcended: Shee died vpon Friday the twenty ſixth of Nouember, in the twentith of her Fathers raign and yeere of Grace 1120. being drowned in the Sea with her brother Duke William. Maud.

(74) Maude another of that name and naturall daughter of King Henrie, was married to Conan the firſt of that name ſurnamed the Groſſe, Earle of little Britaine in France, ſonne of Earle Alan by Ermengard his ſecond wife; by Alan ſhee had iſſue Howell, pronounced illegitimate, and diſherited by his ſuppoſed father Conſtance, that died without iſſue, and Bertha the wife of Eudes Earle of Porrohet, mother of Earle Conan the yonger, who by Margaret ſiſter of William King of Scots had iſſue Conſtance married to Geffrey ſonne of King Henry the ſecond. Maud.

(75) Iulian likewiſe an other naturall daughter of King Henry was married to Euſtace the illegitimate ſonne of William Lord of Breteuil in Normandy, who was the ſonne and heire of William Fitz-Osborne and elder brother of Roger, both Earles of Hereford in Iulian.

in England, and this Euſtace had hee beene lawfully borne in wedlocke, had been heire to the Earledomes of Hereford and Iuerie: notwithſtanding he had as ſmall a part in that inheritance of the Town of Pacie from which he tooke his ſurname, being commonly called Euſtace of Pacy, and had iſſue by this Iulian his wife, William and Roger of Pacy his ſonnes.

(76) A naturall daughter of King Henry recounted by the continuer of the Hiſtory of william Gemeticenſis, and by Iohn Tillet his follower, is reported by them to haue beene married to one William Goet a Norman; but in neither of theſe writers is any mention made of her name, or of his eſtate, iſſue or other relation.

(77) Another naturall daughter of King Henrie is without name, recited by the ſaid Authors, and by them reported to be married to the Vicount of Beaumont, which is a Towne within the County of Maygne. Shee had iſſue by him, as Roger of Houeden writeth, Richard Vicount Beaumont, Father of Queen Ermengard the wife of King William of Scotland: and Robert the Abbot of Mount-Saint Michael mentioneth another of her ſonnes, named Ralphe, who (as he ſaith) was Biſhop of Angiers.

(78) Another naturall daughter alſo of King Henry is recited by the Normane and French writers before auouched, and reported by them to be married to Mathew of Mountmorancy, the ſonne of Bouchard of Mountmarancy, from whom perhaps deſcended the Houſe of Mountmorancy, who after came to be Earles and Dukes, being growne to be one of the greateſt houſes in France, next to the Princes of the bloud, for poſſeſsions, alliances, and honour.

(79) Elizabeth the laſt naturall daughter of King Henry recounted by the former Authors, was vnmarried in the time of the one, and her husband vnknowne to the other; but both of them agree, that ſhe was borne of Elizabeth the ſiſter of Walleran Earle of Meulan, who was ſiſter alſo of Robert Boſſue Earle of Leiceſter, wife of Gilbert Earle of Pembrooke, and mother of Earle Richard Strangbow, the Conquerour of Ireland. CHAPTER V.

THough the Empreſſe Maud had fealty ſworne vnto her in the life time of her Father: and againe both her ſelfe, and iſſue ordained to be his ſucceſſors in Englands Throne, as hath beene ſaid; yet ſo powerfull is Ambition, where the obiect is a Diademe, and ſo weake are all aſſurances which are built on the wauering Multitude, that King Henries prouidence, was ſoon defeated, and with his death al fealties reuerſed, and that by him onely who had * contended to bee the formoſt of the Laitie in taking that oath, euen Stephen Earle of Mortaine and Bolloine; a man whoſe deſcent was very Noble, being the third ſonne of Stephen Earle of Bloys and Champaigne, who was the ſonne of Earle Eudes, and he of Earle Theobald, the ſonne of Gerlon the Dane, the companion of Rollo Duke of Normandy; his mother was * Adelicia the third daughter of William the Conqueror by Queen Maude his wife: And himſelfe was aduanced to bee Earle of Mortaigne by King Henry his vncle, whoſe Crown he now endeauoured to vſurpe, being otherwiſe for his many princely parts, worthy to weild a Scepter, if his claime thereto had beene iuſt and warrantable.

(2) For as ſoone as Natures courſe had brought King Henry, where Princes and pooreſt Subiects are all equall; forthwith hee was working to diſpoſſeſſe his Iſſue, which onely now reſted in Maud and her Children; in which attempt it hapned fortunately for him (if any thing may bee counted fortunate, which is ioined with impietie) that his yonger Brother Henry was then Biſhop of Wincheſter, & a very potent man in the State, who had induſtriouſly ſtirred himſelfe in making way to his entrance; and (vpon aſſurance of all liberties to the Church and Common-wealth) had drawne on alſo William Archbiſhop

And to helpe forward those audacious beginnings, Roger Bishoppe of Salisbury, the late Kings Treasurer protested (Malmsburie, who reports it, himselfe heard it from him) that they were free from the oath made to the Empresse; for that without consent of the Barons she had married out of the Realm; but that which wrought most, was the testimony of Hugh Bigot, * Seneschall vnto King Henry departed, who comming ouer with Stephen, tooke his corporall oath, that the King on his death-bed, vpon some offence taken against his daughter Maude, disinherited her, and appointed this Stephen his nephew to be his successour. These colourable instigations so moued the * too credulous Archbishop and the Peeres, that they all swore fealty vnto him and became his Leigemen.

(4) Hee entred his gouernement the yeare of Christ Iesus, 1135. the second day of December, and was crowned at Westminster the twenty sixt of the same Moneth, being Saint Stephens day, by William Corbell Archbishop of Canterbury, who with the rest of the Prelates doing him homage, and knowing now hee would yeeld to any conditions (for performance whereof his * Brother of Winchester did there engage himselfe for a pledge) they all tooke their oath of allegiãce conditionally, (traiterously, I might say) to obey him as their King, so long as he should preserue their Church Liberties, and the vigour of Discipline: And that the Lay-Barons made vse also of this policie, appeareth by Robert Earle of Gloucester, who sware to be true Liegeman to the King, as long as the King would preserue to him his dignities, and keepe all Couenants, wherupon the King promised for the present, that he would speedily reforme the ouer-hard lawes of his Predecessors, and mollifie the extreames thereof to their owne likings, vnder his Seale and Charter: and so thence hastening to meete the Corps of his deceased vncle, (which was now brought into England) he honoured that pompous funerall, with his owne, and all his great Prelates and Peeres, attendance at Reading; whence presently he went to Oxford, where he sealed his fore-promised Charter, of many indulgent fauours: * prefacing therein, that hee attained the Crowne by Election onely; and that Pope Innocentius confirmed the same; whereby may be conceiued, that his Holinesse, either out of hatred to the Empresse, (whose husband * Henry was no friend to the Papacie) or for some other holy ends, had no small hand in aduancing Stephens periured and disloiall intrusion. that all Persons and Causes Ecclesiasticall should appertaine onely to Ecclesiasticall Iudicature: that none but Clergy men should euer intermeddle with the vacancies of Churches, or any Church-mens goods; that all bad vsages in the Land touching forrests, exactions, &c. should be vtterly extirpate; the ancient Lawes restored, &c. As Stephen well knew, that they had chosen him their King, onely to make their vses of him, so these immunities he granted, rather to bleare their Eies, then * with any purpose to manacle his own hands with such Parchment-Chaines.

(5) This his entrance was very peaceable (saith Gerualius of Canterbury) but by little, and little ciuill discord increased, to the lamentable destruction of men, and the land: whereto Robert Earle of Gloucester, halfe-brother to the Empresse, whose wisedom and power King Stephen much feared, gaue a secret beginning, when amongst them that swore him fealty, hee concluded his (as we said) with this reseruation, that his owne authority should be nothing empaired, meaning no longer to respect him as his King, then the King should him as a Peere: and a generall sufferance, to erect Castles for strength throughout the land, was no security to his peaceable estate. Intended indeed to strengthen the Kingdome against Maud the Empresse; but proued the bane of all subiectiue obedience: which was politickly considered by Henry Fitz-Empresse, in the conclusion of Peace betwixt King Stephen and him, when a thousand one hundred and fifteene Castles so raised, were againe razed and cast downe.

(6) The first man that professedly set himselfe opposite to Stephens vsurpation, was Baldwin de Reduers, who fortified the City and Castle of Exceester against him; the Welshmen also, bearing in minde the harms that K. Henry had done them, desired reuenge, and made many slaughters vpon the Kings people: Against these, Stephen proceeded with his band of English and Flemmings, and after a strong and chargeable siege, by famine drew foorth Baldwin, his wife, and children, all which hee disherited and expulsed the Land, vsing so great lenity towards all other offenders there, that it gaue great encouragement to others rebellions. But in Wales the businesse prospered not so well, where at Cardigan a great battell was fought, with such slaughter and ouerbearing of the English, that the men by women were taken and led away Captiue, and so many drowned by the fall of a Brige ouer Temd, that a passage was made ouer the water with the dead Carcases therein heaped.

(7) Neither thus onely, but some of the English also distasting King Stephen, secretly instigated Dauid King of Scotland, to reuenge the wrongs done to the Empresse Maud, a seruice as they vrged it very gratefull vnto her, and euen pleasing to God and Man. He therefore consenting, inuaded the borders, and tooke from the English both Carleile and Newcastle, which he stuffed with Garrisons. Against these, King Stephen prepared, and with a great power came into those parts, where diuers accidents by diuers reporters are related, yet all agree that ere long peace was concluded, Carleil still enioied by King Dauid, and the Earledome of Huntington by Prince Henry his sonne; for which hee did homage at his fathers command, Dauid himselfe refusing so to doe (as Hector Boetius the Scotish writer affirmeth) for that he had giuen his faith before vnto Maud the Empresse.

(8) King Stephen returned, and all in good quiet, he suddenly fell sicke of a Lethargy, yea & in such danger of life that the common report gaue foorth hee was dead, which stirred great troubles both in England and else where, for thereby his friends were stricken into great feare, and the factious more bold to prepare for Queene Maude; for Hugh Bigot one of his chiefest and first raisers fortified himselfe in the Castle of Norwich, and would not deliuer it vnto any saue onely to the King, yea and very vnwillingly also vnto him: and in Wales, Owen and Cadwalader the the ſonnes of Gruffith ap Conan Prince of that Country, carried great ſpoiles from the Engliſh, as of other goods; ſo alſo of Horſe and Armour, and habiliments for warre; likewiſe in Normandy, Conſpiracies began to bud forth; for Geffrey Earle of Anion, who in right of his wife made claime vnto all, eaſily got the hearts and endeauours of many to adhere vnto the true heire; poſſeſsing himſelfe of certaine Caſtles; but entring further on the Demaines of one Talevan, a man of note (proſcribed for ſome offence or diſpleaſure by King Stephen) the Normans diſliking that, and ſome other his doings, ſent for Theobald Earle of Bloys (Stephens elder Brother) offering him both their Dukedome, and their ſwords, and liues to defend him in it; who comming to Luxonia, Robert Earle of Gloueſter, (not vnwilling any way to weaken King Stephen) deliuered vnto him vpon compoſition, the County of Faleſia, himſelfe carrying no ſmall ſumme of money thence out of King Henries Treaſurie, and very throughly, (though ſecretly) watching all opportunities to aduance the title and deſignes of the Empreſſe.

(9) Stephen recouered, and hearing theſe ſtirres, prepared himſelfe firſt into Normandy, at whoſe approach, after ſome ſmall attempts, the people (diſtracted betwixt feare, and ſenſe of their ducty) yeelded themſelues vnto his power; ſurrendring their fenced Cities, and other ſtrong holds. This good ſucceſſe thus fortunately begunne, hee hoped further to proſecute, by meanes of a league, which hee lately had made with Lewis the ſeuenth King, of France: and hereupon created Euſtace his eldeſt ſon liuing, Duke of Normandie, commanding him to do his homage for the ſame to Lewis.

(10) Earle Theobald ſeeing himſelfe thus defeated of his hopes and purpoſes, ſtormed at the wrongs done by King Stephen; for hee, (his elder by birth, and Bloyſes Earledomes lawfull heire) laide his title both for Normandie and England alſo, now vſurped by Stephen his yonger: notwithſtanding (rage nought auailing without power) hee came to a compoſition, and remitted his Claime for two thouſand markes annually to be paid. Geffrey of Anion likewiſe, whoſe title by his Wife was better then them both, not able at the preſent (being ſo far ouer-matched by the Kings power, wealth, & confederats) to do what he would, yeelded to neceſsity, and for fiue thouſand markes yeerely to be paid, ſuffered Stephen quietly to enioy the Crowne.

(11) Hauing thus at once ſwept the two greateſt rubbes out of his fortunes way, hee well hoped that all cloudes of diſpleaſure, and oppoſition, were now ouer-blowne, when vnexpectedly newes came, that England was in tumults, the ſparkes of conſpiracie, kindled ſecretlie before in the hearts of factious Peers, now openly breaking foorth, vpon aduantage of his abſence in Normandie: therefore, hauing not altogether cõpoſed his buſines in thoſe parts, he took ſhip for England in the depth of the winter; and euen in the Vigill of Chriſts Natiuitie, beſieged, and after tooke the Caſtle of Bedford, that was manned againſt him in the behalfe of the Scots; about which time Dauid their King hauing entred Northumberland in the quarrell of Queene Maude, the ruder ſort of his Armie (as commonly the beſt gouerned is not emptie of ſuch) reuenged too tragically the wrongs of the Empreſſe, in ripping vp the wombes of women with child, and toſsing their infants vpon the points of their ſpeares, ſlaying the Prieſts at the Altar, and diſmembring the ſlaine bodies in moſt vnhumane maner.

(12) Againſt theſe, King Stephen made haſtilie forward, affirming it no policie, to giue one houres reſt vnto the Enemie: and threatning more then hee accompliſhed, entred Scotland; whence after ſome ſmall reuenge wrought, hee was haſtily recalled; ſo many of his Nobles in England now in Armes againſt him, that hee was in a ſort beſette on euerie ſide. And what other could hee, a Vſurper, expect from them, but Treaſon, whom himſelfe had formerly taught to be Traitors to their rightfull Soueraigne? But yet (as no Rebellion was euer without pretence of Reaſon and Iuſtice) they alledged, that hee had * violated his Oath touching their Forreſts, and other Immunities of Church and Common-wealth: but Church and Common-wealth, were but publike colours for priuate grudges, (as Malmesburie, who then liued, well vnfouldeth) which the Great-Ones conceiued againſt their King, becauſe he would not grant them ſuch Caſtles, Commands, and Lordſhips, as themſelues liked and expected of him, whom they thought to be ſo obliged vnto them, that he ought denie them nothing. The endleſſe and ſhameleſſe importunities of theſe men, ſometimes hee put off, alleadging thereby, the impaire of his Crownes reuenewes; ſometimes hee was faine to ſatisfie, diſtruſting their falling from him: whoſe loialtie notwithſtanding beeing built on ſo vn-noble grounds, was but coloured, and therefore could not long bee permanent. Neither was it. For Robert of Gloceſter (the Empreſſes halfe-brother, and now her chiefe Counſellor and Captaine) finding thoſe particular diſlikes apt to be wrought on, and made ſeruiceable for a common behoofe; whetted on with the touch of conſcience, and counſells of religious learned men, (who vrged him, with the hazard both of his credit, and ſoule, for neglect of his firſt, and only-lawfull, Oath to the Empreſſe) ſent threatning meſſages vnto King Stephen, charging him with his Oath of Allegiance vnto Lady Maud his Soueraigne, againſt whom hee had ſhewed himſelfe a moſt perfidious man, and had impiouſlie drawne him with others to doe the like; and ſo denouncing Stephen an open Enemie to the State, and himſelfe vnto Stephen, made ſtrong his faction with the aſsiſtance of many Nobles; among whom, Milo, a chiefe man of warre, and High Conſtable to King Stephen, reuolted from him, and became a great help to their proceedings.

(13) Earle Robert (whom eftſoones the enraged King diſcharged of his honours and poſſeſsions in England) tooke into the Caſtle of Briſtow, and made good alſo his Caſtle of Slede; his complices likewiſe did the like in other places: for William Talbot manned the Caſtle of Hereford, William Louell the Caſtle of Carie, Paganell the Caſtle of Ludlow, William de Mount the Caſtle of Duneſtor, Robert de Nichol the Caſtle of Warram, Euſtace Fitz-Iohn the Caſtle of * Meltune, William Fitz-Alain the Caſtle of Shrewſburie, and Walkelinus the Caſtle of Doure. And thus thoſe forts which were erected to defend the Crowne, firſt offended the King, ſome few wherof as he recouered, he flatted to the ground, and wiſhed the other no higher walls; ſtill ſwearing by Gods Birth (his vſuall Oath) hee would not ſo ſlightlie bee vnſeated of his Crowne, and wondring what ſhould mooue them, who had ſo readilie aduanced him, ſo ſpeedily to vnſtate him. One freſh motiue to theſe Noble-mens diſcontents was the Kings * ſeizing on ſome great men and their lands, on bare ſuſpition of their loialtie; and on the other ſide, the extraordinarie fauour, which Stephen ſhewed to William de Ypre, and his Flemings (which they interpreted as a contempt of themſelues and their Nation) whoſe counſells he generally followed, and chiefly relied vpon: In diſdaine whereof, they ſent word to the Empreſſe, that within fiue Monethes, ſhee ſhould haue the Realme at command, according to their Oaths made to her Father.

(14) Theſe turmoiles thus working in the bowels of the Kingdome, Dauid King of Scotland had better opportunitie to aſſaile the ſides and skirts thereof; and following what hee had begunne, with a very great Armie entring Northumberland, made great ſlaughter of the Engliſh, and deſtruction of their Countrey: Againſt whom the Northren Lords prepared, at the command of Thurſtan Arch-biſhop of Yorke (left by King Stephen Lieutenant in thoſe parts) who beeing by ſickenes kept from the Field, appointed

But his ſon Henry, eſteeming more of glory thē life, ruſhed in amongſt his retiring ſouldiers, and with vndaunted courage, perſwading them to regard themſelus and his preſence, with threat of ſhamefull deaths to all ſuch as fled, he held them in for a time; till at length ouer-laid with the maine-battaile of the Engliſh, the magnanimous Prince Henry, likewiſe quitted the field, bitterly curſing the frowardneſſe of Fortune, and the miſchance that hapned that day.

(16) Theſe domeſticke oppoſites thus remoued out of his way, King Stephen re-addreſſed himſelfe for the North, to proſecute that which Thurſtan had Begunne: firſt therfore winning the Caſtle of Leids, he went into Scotland, where by the perſuaſion & proweſſe of Mars and Vulcan (ſaith Paris) a Peace was concluded betwixt the two Kings; and Stephen thence returning, brought Prince Henry (whom he created Earle of Huntingdon) with him into England, and at the ſiege of Ludlow Caſtle, the aduenturous Prince was almoſt ſurpriſed, where the beſieged with an Iron Grapple pluckt him from his horſe, and ſo had taken him, but that King Stephen himſelfe, with great valour and honour recouered him: who hauing wonne the Caſtle, went preſently to Oxford, whither newes was brought him that the Empreſſe was preparing for England.

Henry Hun. Houeden.

A great Councel at Oxford.

(18) The King who expected of Church-men humility, ſeeing them now armed as men for the field, commanded his attendants to take armour likewiſe, and ſo entring communication of diuers matters with his Peeres and Prelates, their Souldiers caſually meeting, fell at variance, where the Biſhops friends had the worſe, ſo that many of them were wounded, and the reſt forſaking their maſters ranne away. This great aſſembly thus diſturbed, the King required the Biſhops to ſatisfie his Court for theſe outrages of their ſeruants, which ſatisfaction ſhould be, to deliuer the keyes of all their Caſtles to the King, as pledges of their fidelity, which they refuſing, the Biſhops of Salisbury and Lincolne were laid hold of; but Ely eſcaped to the Caſtle of Diuiſe: Alexander was impriſoned, till hee had yeelded him his Caſtles of New-warke, and * Slaford; Roger the Caſtles of Sherborne, and the Diuiſes (accounted then one of the goodlieſt Caſtles of Europe) beſides forty thouſand Markes in ſiluer; (which loſſes the Biſhop did not long ſuruiue). The King imployed the money to purchaſe Lady Conſtance, ſiſter to Lewis King of France, to be wife vnto his ſonne Euſtace: all which was to ſtrengthen himſelfe againſt the Empreſſe Maud, whoſe coming he continually feared, & now before his expectation ſhe was landed in England, at a fitte time for her deſignes, when all the great Prelates (who formerly were his chiefeſt friends) were highly incenſed againſt the King for ſuch oppreſsion of their Brethren.

(19) The place of her arriuage was at the * port of Arundell, into which Caſtle ſhee was ioyfully receiued by William de Albeny, who had married Queen Adeliza, the late wife to King Henry, whoſe Dowrie it was; from hence Earle Robert diuerting his courſe onely with tenne horſe-men, and as many Archers, (for in all hee brought ouer but one hundred and forty with him for ſo great an exploit) paſſed throgh the Land vnto Wallingford and Glouceſter, ſoliciting his Complices for the aid of his ſiſter the Empreſſe.

* A man who then liued, holds him, in this bold attempt with ſo ſmall forces, no way inferiour to Iulius Cæſar, whom Liuie reports to haue begun his ciuill war, and to haue ſet himſelfe againſt the whole world, onelie with fiue Cohorts of Souldiers.

(20) King Stephen as then lay in ſiege of Marleburgh Caſtle, but hauing intelligence of this more dangerous an enemy, diſlodged thence, and with all expedition made towards Arundell; whereat the Empreſſe, wanting her Counſellor, was wonderfully perplext; yet wanted not a womans wit to helpe at need; inſomuch that by the report of Geruaſius, leſt her dignity and right might any way be endammaged, ſhee tooke an oath, that none of theſe the Kings enemies by her aduice or conſent had entred the land, but with condition to carry themſelues orderly without impeachment of the honour and allegiance due to the King; by which policy (to giue it no worſe name) ſhe ſo ſatisfied King Stephen (whom al do cenſure for too much credulity and facility towards his foes) that hee cauſed her to bee conuaied honourably vnto Briſtow, where ſhe remained the ſpace of two monethes, and then got thence vnto Wallingford.

(21) Earle Robert in the meane while diſperſed the newes of the Empreſſes approch, vnto whoſe aid ſo many gathered, that the ſame Monke reporteth, no man was able to ſet downe their multitudes in context of hiſtorie, much leſſe by way of Computation: then beganne (ſaith he) both labour and dolour, which brought the whole Realme to a moſt grieuous diuiſion, and in a maner to an vtter ruine: for thoſe that fauoured the King, what euill ſoeuer could be wrought or imagined, they did againſt them, that tooke part with the Empreſſe: and contrariwiſe, Earle Robert, whoſe power daily encreaſed, tortured with cruelties all thoſe that ſtood for the King; and to augment a more miſchiefe, the Flemings left their owne Country, and came ouer by multitudes, like vnto a Company of hunger-ſtarued Wolues, ſeeking to bring the Lands felicity vnto nothing.

(22) Stephen, whoſe head was now ful of troubles, delaid no time to forward his Fortunes, but ſtraightwaies beſieged Maud and her brother in Wallingford Caſtle; notwithſtanding, wearied with long labour and profiting little, hee cauſed a Tower of wood to be there erected, which he ſtrongly fortified with mē and munition, and then remooued to the ſiege of Malmesbury. His brother alſo of Wincheſter, a ſtout and politicke Prelate indeede, beſtirred all his wilie wittes in Stephens behalfe; for inuiting certaine Noble-men to his Palace at Wincheſter, retained them priſoners, till hee had compelled them there, to reſigne their Caſtles to the King. In the meane while Earle Robert ſubdued and ſpoiled Worceſter: Ralph Painell, in the Empreſſes fauour, burned Nottingham; and Ranulph Earle of Cheſter, ioining in wiſhes with Robert (whoſe daughter hee maried) ſhewed himſelfe not not vnwilling to annoy King Stephen, though he had receiued great honours at his hands. The Empreſſe her ſelfe, the better to ſecure her owne perſon, and to giue acceſſe vnto her fauourites, tooke into Lincolne, where ſhe meant to make her abode, ſtoring the City with all prouiſions neceſſarie.

(23) King Stephen, as vigilant as the other was politick, made ſtraight-waies thitherward, and begirt the Citie with a ſtraite ſiege, where hee had ſurpriſed his greateſt Enemie, had ſhee not found meanes thence to eſcape: & ſo poſſeſsing himſelf of the City, ſetled it, & the whole Countrey in verie good quiet. Soone after whoſe departure, Ranulph Earle of Cheſter, with his Counteſſe, and Brother, comming to Lincolne, to keepe their Chriſtmas; the Citizenes knowing the Kings iealouſies, and deſirous to turrie fauour with him, ſent ſecret intelligence, that if he would ſurprize both thoſe Brethren, he had now the fitteſt aduantage: whereto the King giuing eare, came thither with great expedition; and whiles they, thus circumuented, ſtood on their guard in the Caſtle, the Earle eſcaped foorth, and went to craue aid of the Empreſſe, for reſcue of his wife and brother whom hee left beſieged. Earle Robert, hearing the newes, and glad of ſo faire an opportunity, ioined with Ranulph, and they both gathered all their powers both of welſh and Engliſh, for the releefe of their friends in Lincolne: where, reſolutelie firſt wading through the Riuer, (which parted them from the Kings Armie, and was then deepe) vpon Candlemas day and yeere of Chriſt Ieſus one thouſand one hundred fortie one, they pitched their Tents, and in the Kings ſight ordered their Battaile: One Squadrone whereof, was lead by Earle Ranulph: the Diſherited were the Guiders of another; in the third was Earle Robert himſelfe; and the Welſh-men ſerued for the Wing. Their troopes thus marſhalled, Ranulph appointed in rich Armor, and full of braue reſolution, ſpake thus to his followers, in the preſence of Robert of Gloceſter.

(24) "I yeeld you vnfained thanks, (Inuincible "Captaine, and you, our companions in Armes) "which heere ſo reſolutelie witneſſe your loues vn- "to mee, vpon my ſole requeſt, euen to the hazard "of your owne liues. Sith then, I am the chiefe cauſe "of this your perill, it well befits me, that I my ſelfe "be formoſt in the hazard, and giue the firſt onſette "of battaile againſt this faithleſſe King; who made "vs a ſhew of truce, onelie to take aduantage for our "ruines; and therefore both mine owne courage, "and the Kings vniuſt dealing, giue mee cauſe to "hope, that I ſhall foorthwith breake aſunder the "ſtrongeſt array of his Armie, and make my way "through their midſt, by dint of this my ſword. It "ſhall be argument of your proweſſe, to follow me, "leading you the way, and to imitate mee, giuing "you example. My thoughts alreadie tell mee, that "euen now I am breaking through his Battles, "trampling on the neckes of his Chieftaines, and "piercing with this my ſword the very ſides of the "King himſelfe. His ſpeech though ſhort and headdie, as more fitting a Souldier then an Orator, yet well ſuited with the time, and was ſeconded with great applauſe of the Souldiers: Whereupon Robert Earle of Gloceſter, ſtept foorth and ſaid.

(25) "It is not againſt right, moſt Noble Earle, "that the honor of this daies ſeruice, and firſt aſſault, "ſhould bee permitted vnto you, in regard of the "greatnes both of your deſcent, and your martiall "achieuement; but yet, if Deſcent bee ſtood on, "I my ſelfe am both the ſonne, and nephew, of a "Mightie King; if Valour, heere now are many of "choiſeſt worth, of whom none liuing can challenge "precedence for proweſſe. But other reaſon ought "now to ſway. For ſith the King, contrarie to his "Oath made to my Siſter, impiouſly vſurped the "Kingdome, he hath made a confuſion of all things, "both in cauſing the bloud of many thouſands to "bee ſpilt, and in making many Owners (as himſelfe was) of that which was not their owne, by de- "priuing other of their rightfull inheritance: Theſe "therefore thus diſherized, ought of right (in aſſu- "rance of helpe from their righteous Iudge and re- "uenger) giue firſt aſſault on their vnrighteous op- "preſſor; and God who iuſtly iudgeth his people, "will (doubtleſſe) looke downe from his heauenly "habitation, and will not leaue vs ſuccourleſſe, "whiles in a iuſt cauſe, wee impugne a moſt vniuſt "Intruder. But one thing, (moſt reſolued Cap- "taines and ſouldiers) I would haue you throughlie "to conſider, that through theſe Fennes (which "with ſo mucha doe you haue paſſed) there is no "way fit for eſcape: heere muſt wee either vanquiſh, "or leaue our liues, for hope of flight is none at all, "nor is there any other way, left vs now to goe, but "by our ſwords into the Citie: and (if I geſſe a- "right) euen this, that wee haue no meanes to flie, "will bee to vs the meanes (by diuine aſsiſtance) to "get the Victorie; becauſe they muſt needes truſt to "their Manhood, who ſee no hope to thriue by "their Cowardize. Indeed, the Citizenes of Lin- "colne keepe nigh to their houſes, and in the brunt of "the Battle, there will their mindes bee, and thither "will their heeles follow, whiles you victorioulie "ſhall keepe the field. And conſider farther with "mee, what kinde of Captaines they haue: Firſt A- "laine Duke of Britaine, he comes armed, not againſt "you, but God himſelfe, a furious perſon, ſpotted "with all filth of ſinne, in malice vnmatchable, who "thinks it his greateſt diſhonour, to ſee any man ex- "cell him in crueltie: with him commeth the trea- "cherous Earle Robert Mellent, the very craftes-ma- "ſter of fraud, in whoſe heart dwells impiety, guile "in his mouth, cowardize in his actions; high of "minde, vaineglorious in words, degenerous in per- "formance; laſt in the fight, firſt in the flight. Next, "comes Hugh By-god, his name neerelie ſounding his "periurie; who thought it not ſufficient to breake "his oath with the Empreſſe, but that hee muſt be "once againe forſworn (as all the world doth know) "that Henry at his death bequeathed the Crowne "vnto Stephen, to the preiudice of his owne daugh- "ter; a man (in a word) who accounts Treacherie "a Vertue, and Periurie a courtly quality. Among "theſe Gallants marcheth the Earle Albemarle, a man "of a ſingular conſtancy in euill; very ready to at- "tempt, & very loath to leaue any miſchiefe; whoſe "wife, through irkeſomnes of his vnſufferable filthy "qualities, is gone from him; & the Earle that keeps "her, hee commeth againſt vs too, a notorious a- "dulterer, and the Non-pareill of impurity, a true "Souldier of Bacchus, a ſtranger to Mars; to whom "the ſight of all bloud, except of the Grape, is ve- "rie fearefull. Then ſetteth forth Simon Earle of "Hampton, whoſe deeds conſiſt altogether in words, "and whoſe liberality onely in promiſes; for when "he hath ſaid, he hath done, and yee get no more. "Laſtly, you ſee here gathered a knot of Peeres, all "like to their Prince, accuſtomed to robberies, en- "riched with rapines; fatned with man-ſlaughters, "and all tainted with periurie. You therefore (No- "ble ſpirits) whom great Henry aduanced, and this "Stephen hath caſt downe, whom Henry made "wealthy, and Stephen hath empoueriſhed, be now "couragious, and vpon aſſured confidence of your "great valours, yea, of Gods iuſtice, ſeeke both your "iuſt Reuẽge, which God euen puts into your hands, "on theſe vngodly wretches; and immortall Glorie, „which ſhall hence-forward attend both your ſelues, „and your poſterity for euer. If you are all of this "mind, for executing this Iudgement of God now "vpon them, then vow your ſelues vnto God, and "this his ſeruice; and forbear, nay rather forſwear, "to ſhew your backs to your foes.

At which words, all iointly lifting vp their hands, and acclamations vnto heauen, with a terrible ſhout abiured all thought of flight, and quickning vp their braue ſpirits, aduanced gallantly towards the enemy.

(27) King

King Stephens addreſſe to the Battle.

(26) King Stephen, the meane while, was farre from being idle, who alſo ordered his Armie into three ſeuerall Battalions: the greateſt part and beſt harnaſſed, whoſe horſes he had ſent away (perhaps alſo to depriue his men of all hope of flight) he appointed to remaine on foot with himſelf, and certain of his Nobles, all vnder one Banner. The horſemen hee diſpoſed into two ſeuerall wings, the one commaunded by Alaine Duke of Britaine, Hugh Bigod Earle of Norfolke, Simon Earle of Hampton, wit the two Earles of Mellent and Warren; and the other Wing was gouerned by William de Ypres the Fleming. Then the King, becauſe his voice was not very pleaſing or audible, commaunded Baldwine Fitz-Gilbert, a man of great honour aud proweſſe, to vtter his mind vnto the Army, who ſtanding conueniently to be heard, ſpake vnto them as followeth.

"(27) All ſuch as addreſſe themſelues, and expoſe their liues, to the hazard of battaile, haue "three things aduiſedly to be thought on: The equitie of their cauſe; the Number of the Forces; "the ſufficiency of their men. The firſt, leſt they "endanger the ſtate of their Soules; the next, leſt "they be ouerlaied with multitude of their enemies; "and the laſt, leſt while they preſume vpon numbers, they find them but faint-hearted, to their "vtter ruine. But in all theſe, wee know our ſelues "to be ſufficiently furniſhed. The Iuſtice of our "cauſe is, for obſeruing the vow made before God "vnto our King, to withſtand them that haue falſified their faith, euen to the hazard of our liues. For "our Number, in Horſemē; tis not inferior to theirs; "in Footmen we farre exceede them: and for ſuffi"ciency, what words can equall the noble valour of "ſo many Earles, Lords, Captaines and Followers, "trained vp euer in the warres? But aboue all, the "incomparable proweſſe and preſence of our King, "will be in ſtead of thouſands to vs. Sith then "this our Lord, and the Lords Anointed (to whom "you vowed your faith) is in field here amongſt "you; now performe this your vow vnto God; "aſſured, that the more conſtant you proue in this "your Princes ſeruice, and faithfull againſt thoſe "faithles periured perſons, the more ſhall your re"ward bee at the hands of God, and of him. There"fore be both couragious, and confident; the rather, "God wot) on a victorie, it is with farre greater loſ"ſes then the conquered. The Welſhmen he brin"geth, are fitter for our contempt then feare: their "raſhnes you may eaſily ſee, for it is naked and vn"armed, who wanting both military Art and Pra"ctiſe, runne headlong, like brutes vpon the Hunters "Iauelins. The reſt aſwell Nobles (if ſuch they "may bee tearmed) as common Souldiers, are but "ſtraglers and runnagates: of whom I would wiſh "their number greater; for the more they be, the "more ſucceſleſſe will bee their ſeruice. You "therefore (great Peeres and Worthies) it now be"houeth (and indeed it much behoueth you) to bee "very mindfull, both of your Valours, and Noble"neſſe: this day aduance your Prowes to the height, "and following the foreſteps of your famous An"ceſtors, leaue to your poſteritie both a noble pat"terne, and an euerlaſting renowne. Your dayly "ſucceſſe of victories, ſhould quicken your hearts "this day to atchieue brauely, and the continuall "miſcarrying of our enemies, will quicken their "heeles to flie as ſpeedily: and (I dare ſay) they al"ready repent of their comming hither, and are by "this time caſting how to be gone, if the nature of "the place would giue them leaue. Then ſith it is "vnpoſsible for them either to fight, or flie; why "come they hither, but euen by Gods own appoint"ment, to offer themſelues, and all their prouiſions "into your hands? and here you ſee their horſes, "their Armour, yea and their bodies, to reſt at your "pleaſure: reach forth therefore your warlicke "hands to ſeize on that ioyfully, which God hath "freely brought you.

Which exhortation hee had ſcarſly cloſed, when the noiſe of Trumpets, and ſhout of the enemies comming on, was Rhetoricke enough to incite them to their tasks.

(28) A ſore battaile was fought, and with equall ſucceſſe a long time maintained: for the band of the diſherited, whoſe particular wrongs whetted their courage, (and were therefore politickly placed in the front) brake terribly into the Kings Vauntgard; and contrariwiſe William of Ypres into the Welſh, vntill the Fore-ward of the Kings horſemen beganne to ſhrinke backe, and (not without ſuſpition of treaſon) galloped away; when preſently the Earle of Cheſter encountred the Kings battaile of foote, in whoſe ſtrength he repoſed moſt truſt; but it being ouerlaid with Aſſailants, beganne alſo to faint and to flie, leauing the King enraged, both with his friends faint-heartednes, and with his foes ſucceſſe. A very ſtrange ſight it was (ſaith Paris) there to behold King Stephen, left almoſt alone in the field, yet no man daring to approch him, whiles grinding his teeth, and foaming like a furious wild Boare, he draue backe with his battle-axe whole troupes aſſailing him, & maſſacring the chiefeſt of them to the eternall renowne of his courage: If but a hundred ſuch had there beene with him, a whole Army had neuer been able to ſurprize his perſon: yet as hee was ſingle, hee held out, til firſt his Battle-axe brake, and after that, his ſword alſo, with the force of his vnreſiſtable ſtrokes, flew in peeces; and he now weaponleſſe, and (by an vnknowne, doubtleſſe, an vn-noble hand) ſtricken down with a great ſtone throwne at him, was ſeized on by William of * Kahames, a moſt ſtout Knight, and by Earle Roberts commaund, preſerued from any violence to his perſon, was carried priſoner vnto Maud the Empreſſe at Glouceſter, & thence was ſent bound vnto Briſtow, where in the Caſtle he remained in ſafe cuſtody.

(29) The Empreſſe hauing thus got the Lion in her hold, triumphed not a litle in her own fortune, & now as ſole Soueraign of Englands Monarchie, commanded all buſineſſe, elected her Counſellors, and beſtowed many dignities where ſhee moſt fauoured. Notwithſtanding, that ſhee altered not her ſtile of Empreſſe, or Queene of Romans, may appeare by this her Broad-Seale enſuing; vnder which ſhee granted the cuſtody of the Tower of London vnto Geffrey de Mandeuil, and his Heires, couenanting with him therein, that ſhe would not make peace with the Citizens of London, without the ſaid Geffreis conſent, becauſe they were his mortall enemies: but this Earle being afterwards vnawares apprehended in the Kings Court at Saint Albans, could not bee releaſed, till hee had ſurrendred both the Tower of London, and other his Caſtles to the King.

Vpon theſe happy ſucceſſes of the Empreſſe, the States-men ſtood not any longer for King Stephen, but their Faithes turning with his Fortunes, all of them ſurrendred their allegiance vnto her; the Kentiſh only excepted, where Stephens Queene, and William de Ypres, maintained his quarrell to the vttermoſt of their powers.

(30) But

THE TRVE SCVLPTVRE OF MAVD THE EMPRESSES BROAD SEALE, APPENDANT TO HER CHARTERS.

(30) But the Empreſſe conducted in State to Wincheſter, had the Regall Crowne of the Kingdome there deliuered her; no man more forward then Henry the Biſhop, and Brother of Stephen, who vpon the vowing to bee ruled by his aduiſe in affaires of Eſtate, being then the Popes Legate, ſolemnely in a Synode of the Clergie, accurſed all ſuch as withſtood the Empreſſe, and bleſſed all them that aſſiſted her intereſt: but both hee, and his friends forgot not to adde that wonted trayterous clauſe of their oath, ſo long to keepe faith to her, as ſhee kept her Couenants with them: and ſo with applauſe of the people, ſhe came to London, and after much perſwaſion and mediation (for that the Citizens were very ſtiffe againſt her) was receiued into the City with a roiall Proceſsion.

(31) Neither was King Stephen thus defeated of England onely, but Normandy alſo caſt off the yoke of ſubiection: for Geffrey of Aniou, husband of the Empreſſe, hauing ſome intelligence of this atchieued victorie, induced the Normans to incline vnto him, by publiſhing the captiuation of Stephen, vnable now to relieue them, or himſelfe; and Dauid King of Scotland for his part was not behind, to ſet forward the claime of Lady Maud, aſſuming in her behalfe the County of Northumberland.

(32) Maud thus eſtabliſhed, all now eſteemed her as Fortunes deare darling, and beheld her as their onely riſing ſunne; the Priſon walles ouerſhadowing the Preſence, feature, and fauours of the now deiected vnfortunate Stephen, whoſe ſorrowful wife Queen Maud, inceſſantly ſollicited the Empreſſe in her husbands behalfe, deſiring his liberty, but not his Crowne, which hee was now contented to let her enioy; and thereunto offered for pledges many great perſons, who proteſted for him to the Empreſſe, that hee thenceforth would deuote himſelfe vnto God, & either become a Monke or a Pilgrime: Henry of Wincheſter alſo became a ſuiter vnto her in the behalfe of his Nephew Euſtace, King Stephens ſonne, that the * Counties belonging before to the Father, might bee conferred vpon the ſonne.

(33) The Londoners likewiſe hauing receiued her into the City as their Lady, thought now (as moſt doe with new Princes) they might haue what they would aske, and became her importunate Suppliants, that the ouer hard lawes impoſed by her Father, might now be remitted, and thoſe of King Edward might wholy bee in force. But ſhee reiected all theſe Petitioners, out of pride, ſay ſome; but it may ſeeme rather of policy, holding it ſafeſt, to paſſe affaires of importance, not vpon intreaty, but by due aduice, and to gouerne the ſubiect with a ſauere auſterenes, rather then an indulgent lenitie. But this too regular ſtrictnes, which might haue done well in a ſetled gouernment, in this her yet greene, and vnſecured eſtate, proued not ſo behouefull. For firſt, Queene * Maud ſent to her ſonne Euſtace, that their ſuites muſt bee obtained onely by warre; willing him to make ſtrong his partie by the aſsiſtance of the Kentiſh: the Nobles likewiſe, Stephens vndertakers, repined, that they were ſo ſlightly regarded, or rather reiected: and the Londoners alſo ſtorming at the repulſe of their deſires, deuiſed how they might take the Empreſſe their Priſoner, and ſo redeem King Stephen, to whom their affectiõs were euer firm: but ſhe hearing of their conſpiracie, fled ſecretly in the night, and tooke into Oxford, which in all her difficulties ſhee euer found true vnto her, out of their loue, both to her cauſe, and to her Father; & threatning due reuenge for her late wrongs, wrought it vpon the Nobles in priſon, and (more then was due or decent) vpon Stephen himſelf, whom ſhe commanded to be laden with Irons, and to bee abridged of all princely ſeruices.

(34) Wincheſters high mind not brooking the Empreſſes deniall of his ſuite, in behalfe of his Nephew Euſtace, vpon ſecret conferences with Queen Maud, by her lamentable entreaties, began to melt in his affection towards the diſtreſſed King his brother; & in fine, reſoluing to trie the vttermoſt for him, abſolued all thoſe whom before hee had excommunicated; pretending, that the Barons had all kept faith with her, but ſhee had not kept touch with them; and thinking this a fitte time to worke for his brother, ſolicited the diſcontented Londoners in his behalfe, and ſtored the Caſtles of Waltham, Farnham, and Wincheſter with Munition and men; meane while the Empreſſe came ſpeedily to Glouceſter, to conferre with Milo her chiefeſt friend, and preſently againe returning to Oxford (* which ſhe choſe for her Court and chiefe place of abode) was there maintained only at his charge, not hauing one dayes diet, or prouiſion of her owne; to requite which fidelity, and other noble ſeruices, ſhe there created him Earle of Hereford.

(35) Her forces recollected, & thither aſſembled, ſhe went forthwith to the City of Wincheſter, accompanied with Dauid King of Scotland her vncle, Earle Robert her brother, and many other Nobles; where ſending for the Biſhop being then in the City (whoſe aid ſhee could hardly ſpare, and therefore was deſirous of his reconcilement) though hee miſtruſted ſome perill, yet not daring to ſend a deniall, returned the Meſſenger with this equiuocall anſwere, that he would with all ſpeed addreſſe himſelfe, as if hee had meant to follow them: ſo forthwith iſſuing ſecretly out of the City, did indeed addreſſe himſelfe to worke her ruine: for, ſending for Queene Maude her ſonne Euſtace, the Londoners, and William Ypres, (afterwards created Earle of Kent) made ſtrong his part, himſelfe and friends abiding in the City, whiles

* Alias The Conuent at Hyde. Malmeſb.

(36) Seuen weekes thus ſpent, in this counter-ſiege of the Citie and Caſtle, the Biſhoppe, to deceiue the Empreſſe, commanded peace to bee proclaimed, and the Gates to bee ſet open towards euening. The Empreſſe then, who had indured ſuch troubles and ſo long a reſtraint, greatlie deſired to change her lodging, and to recreat her perplexed ſpirits in ſome other place; ſo taking horſe, accompanied with her brother, Reinold Earle of Cornewall, her ſeruants, and many others her friends, beſides Earle Robert, who followed behind with a troupe of Nobles and Knights; preſentlie at the Biſhoppes commandment, ſhee was purſued by his Souldiers, and many of her traine wounded and taken priſoners; the Empreſſe by good prouidence eſcaped into the Caſtle of Lutegareſhall, and thence to the Caſtle Diuize: where vnderſtanding that ſhee was ſtill in hazard to bee ſurprized, ſhee was contented, (as what will not neceſsity endure, & a womans wit deuiſe?) to bee laide in a coffine bound faſt with cords; and ſo, as if it had beene her Corſe, carried in a horſe-litter to the Citie of Gloceſter: in which bonds of her owne diſtreſſe, ſhee had good occaſion to remember the chaines of King Stephens captiuitie. To ſuch extremities were theſe two Princes at the ſelfe ſame time ſubiect, that whiles they turmoiled for ſpacious Kingdomes, brought themſelues to the very extream wants, of aire, and of elbow-roome; but with ſuch dalliance doth Fortune (wee ſee) oftentimes follow her game, that ſhee maketh euen Monarchs the Balls of her play, and toſſeth them laſtly into the Hazard, whence hardly they eſcape with ſafetie of life. Yet this was not the worſt; for Earle Robert her brother, whileſt hee was buſier in prouiding for her ſafetie, then for his owne, was taken by his purſuers at Stoubreg with others; brought backe to Winchester, and there preſented by the Biſhop vnto Queene Maud, King Stephens wife, who committed him to the cuſtodie of William Ypres, and he for more ſafety to Gloceſter; but others taking ſanctuarie in the Nuns Monaſtery of Warwell were burned together with the place: Thus then the King on the one ſide, and the Earle on the other, were kept in ſafe cuſtodie; but the Queene labouring for the Kings releaſe, and the Counteſſe for the Earles, many Articles were propounded, and many meſſengers imploied: at length, this was thought fitteſt, that Stephen ſhould bee reſtored to his kingdome, and Robert vnder him to haue the whole gouernment of the Land; ſo that both of them ſhould now iointly vphold that, which they (the two Ring-leaders) by oppoſition had caſt downe. But Earle Robert as he was no whit deiected in mind, with any frowne of Fortune whatſoeuer, ſo reſerued hee his fidelity to the Empreſſe vnſtained, and vnmoued either with feare or faire inticements, ſtill refuſing to capitulate for his freedome, but to his Siſters liking; who likewiſe bare ſo braue a minde, that were her ſtate neuer ſo weake, ſhee would not conſent nor giue the leaſt eare to any compoſition for the Crowne.

(37) Then was enmitie increaſed, the Kingdome diuided, and the peoples hatred kindled in mainetaining the factions, all fore-running the ruine of the Land: For theſe two Chieftaines wearied with irkſomnes of irons, and hard impriſonment, made exchange the one for the other, without any farther mention of peace, and ſo ſtudied not onely to renew their former deſignes, but to encreaſe the lands miſerie by more eagre warres. Stephen in England wrought the people for him, & Robert * taking pledges of the Nobles to attend and guard the Empreſſe at Oxford till his returne, went into Normandie to ſolicite Geffrey her husband for her defence. But the Earle hauing troubles with his owne Nobilitie, and the Normans ſcarſly brought to any ſubiection, thought it not conuenient by his owne abſence for a ſtate in hope, to hazard that in hand; and therefore ſent with Robert ſome ſtrength of Armes, and with them his young ſonne Prince Henrie into England.

(38) The Empreſſe in his abſence, had well fortified her ſelfe in Oxford, whom Stephen (vſing the benefit of Roberts abſence) followed with an eagre purſuite, and wanne the Suburbs euen vnto the Citie gates; then girt hee the Empreſſe with ſo ſtraite a ſiege, (meaning neuer to giue ouer, till hee had now made her ſure in his poſſeſsion) that for two monethes whatſoeuer Strength or Stratageme could performe in aſſault or defenſe, was there put in practize, till at length great penurie enforced to thinke of a ſurrender: but ſhee, a woman (whoſe ſexe hath often deceiued wiſe men) reſolued once againe to ouerreach her foe by wit, whom ſhee could not by force: whereto the time did fit her wiſhes; for being a winter, ſharpe aboue meaſure, the Riuer Thamiſis that runnes by the Citie walls, was then congealed with a ſtrong cruſted Ice, and beſides a great ſnow did then continue, and had couered the ground. Maud vpon theſe aduantages, put in practize a moſt dangerous attempt: for cloathing herſelfe, and ſome choice of her company, in white linnen garments, to deceiue the eies of the Sentinells, iſſued ſecretlie by night out of a poſterne-gate, and paſsing the frozen Riuer, ranne on foote, through ice, and ſnow, ditches, and vallies, for fiue miles, euen to Abingdon, the falling ſnow ſtill beating in their faces; and there taking horſe, the ſame night got to the Caſtle of Wallingford, to the great ioy, and alſo admiration, of all that were therein.

(39) In the meane while, Earle Robert, with Prince Henrie, were arriued in England at Warrhame hauen, and preſentlie beſieged the Caſtle there, (ſo to withdraw the King from ſiege of his ſiſter;) but hearing of the happie eſcape of the Empreſſe, came with young Henry vnto his mother, whoſe ſight made her forget the griefe and ſorrowes that ſhe had long indured. Then was Oxford vpon conditions yeelded to the King; and Wilton fired by the baſtard Earle Robert: The Towre of London, with the Caſtles of Walden, Pleiſes, and Lincolne, yeelded to Stephen; the Caſtles of Warham, and Portland, yeelded to Robert: The Earles of Cheſter, and Eſſex, ſurprized by the King; William Martell the great fauourite, taken and impriſoned by the Earle. Thus ſundrie yeeres paſsing with variable ſucceſſes to and fro, and euery yeere heaping on each ſide, freſh calamities, to the great ruine of the whole land; the Empreſſe, euen wearied with thoſe warres and vncertaineties of ſucceſſe, went into Normandie, chuſing rather to be vnder the protection of her husband in peace, then to raigne in England perplexed with troubles: and to the ſame end ſhe had not long before, ſent her young ſonne Henrie to his father, who deſired to haue him rather heire of a Dukedome with ſafetie, then of a Crowne with daylie hazard.

(40) Stephen, that bya freſh ſurprizall of Randall Earle of Cheſter had got Lincolne, and entring thereinto (which no King before him durſt doe, for that certaine wizards had propheſied euil luck vnto ſuch) at chriſtmas did there weare the Regall Crowne on his head, and after the Empreſſes departure, cauſed the Barons of England, to ſweare allegiance vnto Prince Euſtace his ſonne; by which two complements, hee ſuppoſed all had beene ſure on his ſide; and the rather, for that the moſt faithfull, puiſſant, and euer-renowned Earles, Robert of Gloceſter, and Milo of Hereford the two great and glorious pillars, which had by many Conqueſts ſupported their Anioueians cauſe, were now conquered by death; and the reſt of the Nobles, applying themſelues to the Times,

Times, kept themſelues quiet in the abſence of theſe Competitors; all which gaue no little aſſurance vnto Stephens eſtate.

(41) But Henry Fitz-Empreſſe, grown now from a Child, thought it beſt a while to leaue Mercury, (for it is ſaid hee was Bookiſh) and to follow Mars; ſo knowing his preſence would preferre much his purpoſes (for men would bee loth to hazard all for one, who himſelfe would neglect all) haſted againe into England, with an Armie of valiant and choice Souldiers; to whom ioined the diſcontented Earle of Cheſter, Roger the ſonne of Miles deceaſed, with many more Knights and Gallants of the Engliſh: hee therefore tooke into the North, and met with Dauid his coſen, King of Scotland, of whom hee was moſt honourably receiued, and ſolemnely ſacred with the Military honour of Knighthood: and thence forward ſought all occaſions to prouoke both King Stephen, and his ſonne Euſtace againſt him: and hauing ſetled ſome courſes with certain Peeres for the purſuit of his deſignes in England, hee returned into Normandy to compoſe & ſet forward ſome other buſineſſes, which might be auaileable for theſe his ends.

(42) Where long he ſtaied not, but that Geffrey his Father departed this life, and left him his Heire both of Anion and Normandy; and the yeere following, he matched in marriage with Eleanor Dutches of Guien and Aquitane, lately diuorced from Lodowicke King of France for conſanguinity, and adultery (ſaith Paris) after ſhee had borne him two daughters; Lodowicke fearing iſſue-male by this marriage to the diſheriting of his ſaid daughters, greatly impugned Duke Henry; and Stephen ſuſpecting his greatnes, now being Duke of Normandy, Anion, Aquitane, and Guien, both of them ſought each way to impeach his peace: Lodowicke, with Prince Euſtace, in the parts beyond ſeas, and Stephen in England, to make ſure his ſucceſſion, ſought to inueſt the ſaid Prince Euſtace with the Engliſh Diademe; both to preuent, and vtterly depriue Henry Fitz-Empreſſe for euer: for calling a Counſell at London, King Stephen commaunded Theobald Archbiſhop of Canterbury to conſecrate Prince Euſtace for their King; which hee refuſed to doe, and that by commandement from the Pope (whoſe holy See can deale on both ſides, as makes moſt for their aduantage) alledging now, that his Father was an vſurper, and periured Intruder: whereupon the honeſt Archbiſhop fled into Normandy, and the King ſeized vpon al his poſſeſsions. It may ſeeme, that one cauſe of the Popes inclining to yong Henries title, was to ſtrēgthen him againſt his enemy King Lewis of France, who had highly offended his Holines, for caſting the Popes Bulles (whereby hee required the fruits of Vacancies of all Cathedrall Churches in France) into the fire, ſaying, hee had rather the Popes Bulles ſhould roſt in the fire, then his owne ſoule ſhould frie in hell.

(43) King Stephen thus defeated of his purpoſe, and ſeeing his Title queſtioned by the Church, who had before approued it, reſolued to make it good by the ſword: for winning the Caſtle of * Muby, fortified Malmesbury, and laid a ſtrait ſiege vnto Wallingford; againſt which, hee erected the Caſtle Cranmerſe, to ſtoppe the paſſages of their reliefe, or comming forth. But Henry after hee had calmed the boiſterous ſtormes of warre, in the parts beyond the ſeas, came ouer into England well appointed, vnto whom alſo reſorted many of the Nobility, who yeelded vp themſelues, and aboue thirty ſtrong Caſtles to the young Duke; now well furniſhed, haſted to raiſe the ſiege of Wallingford, and there vndertooke a great enterprice; for hee incircled the Beſiegers with a great and deepe Trench, whereby hee kept them from reliefe, as they did keepe the Beſieged.

(44) Stephen following haſtily to ſuccour his men, (though with the leſſe edge, for that hee neuer ſped well in any aſſault of that Caſtle) pitched downe his Tents, euen neere his enemy; and ready on both ſides to giue battaile: the Winter ſtormes were ſuddenly ſo troubleſome, that nothing could bee done; but thoſe ſomewhat ouerblowne, and the Armies ſcarſe three furlongs aſunder; as King Stephen was buſied in diſpoſing of his hoaſt, and giuing direction for order of the battaile, his horſe vnder him riſing with his fore-feet, fell flat vpon the earth, not without danger to his Rider; and thus did he thrice ere he left; which thing his Nobles ſecretly muttering, interpreted for an vnlucky preſage: when William Earle of Arundell, a bold and eloquent man, went to him and aduiſed him to a peace; affirming the title of Duke Henry to be iuſt; that the Nobility on both parts there preſent, were neerely linked in Alliances & Bloud, and how theſe ſtood affected, was very doubtfull; yea, that Brethren were there aſſembled, the one againſt the other, whereof muſt needs follow an vnnaturall warre betwixt them, & of dangerous conſequence, euen to him that conqueſted. With theſe and the like allegations at laſt Stephen beganne to bend, and a parley for peace was ſignified vnto the Duke. Henry already warme for the battaile, and his thoughts fixed on nothing leſſe then peace, could hardly moderate his youthfull affections; yet at his friends importunity, hee yeelded to conferre with King Stephen.

(45) The place for conference was ſo appointed; that the riuer Thameſis parted the preſence of theſe two Princes; ſo that from either banke they ſaluted each others, and after a long conference, agreeing on a truce, and vpon faire tearmes of amity departed, commaunding all weapons and attempts of warre to be laid aſide.

(46) But Euſtace, who hitherro had attended Fortune for the Crowne, and now hopeleſſe to haue as his Fathers Succeſſor, was greatly diſpleaſed with this new moulded friendſhip, and in a fury departed the field, purpoſing to raiſe himſelfe by his owne meanes; and comming to Bury, vrged the Monks of Saint Edmunds for money, to ſet forward his heady deſignes: But the wiſer amongſt them vnwilling to bee wagers of new warres (which though ill for all ſorts, yet proued euer worſt to the Clergie mens poſſeſsions) denied his requeſt; wherewith enraged, hee commanded his men to carry their corne and other prouiſion into his owne Caſtle, ſituated hard by. But being ſet at dinner, wee reade of him (ſaith mine Author) that euen the verie firſt bit that hee put in his mouth, draue him into a frenſie, whereof ſhortly after hee died; whoſe body was interred at Feuerſham in Kent.

(47) The death of Prince Euſtace ſo much aduantaged Duke Henry, that thereupon (the truce in likelihood expiring) many fell off vnto him, and many Caſtles were deliuered, as Bertwell, Reading, Warwicke, Stamford, and others; whereat Stephen was not a little diſpleaſed, and thinking to entrappe the yong venturous Duke, with a ſtrong Army followed him vnto Wallingford: But God himſelfe looking downe from heauen (ſaith Mathew of S. Albans) made there an end of thoſe long calamities, by ſtirring the minds of chiefe men in the land to labour for peace: ſuch was Theobald Archbiſhoppe of Canterbury, and Henrie Biſhop of Wincheſter, who hauing troubled the realm with fire and ſword, moued now to repentance, wrought ſo effectually with his brother, that hee enclined vnto a wiſhed peace, contented to adopt the Duke for his Son and Succeſſor; and ſo comming both together to Oxford (a bleſſed ſight to ſo diſtreſſed and diſtracted a Kingdome;) there did all the Nobles do fealty to him, as to the vndoubted Heire of the land; and the Duke to acknowledge this as a fauour, yeelded him the honour of a Father, and the roialtie of all Kingly power during his life.

Downes, intended to ſurpriſe Prince Henry in his returne from Douer, and preſence of King Stephen. In this conſpiracie was William the Kings ſon, though but yong, who himſelfe meaning to haue one caſt at the Crowne, inſtantly before it ſhould haue been effected, was through the wantonnes of his horſe caſt to the ground, and with the fall brake his legge; to whoſe aſsiſtance, whiles euery one gathered and lamented, Henry vpon ſecret notice of the treaſon haſted vnto Canterbury, and thence to London, and ſoone after ouer the ſeas into Normandy.

Prince Henry goeth into Normandy.

(49) And Stephen now after he had raigned eighteene yeeres, ten moneths, and odde daies, departed this life at Douer, in the Monaſtery of the Monkes, of an Iliacke paſsion, mixed with his olde diſeaſe the Emrods, the twenty fiue of October, and yeere of Chriſts Natiuity, 1154. A moſt worthy Souldier, ſaith Paris: and (in a word) one who wanted nothing but a iuſt title to haue made him an excellent King; in his ordinary deportment very deuout; the fruites wherof were ſhewed in erecting with ſufficient endowments, the Abbeyes of Cogſhall in Eſſex, of Furneſſe in Lancaſhire, the houſes of Nunnes at Carew, and Higham, an Hoſpitall at Yorke, and the Monaſtery of Feuerſham in Kent, where his Queene, his ſonne, and laſtly, himſelfe were enterred: but ſince, his body for the gaine of the lead, wherein it was coffined, was caſt into the riuer. His Wife.

(50) Maud, the Wife of King Stephen, was the daughter of Euſtace Earle of Bulloigne, the brother of Godfrey, and Baldwin Kings of Ieruſalem: her Mother was Mary, ſiſter to Maud Queene of England, wife of King Henrie, her husbands Predeceſſor. Shee was crowned at Weſtminſter vpon Sunday, being Eaſter-day, and the two and twenty of March, in the firſt yeare of her husbands raigne, and of Grace, 1136. and being Queene fifteene yeeres, ſhe died at Heningham Caſtle in Eſſex, the third of May, and yeere of Chriſt, 1151. and was buried in his Monaſtery at Feuerſham in Kent.

His Iſſue.

(51) Baldwin, the eldeſt ſonne of King Stephen and Queene Maud (bearing the name of King Baldwin his vncle) was born in the time of the raign of K. Henry his fathers vncle; and died in his infancy, during the raign of the ſame King. He was buried at London in the Church of the Priorie of the Trinity within Algate, which was a houſe of blacke * Canons of the Auguſtinian order, founded by Q. Maud, the firſt wife of the foreſaid King Henry the firſt.

* The firſt Canon Regular in England was of this place Ann. 1108. and the Prior thereof was Alderman of London. Stowe, Survey.

(52) Euſtace the ſecond ſonne of King Stephen, & of Queene Maud his wife, being the heire apparant to them both; when his Father was King, was created Earle of Bollogne, which dignity was the inheritance of his mother. Hee married Conſtance ſiſter of Lewis the ſeuenth King of France, daughter of King Lewis the Groſſe: who afterward was remarried to Raimond the third, Earle of Tholouze: for Euſtace died before her without Iſſue by her, the tenth day of Auguſt, in the eighteenth yeere of his Fathers raigne, and of Grace, 1152. Hee was buried by his mother in his Fathers Monaſtery at Feuerſham in Kent.

(53) William, the third and yongeſt ſonne of King Stephen and Queene Maud, maried Iſabell daughter and heire of William Warren, the third Earle of Surrey, with whom hee had that Earledome; hee was in his Fathers life time Earle of Surrey, Lord of Norwich and Peuenſey in England, Earle of Mortayne, and Lord Eagle of Normandy. After his fathers death, King Henry the ſecond made him Knight, reſumed thoſe things that hee held of the Crowne, reſtored him to all that his Father held before hee was King. And ſo he was Earle of Bolloigne, Surrey, and Mortaine, and being with him in his iourney to Tholouze, died without iſſue, in his returne home-Ward, in the Moneth of October, the ſeuenth of King Henries raigne, and of Chriſt Ieſus, 1160.

(54) Maud, the eldeſt daughter of King Stephen and Queene Maud, was borne before her father was King, in the raign of King Henrie the firſt, her vncle; in whoſe time alſo ſhe deceaſed, beeing but yongue, (though ſome report ſhee was wife to the Earle of Millen) and was enterred at London, with her brother Baldwin, in the Priorie of the Trinity aforeſaid, then commonly called Chriſts-Church, and now latelie named the Dukes Place within Algate.

Stowes Sur. p.105.

(55) Marie, the yonger daughter of King Stephen and Queene Maude, was a Nun, and Abbeſſe of the Nunnerie at Rumſey in Hampſhire; notwithſtanding, when her brother William, Earle of Bolloigne, was deceaſed without iſſue, ſhee was ſecretly taken from thence, and married to Matthew the yonger, ſonne of Terry of Alſac, and brother of Philip Earle of Flanders, who in her right was Earle of Bolloigne. Shee was his wife ten yeeres, and was then diuorced from him, by the ſentence of the Pope, and enforced to returne to her Monaſtery, hauing had iſſue by him two daughters, which were Ide and Maude, allowed by the cenſure of the Church to be legitimate. Lady Ide, the elder, was maried to Raymond of Damp-Martine, in her right Earle of Bolloigne; and Maude, the yonger, to Henrie Duke of Lorraine.

His Naturall Iſſue.

(56) William, the Naturall ſonne of King Stephen, is miſtaken of ſome to bee the ſame William, that was Earle of Bolloigne. Others, who know that William Earle of Bolloigne was lawfully borne, do thinke that his father had no other ſon named William but him; wherein let William Earle of Bolloigne, the lawfull ſon of King Stephen, be himſelfe a lawfull witneſſe of the truth, who hauing beſt cauſe to know it, doth beſt prooue it, ; and in an ancient Charter of his, beeing written in thoſe daies, and extant in theſe, doth name him for a witneſſe, and calleth him his Brother.

(57) Geruais, another Naturall ſonne of King Stephen, begotten on a gentle-woman named Dameta, and borne in Normandy, was brought into England by his father, the fifth yeere of his Raigne, Anno Dom. 1140. Hee was the ſame yeere, by his fathers meanes, made Abbat of Weſtminſter, and ſo continued for the ſpace of twenty yeeres: hee deceaſed there the twentie ſixt of Auguſt, in the ſixt yeere of the raigne of King Henrie the ſecond, the yeere of Grace 1160. and lieth buried in the South part of the cloiſter, within the ſaid Monaſterie, vnder a flat ſtone of black marble, which is remaining there vntil this day.

HEnry of that name the second, by the double interest of descent and adoption (as you haue heard) succeeded in the Kingdome of England, whose Pedegree, (which Mathew Paris extendeth by the mothers side, in a right line vp to Noah) and former fortunes, hauing already been touched; his counsels, acts, and other affaires of greatest importance, after the death of King Stephen come now to be handled.

(2) Hee came not to the Crown vnexpected, nor vndesired; for the opinion of the man, and hope conceiued of his future gouernement, had the force to hold England in good obedience without the presence of a King, about sixe weekes, whose entrance like that of the Soule into the Body, did quicken, and enspirite the Realme, as then (in the person of England) this clozing verse, or Epiphoneme spake;
